THE ENGLISH MIND IN MOTION.

II. THE second main point on which all the writers before us are agreed, is this—that the grand and distinguishing doctrine of the New Testament is, immortality only in Christ. Of this doctrine we almost hesitate to write: our conceptions of its importance and blessedness are so intense and exalted, that we fear to be charged with extravagance and absurdity. Seen in connection with it, many of the most fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith—such as the Incarnation, Atonement, Regeneration, Resurrection, and Eternal Judgment, acquire, to us, at least, a subjective reality and power which they do not otherwise possess. And not only so, but while this sublime truth thus enhances the value of each and all these doctrines separately considered, it at the same time binds them together in a unity of divine truth, which is indeed a true and living "body of divinity," and not the dead, inarticulated skeleton which theologians have presented under that name. It may in truth be compared to the chemist's rod plunged into the saturated solution, for around it all the latent elements of revealed truth crystallize in forms of exquisite beauty; but we would rather liken it to a blazing torch lifted up amid the darkness of this world, casting upon the awful problems of human existence a gracious light, and revealing amid the bewildering mazes of theological speculation a straightened, shining path for the faltering feet.

But let us hear what our authors have to say on this momentous subject: "The salvation effected" [by Christ], says Mr. Burgh (an honored name among students of prophecy), "is most commonly expressed in terms which according to the popular doctrine of immortality, have no meaning; such as the word 'immortality' itself, 'life,' and 'eternal life.' The passages in which the first of these terms occurs have been already given; and it has been seen that it is exclusively applied to those who are saved, and spoken of in a way utterly inconsistent with the supposition that all are immortal. Thus in one of them the apostle describes the righteous as 'seeking for immortality.' But wherefore should a creature seek for immortality who is already immortal? Again, 'Christ hath brought life and immortality to light by the gospel;' but both of these, the popular creed says, the damned have as well as the saved, independent of either Christ or the gospel, by natural constitution, etc.

"'LIFE' is another expression for the benefit of Christ's death (and resurrection), and also used by itself, without any word of qualification. See John i., 4; v., 40; vi., 33; xx., 31; Acts iii., 15; v., 17, 18; 2 Cor. ii., 16; 2 Tim. i., 1; 1 Peter iii., 7; 1 John v., 12; and compare 1 John ii., 17. Now, what is the meaning of 'life' in all these passages? and why, of all words, is it thus selected to express the first of all the blessings of redemption, if all have life by nature, life in its fullest extent, immortal life? and, above all, how are we to receive the last of these sayings: 'He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son hath not life?' Shall we give it a positive contradiction, and read it—'He that hath the Son hath life; and so has he that hath not the Son?' It is easy to say that life is not here meant by life. And why, then, with reverence we would ask—why did not God say what he meant? Why, since all have life, do we not find the difference of the life marked (as was so easy to do), by some such qualifying terms a 'blessed' life, and a 'miserable' life? Much is said about the Scriptures abounding in figurative language; but unless it be maintained that the whole is figurative, and that words are nowhere used in their plain meaning, these passages must be excepted, as it cannot be said they are taken from the poetical books, or quoted out of contexts couched in allegory, or symbolical in their structure. Moreover, as has been before observed, this term 'life,' like 'immortality,' is nowhere predicated of the lost.

"Again, 'eternal life' is another frequent expression for salvation. It is unnecessary to quote the passages; but when we read, "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord' (Rom. vi., 23), where, it is again asked, is the sense of saying that the gift of God through Jesus Christ is that which all men have already? And what is the meaning of 'eternal life' in this passage? With what is it placed in contrast? With 'death,' and therefore we conclude that 'life' means life, or else we have a double metaphor in this most simple of all Scripture declarations. And 'God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. What would the writer of a dictionary of Scripture terms say is the meaning of 'everlasting life' in this passage? That being contrasted with 'perish,' it must be understood literally, unless 'to perish' be to live everlastingly; and then there is no contrast in the passage." p. 16–19.

It is of course fully admitted that when the Scriptures speak of the eternal life of the righteous, they do not intend merely endless existence, but as Mr. Dobney has well observed, "Although the life that is promised to them that believe, eternal life, is something unutterably more than protracted and interminable continuity of existence, yet this continuity of being must be an essential and fundamental element—the very basis indeed—of the blessing to be secured, as seems to be taught by the distinctive assertion, 'He that doeth the will of God abideth forever.' Let us say that this 'life' held forth as a prize to man—who, though not immortal, is capable of immortality—is the very life of Christ himself, and therefore of God; so that the happy possessors thereof are indeed 'partakers of the divine nature.' 2 Peter i., 4. Is not this amazing thought the one which especially predominates in the gospel and epistles of the 'beloved disciple?' With him Christ is emphatically 'THE LIFE.' It is he who reports the deeper teachings of our Lord concerning his object in coming into the world: 'I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly;' 'I give unto you, my sheep, eternal life, and they shall never perish;' 'Because I live ye shall live also;' but to the despisers he says, 'Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life.'" pp. 20, 21.

Reader, is not this most emphatically a Christ-exalting doctrine? Truly does Mr. Davis affirm, "The doctrine for which I am contending especially exalts the Redeemer of men. We are not immortal independently of him, and indebted to him that we are immortal in happiness, instead of being immortal in woe; but for immortality itself, in other words, for eternal life, our only right trust is Jesus Christ. In the fullest sense that you can give to the declaration, he is our life. We derive from him spiritual life. And by spiritual life I mean life through his indwelling Spirit; holy, happy, eternal life; not holiness alone, nor happiness alone, nor simply holiness and happiness combined, but with this, life itself; never-ending, vital existence." p. 18.

As we write, the music of the glad Christmas bells has hardly died upon the ear, and we surely do well to ask ourselves, What is it that we commemorate at this joyous and blessed season? Doubtless, as to the actual fact, the birth of the man Christ Jesus. But what does that fact really embody? What is its definite spiritual significance and value? We maintain that any answer is inadequate which falls short of this—It was the taking of an atom of our frail mortal nature into personal, indissoluble union with the divine nature, and in virtue of that union, lifting it up above the atmosphere of sin and death which encompasses this fallen world, into a higher, even a divine, region of holiness, immortality, and glory, to be the seed or nucleus of that new creation which is most really, to use a much-abused, but blessedly true expression, "an extension of the Incarnation." So that as we bend in adoring contemplation over the cradle of Bethlehem, we may, without the least poetic license, adopt the language of a recent poet, when he says:

"It is the birth of a new earth,
Not of a little child—
This Jesus, born at Bethlehem,
Of virgin undefiled."

We would urge any Christian reader who is not unwilling to receive this blessed doctrine of immortality in Christ, and whose mind consequently is not closed against it, to read the New Testament with special reference to this question, marking, as he proceeds, the necessary effect of its admission upon other doctrines of the Christian faith. And if this be done without prejudice and in a receptive frame of mind, we cherish the confident anticipation that ere the search is concluded, he will have hailed the rising of a new spiritual sun, whose gracious light diffuses itself throughout the whole heaven of divine revelation, and be enabled to repeat the words of the beloved apostle with an emphasis and appreciation hitherto unknown; "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God, that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God. . . And we know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in the wicked one. And we know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son, Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life." 1 John v., 11–20.

THE late Dr. Risk, of Dalserf, did not satisfy by his preaching the Calvinistic portion of his flock. "Why sir," said they, "we think you dinna tell us enough about renouncing our ain righteousness." "Renouncing your ain righteousness?" vociferated the astonished doctor, "I never saw any ye had to renounce!"

THE EARTH INHERITANCE.

BY R. CADWELL.

"While the earth remaineth seed-time and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night shall not cease." Gen. viii., 22.

THE earth in its natural state is to be the inheritance of Christ and the saints, at least 1,000 years before it becomes the new earth. During this period it will be an abode to be replenished and subdued by man in the flesh, and the place of the living creature, which hath life, that the Lord God hath made. Gen. ix., 1, 2. And the Lord God hath said, Neither will I again smile any more no every living thing as I have done. In God's judgment upon the old world, and upon Sodom, there were a remnant left. And from analogy we might reasonably infer there will be, in the judgment of God upon the nations at the close of this age. If Noah was a type of the saved of this age, by immersion into Christ's death, by his resurrection—and as resurrected, he is the antitypical Ark, saving from death the righteous, may he not, if he will, and for the fulfilment of God's purpose and glory, save men in the flesh, as subjects of faith in his kingdom, as God did for Noah's sake and his own purpose, the members of Noah's family, (and the living creatures in the Ark) of whose faith we have no evidence, but all that appears is strong evidence against it. For God said to Noah, thee have I seen righteous before me in this generation. The Apostle speaks of Noah's faith, but not of his household, in his list of righteous ones. And if Christ's transfiguration on Mount Tabor is to be consipered a miniature representation of Christ's kingdom, we shall expect to find representatives of all who shall participate in its blessings.

And a recent writer says, "Christ comes, not to destroy the race of men upon the earth, but to glorify his followers," (and I may add) but through them to bless more fully the world. "Two classes of saints will be called to inherit Christ's everlasting kingdom." There will be the large number of the living, in all quarters of the globe, who will be changed in a moment and caught up together with the resurrected dead to meet the Lord. "Of these, two classes, Moses and Elijah stand as the representatives." But if this is a proper application of the vision of Christ's personal reign and glorious kingdom, who do Peter, James, and John, who were men in the flesh, (even flesh and blood) represent in that coming kingdom? One thing is certain, they represent believers living in the flesh, in that kingdom when it comes. To be in Christ's kingdom, is very different from being glorified heirs of it, as the changed saints will be, at this time.

These men were not perfect in faith and the word of the gospel of this time. And they may represent the living justified persons, not changed to immortality when he comes, not three years old in faith, and not come under this promise—who "suffered with him, shall be glorified together." Or they may represent God's messengers sent to the nations, or the body of believing nations upon earth, during the whole time of Messiah's reign in subduing all things; or, the three taken together as a whole. If this application of the transfiguration is not correct, then we have no clue as yet to its proper understanding.

We have considered in a previous article, Psa. viii., (and as quoted by the Apostle) as proving the same doctrine, and we pass from these to some more reliable scriptural evidence, in proof of our position. In doing this, we wish to call the attention of the readers of the prophets, to a more careful notice of the following things: When the constituent parts of the land, or the waters, are referred to, or mentioned, the earth's physical condition is proved, unless these parts are used metaphorically.

Also, when day and night, summer and winter, occur, these changes demonstrate the natural state of the earth in its revolutions, and as adapted to all animal creatures, to provide for their growth, food, and rest. Hence, when we read of the period when the Lord shall reign in Mount Zion, and before his ancients gloriously, the sun shall be ashamed, and the moon confounded; and when he shall dwell there, we read of living waters, or waters of a peculiar virtue, which cause to live, or accelerate natural life, and for medicine, (which the deathless or immortal saints will not need, though they may dwell there at the same time) in the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and of the waters of the sea, into which they flow, Ezk. xlvii., 8–12: Here we read these waters go into the sea, and the waters of the sea shall be healed, and everything that moveth where the waters come, shall live, and the fish of these waters shall be as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many. And the fishers shall spread their nets there, but the miry places shall be given to salt. And it is said, the name of the city, at this time, shall be, "the Lord is there." Ezk. xxxviii., 35. These things taken in a literal sense, furnish reliable evidence of the natural state of the earth and of its inhabitants at this time: and is as good proof, that all the things named are to be taken in a literal sense, as any of them are. And of some of these places we have a historical account, and geographical locality, and are mapped out in the country described.

Again we read in Joel, iii., 16–21: "The Lord shall rear out of Zion, and utter his voice from Jerusalem, and the heavens and the earth shall shake; and it shall come to pass in that day, that the mountains (on account of the multitude, and fruitfulness of vines) shall drop new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters; and a fountain shall come forth, and shall water the valley of Shittim. In Zech. xiv., 8, and it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them toward the former sea, and half of them toward the hinder (or eastern) sea; in summer and in winter shall it be. This is when the Lord is King over all the earth.

The natural condition of the earth, and the locality of the two seas, with the places watered by the rivers, (for in Ezk. we read in the margin, "two rivers") and the annual changes of the seasons are here also taught. And if any one of the things is to be taken literal as to the continuance of time, and the earth in its natural state, they all are, no doubt, and God is reigning in Mount Zion at this time, according to all the above witnesses.

Before we proceed farther, let us obtain the time and the condition of the world, when Christ comes to make the earth his inheritance, and reign over it, executing judgment and justice in it. He shall judge the quick and the dead, at his appearing and his kingdom. When he appeareth, we shall be glorified together. Let the reader examine, and compare the following scriptures: Matth. xiii., 40, 41; xxv., 31, 32; Joel iii., 12–21; Rev. xi., 17, 18; Zech. ii., 10–13; xiv., 4, 5; Hag. ii., 22; Zeph. viii., 20; Isa. lxvi., 18–24; Acts xv., 16, 17; 1 Cor. xv., 23–28.

The Apostle says, the Lord himself shall descend with a shout, . . . the dead in Christ shall rise first, then they who are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall be caught up together, to meet the Lord in the air. And according to Zachariah xiv., and the other prophets, the hostile powers of earth, or the strength of the kingdoms and nations, will be assembled on the "mountains of Israel," and in the midst of this assembled host, met for conquest, blood, and slaughter, the saints, which a little previously were caught up (from the most of these troubles) descend with the Lord to Mount Olivet, east of Jerusalem, and his feet stand on the Mount, and of what transpires they will be eye-witnesses of the most of what the prophet presents. And I apprehend it will be a very different scene from what some now dream.

Besides, the gathering out of the kingdom all things that offend, the putting down all rule, all authority, and power, the rebuilding of the tabernacle of David which is fallen down, and the "declaring" in the Islands afar off, the fame and glory of The Lord, to them that have not heard my fame, nor seen my glory, among the Gentiles; and they shall bring all your brethren out of all nations, to my holy mountain, Jerusalem, saith the Lord. It is clear that the length of time for doing this work, belong to the age, or dispensation, in which it is done. And there has been no previous dispensation less than a 1,000 years, nor will this be, if the souls of them who were beheaded, live at Christ's coming, and reign 1,000 years, and the rest of the dead live not again, till they are finished; and satan goes out to deceive the nations.

Here are nations yet in the flesh, after the 1,000 years are past. But let us look at the intervening space, or the period of his reign a little more closely, Psa. cii., Then the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory. But when this is done, as we have seen by the texts quoted, the saints are with him glorified. God will save Zion, he will build the cities of Judah. That they may dwell there, and have it in possession. The seed also, of his servants shall inherit it, and they that love his name shall dwell therein. Psa. lxix., 35, 36. Here are two classes, one for whom the cities are builded, that they may possess, or inherit it, and the seed of thy servants also, and those that love thy name (for whom they were built) that they may dwell therein. Now the glorified and immortal saints do not need for their convenience, these desolated and ruined cities built especially to be tilled and sown, and to have men multiplied in them like a flock; and that of the hated descendants of Judah, or Israel not even if they shall be converted, unless they shall be before this time; for it destroys the happiness of some, even to talk about it.

Let him who wishes to have his faith stand in the word of God on this point, read carefully Ezk. xxxvi.

Again I will make Jerusalem an eternal excellency, the joy of many generations. Are the immortal saints the generations here? and the subjects of the joy alone? Then they multiply in numbers in order to make out the "many" generations who shall joy in her. But evidently "generations" here are succeeding ones by descent, as Ezk. xxxvii., 25, would teach. Here the natural state of the earth is again proved to be for many generations. And as one cause, with others, the trees of Lebanon are used to beautify the place of my sanctuary and make the place of my feet glorious. While the abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee; the forces (or wealth) of the Gentiles shall come unto thee.

Another notable point in the quotations given, is, instead of the glorified saints descending upon the "new earth," they descend to the old, in its worst plight, while the nations are angry and before they are destroyed. But soon Babylon's smoke is seen ascending and the voice of a great multitude is heard, saying Alleluia, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. Let us be glad, and rejoice, for the marriage of the Lamb is come. This dark war cloud is soon dispelled, and a brighter day dawns for the nations who will receive the law from Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. Before which, the redeemed host, who attend the Conqueror (with attending glory) and the multitude of Angels, say, as they approach the mountain of the House prepared, Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lifted up ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. And some will ask, Who is this King of glory? And the answer is, The Lord, strong and mighty; the Lord mighty in battle. And the salutation is repeated. Lift up your heads, O ye gates, and be ye lifted up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in. Who is this King of glory? The Lord of Hosts, he is the King of glory.

When the Saviour rode into Jerusalem from Mount Olivet, the children shouted, Hosanna, to the Son of David, that cometh in the name of the Lord. Even this was glorious, though in humility, and a pathetically touching scene, but how sublime this everlasting triumph, now to take possession (on Mount Zion), of the throne and kingdom of David, given in the words just quoted.

If the general view we have taken, that the earth in its natural state is to remain unchanged, though in a state of renewal during Christ's reign, or till the last enemy, death, is destroyed, in the most extensive application of the word, what shall we do with 2 Pet. iii., 10, 12?

My reply to all such inquiries is, everything in its proper time and place, and there is no difficulty. Peter's words are quite indefinite as to what time, in the day of the Lord, this event and work were to be accomplished. He does not state whether it shall be done suddenly or gradually. Hence he would be interpreted with the general teaching of the prophets, Christ, the apostle Paul, James and John. He says, The day of the Lord shall come as a thief, "wherein—in which" the heavens (the atmospheric, no doubt, not sidereal heavens), shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt, or be dissolved, with fervent heat, etc. If this is to be taken literal (and I have as yet considered it so), and to be done up all at once, and the wicked of Rev. xix., 8–10, are to be taken into the account, and after death and hell have delivered up the dead in them, then this would make it certain that the earth and its works are not burned up, nor the heavens dissolved till after these events. And this would make the period for the destruction of all the wicked more than 1,000 years in length. And to suppose this work accomplished as a whole, literally, at the commencement of the day of the Lord, would conflict with every passage we have quoted. It is very possible, even if this be taken in a literal sense, it will be a gradual physical change and revolution, as also a moral renovation of the living world, called by the Saviour, "the regeneration." The physical agencies by which it may be effected of God may be of the kind referred to in these texts. Some state the facts, others the cause. Isa. xxx., 23–27; Isa. xxix., 6; Ezk. xxxviii., 19, 22; Psa. xlviii., 3, 4; Zech. xiv., 4, 6, etc.

This event of which Peter speaks is "in the day of the Lord," and ushers in the new heavens and new earth state, and especially the last changing process of the old, which now passeth away, and there is no more "sea," and consequently no more rivers to run into the sea. That these two events stood related, or connected, appears from the apostle immediately adding, But we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

This changing process of purification completed, the state where righteousness dwells and remains, is reached. At this point (I calculate), the first earth and heavens have passed, and seed-time and harvest, day and night, summer and winter, have "ceased," in prophetic history.

Whether Peter contemplated the "dissolving of the elements" by fire to be a gradual work or not, his words will allow it; and the manner, Isa. lxv. 17, 25, introduces the new heavens and new earth, seems to be an illustration of this view. And I can understand him in no other way. After proclaiming the fact, he proceeds right on to say (as if what he was about to say introduced, was a part, or a pledge of the good thing promised) "But rejoice forever, in that which I create; for behold I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." How could they rejoice forever, in what was created, if the thing created was not eternal, and a part of the new earth and heavens, which shall not "pass away?" Surely, when that state comes, in which the "voice of weeping, and the voice of crying, shall no more be heard in her," that will be eternal, for the former things will have passed away. Therefore, the voice of weeping was never heard in the new earth state of the Jerusalem created, yet it had been before the place of weeping, sickness, pain, and death. And before it is freed forever, its "infant of days" will pass away, and there be no more men who have not filled their days. And they shall build houses and inhabit them, and they shall plant vineyards, and eat the fruit of them. They shall not build, and another inhabit, they shall not plant and another eat, for as the days of a tree, are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the works of their hands. They shall not labor in vain, nor bring forth for trouble, for they are the seed of the blessed of the Lord, and their offspring with them. And it shall come to pass, that before they call I will answer, and while they are yet speaking I will hear."

Here are the offspring of a people called my people, who, before they supplicate, and while supplicating, I will hear and answer. If this belongs to the immortal saints, then all the above things belong to them. But this cannot be true, for the "children of the resurrection" neither marry nor are given in marriage.

But while time continues, in the age of which we speak, from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, shall all flesh come and worship before me, saith the Lord. Even so, let it be, till all "things new" are made, and God is all in all.

THE BORROWED JEWELS.

"But every woman shall borrow of her neighbor, and of her that sojourneth in her house, jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment: and ye shall put them upon your sons, and upon your daughters; and ye shall spoil the Egyptians."—Exodus iii., 22.

SKEPTICS on reading this verse accuse God of sanctioning theft; and for their instruction I present the following quotation from the Talmud as recorded by Roy in his Hebrew dictionary.

"An Egyptian prince came to Alexander the Great, and said—Our nation have heard that you are so very benevolent as to pay all the just debts of your poor subjects.—I came therefore, to inquire, if this is the fact? The king answered in the affirmative, and inquired of the prince the nature of his demand. He replied—The Jews, who are under your jurisdiction, have, several hundred years ago, borrowed jewels of silver and gold, from our people, and have never returned them; and I have now come to demand both principal and interest. Alexander wished to know what evidence he could adduce in favor of his claim. He replied, the Bible. This is excellent evidence, said the king—will you be so good as to allow me three days to examine into the nature of your claim? To which the prince readily consented, and referred him as an evidence of it to Ex. iii., 22.

"The king consulted with his secretary, Gaviah Ben Pasea, who was a very learned Jew, and who on the morning of the third day, called on Alexander, and told him, first, to get the prince when he came, to consent, that if a balance were due on either side, it should be paid with interest; second, that the Bible should be evidence, for and against both parties; third, inquire of him if their law did not allow servants and slaves a just and equitable compensation for their services—all of which he will readily admit. 1. Then refer him to Gen. xlvi., 6, where Jacob and his posterity took their cattle and all their wealth with them into Egypt. 2. The Israelites were three or four hundred years in bondage to his nation. 3. When they left Egypt, they could not, as slaves, take their property with them.

"Now, then, estimate the value of the property that Jacob took into Egypt, and the interest; and also the services of all the Jewish nation for four hundred years, at so much a day for each one; then add the interest, and double both principal and interest, for the Egyptians made them do double labor, and they had also to find their own materials to make brick. Let him, from this immense sum, deduct the small amount of jewels of silver and of gold, and there will be such a large balance in our favor, that their whole nation cannot pay; besides he does not understand our language; for Shal-al means, to ask, demand, as a debt, or an equivalent, and not, to borrow. For a confirmation of this, see Gen. xxxii., 17; Ex. xiii., 14; Num. xxvii., 1; Josh. xix., 50; 1 Sam. i., 20; Ezra vii., 2, Psa. xxvii., 4.

"The king was delighted with this critical view of the case, and accordingly adopted the course pointed out by his able counsel. When the prince came, and Alexander explained the whole history of the case to him, and proved beyond doubt that his nation was largely in debt to the Israelites, the prince fled into a foreign country."—Selected by F. SACRED NUMBERS.

Seven is the number of dispensational fulness. It is the complete in that which is temporary—not the finally complete. It carries with it the idea of sacredness in that which relates to this world. It is always connected with whatever touches the covenant between man and God worship, and the com ing together of the Creator and the creature. Hence the sacred number. "The evidences of this reach back to the very beginning. We meet them first in the hallowing of the seventh day, in pledge and token of the covenant of God with man, as indeed in the binding up of seven in the very word Sabbath." They are also traceable in the nature and confirmative power of an oath, which is signified by a Hebrew word embracing this number. It is a number which, somehow, occurs in cases of union between God and man; in representa tions of the holy in the earthly; in all expressions of the completeness of any specific sacred order of time. The instances, at any rate, are too numerous to mention. The Bible is full of them. And the Apocalypse, which is the book of the consummation of allGod's dispensational dealings with mankind, is, above all a book of sevens. It consists of seven visions,with the sevenfold ascription of glory to God and to the Lamb, and discloses to us the seven Spirits of God, the seven candlesticks, the seven stars, seven lamps of fire, seven seals, seven horns and seven eyes of the Lamb, seven angels with seven trumpets, seven thunders, seven heads of the beast and seven crowns upon those heads, the seven plagues, seven vials, seven mountains, and seven regencies. And it is this book of sevens because it is the book of the fulness of everything of which it treats—the consummation of all divine dispensations. It is therefore the number of dispensational fulness. And whatever bears this number, in the divine reckoning, is full, complete, with nothing left out, and nothing of its own kind to be added.

Eight is the number of new beginning and resurrection. The eighth day is the beginning of a new week. The Jewish child was circumcised the eighth day, which was its birth into covenant relations. Noah was "the eighth person," and his family consisted of eight, and they started the new world after the flood. Christ rose from the dead on the eighth day. David was the eighth son of Jesse, and he established a new order for Israel. In the eighth year, the Jews were to sow the ground again as the fresh beginning of a new septenary. The eighth head of the beast was the revival of the seventh. Our Sunday, which celebrates the new creation which began in the Saviour's resurrection, is the eighth day, the first of the new week. And the eternal order of blessedness is to begin with the eighth thousand years from Adam.

Ten is the number of worldly completion, especially in the line of worldly evil. The great beast of worldly power, in its final form, has ten horns. The body of man, in earthly completeness, has ten fingers and ten toes. The moral law, as applicable to man in this world, has ten precepts. The earthly manifestations of Christ after his resurrection, were ten. The tribulation spoken of to the church in Smyrna was for ten days. The lost tribes of Israel are ten. The church, in its mixed earthly condition and slumbering, is represented by ten virgins.

Twelve is the number of final completeness. Hence the twelve months in the year, the twelve signs in the zodiac, the twelve tribes of Israel, the twelve apostles of the Lamb, the twelve stars in the crown of the woman clothed with the sun, the twelve gates of the New Jerusalem, and the twelve fruits of the Tree of Life.—Selected.

THE VALUE OF TIME.

WHEN the Roman Emperor said, "I have lost a day," he uttered a sadder truth than if he had exclaimed: "I have lost a kingdom." Napoleon said that the reason why he beat the Austrians was that they did not know the value of five minutes. At the celebrated battle of Rivoli, the conflict seemed on the point of being decided against him. He saw the critical state of affairs, and instantly took his resolution. He dispatched a flag to the Austrian headquarters with proposals for an armistice. The unwary Austrians fell into the snare; for a few minutes the thunders of battle were hushed. Napoleon seized the precious moments, and, while amusing the enemy with mock negotiations, re-arranged his line of battle, changed his front, and in a few minutes was ready to renounce the farce of discussion for the stern arbitrament of arms. The splendid victory of Rivoli was the result. the great mortal victories and defeats of the world often turned on five minutes. Men loiter, time flies, and all the great interests of life are speeding on with the sure and silent tread of destiny.

AFFECTATION is to be always distinguished from hypocrisy, as being the art of counterfeiting those qualities which we might with innocence and safety be known to want. Hypocrisy is the necessary burden of villany; affectation, part of the chosen trappings of folly.—Johnson.

THE PASSOVER SUPPER:

COMMONLY CALLED, "THE LORD'S SUPPER."

LIFE BELIEVERS in this vicinity will celebrate this annual feast, this year at the COOPER INSTITUTE, Room 18, corner of Fourth Avenue and Eighth Street, New York City, Monday evening, the 26th inst. Exercises to commence at seven o'clock. All who love our Lord Jesus, who is "our Passover, sacrificed for us," are cordially invited to meet with us on this anniversary occasion.

Those in the city or country who are so situated as to be unable conveniently to meet with others of like faith, can keep this memorial feast alone in their own houses or places of residence: they are not dependent on priests to consecrate or otherwise assist in this remembrance of Christ's death. Our Lord will meet with and bless every soul who attends thereto, whether alone or in company.

"DEMONOLOGY."

SOME twenty years ago, Alexander Campbell, founder of the sect in this country now generally called "Campbellites," wrote a work on the above subject which was highly extolled as a master refutation of the doctrine of the unconscious state of the dead. From the fame of the work, we had expected to be hard pushed on the question at issue; but on a careful examination we found nothing of the strength we anticipated. His "seven pillars," on which he relies, are not so strong as to demand a Samson to lay hold of them; so we will venture to "feel" of them. He says:

"Concerning demons of what order of intelligences, what character and destiny, of what power, intellectual and moral, or immoral, there has been much debate, and still there is need of farther and more satisfactory examination."

Here is a very candid confession, and shows that any popular theory extant is not "satisfactory." In the Grecian language, the word, he says—"Simply indicates a person of intelligence, a knowing one." It was applied to living men of "great learning" as a "title of honor." "Some elevated the spirits of departed heroes, public benefactors," etc., "into a species of demi-gods," etc. "Among some philosophers it became the title of an object of worship," etc. Again, Dr. C. says—"The term demon, from simply indicating a knowing one, became the title of a human spirit when divested of the appendages of its clay tenement, because of its supposed initiation into the secrets of another world." This became "a divinity of the ancient superstition," etc.

Dr. C. goes on to show that such was the teaching of some of the Pagan philosophers, and says—

"All Pagan antiquity affirms that from Titan and Saturn, the poetic progeny of Cœlus and Terra, down to Æsculapius, Proteus, and Minos, all their divinities were the ghosts of dead men, and were so regarded by the most erudite of the Pagans themselves. But," adds Dr. C., "the doctrine of a separate state—of disembodied ghosts or demons—is a thousand years older than any Pagan historian," etc.

Very likely it is; for the serpent told our mother Eve—"Ye shall not surely die:" and the doctrine of an emerging of the essential man into a more "knowing" state when "disembodied," is only the old deception with a new dress.

"While the Bible teaches many demons," saith Dr. C., "it nowhere intimates a plurality of Devils or Satans. There is but one Devil or Satan in the universe," etc.

Dr. C. himself must be a demon, for his knowledge is as wide as the "universe," and there ain't but "one Satan" in it. We are right glad of that.

"But," he adds, "Satan's legions of angels and demons give him a sort of omnipresence, by acting out his will in all their intercourse with mortals."

Pray, good Dr., what are God's angels and demons about all this while? Or, are there no good demons? It really seems that the Dr. is so intent on making out his theory of dead men being the "knowing ones," that he has forgotten the fact that the Bible never speaks of good demons; a most fatal fact for his scheme. The Bible stamps the whole scheme of demons being the spirits of dead men as a deception; for it invariably represents these demons as bad ones. A strange matter, truly, if Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the prophets, are demons; as they must be, if Dr. C. is correct. But Dr. C. states his proposition thus:

"The demons of Paganism, Judaism, and Christianity, were the ghosts of dead men."

To establish this point he raises his "seven pillars."

PILLAR 1. "All Pagan authors of note affirm the opinion that demons were the spirits of dead men. From Herod down to the most polished Celsus, their historians, poets and philosophers occasionally express this opinion."

Suppose all this is true, he might as well have added—they must be Gods, because his witnesses so regarded them. Besides, Archbishop Whately shows that the Pagan philosophers did not believe any such thing; that they had no real belief in a future state at all, and only taught it "occasionally," to keep the vulgar in awe.—See Whately's Lectures on the "Future States."

PILLAR 2. "The Jewish historians, Josephus and Philo, also avow this conviction. Josephus says, 'Demons are the spirits of wicked ones, who enter into living men and destroy them, unless they are so happy as to meet with speedy relief.' Philo says, 'The souls of dead men are called demons.'"

What does this prove? Josephus was a Pharisee; and Dr. Campbell might as well have quoted him to prove the "transmigration of souls," for the Pharisees held that notion also. But the legs of this "pillar" are not equal. Philo seems to teach that the souls of all dead men are called demons; Josephus, that it is the spirits of wicked men only. We see no strength in this pillar; for the witnesses not only seem to differ, but we know there was a large and learned portion of the Jews that did not believe in the existence of dead men's souls at all, viz., the Sadducees.

PILLAR 3. "The Christian fathers, Justin Martyr, Iræneus, Origen, etc., depose to the same effect. Justin, when arguing for a future state, alleges, 'Those who are seized and tormented by the souls of dead men, whom all call demons and madmen.' Lardner, after examining with the most laborious care the works of these, and all the fathers of the first two centuries, says, 'The notion of demons, or the souls of dead men, having power over living men, was universally prevalent among the heathen of these times, and believed by many Christians.'"

Mark well this "Pillar." The notion that demons were the souls of dead men was a "heathen notion," but was not believed by all Christians, though "many" had thus early departed from the Bible doctrine that "there is no knowledge" in the state of the dead. Thus crumbles this "pillar."

PILLAR 4. "The evangelists and apostles of Jesus Christ so understood the matter:" [that is, that demons were the spirits of dead men.]—ED.

This pillar Mr. C. does not undertake to sustain by any Scripture proof, but he affirms that was "the current signification of this term demon in Judea at the Christian era," and that "the apostles and our Lord used this word in different forms seventy-five times, and on no occasion give any hint of a special, private, or peculiar interpretation of it," etc., "we are, then, fully authorized to say that the demons of the New Testament were the spirits of dead men."

The notion of the transmigration of souls was equally prevalent "in Judea at the Christian era." This is clearly seen in several discourses of our Lord with his disciples, and yet he "on no occasion gave any hint of" the notion being an incorrect one. Does that prove that Christ and his apostles admitted the truth of the doctrine of the transmigration of souls? Just as much as their giving no "special interpretation" of demons proves they were the spirits of dead men. It was not the work, at that time, to explain the nature of demons. They were "evil things;" that was not disputed. Jesus and his apostles cast them out, or destroyed their power over men. The great point of controversy was as to fact—Did Jesus and his apostles heal those afflicted by them? Said the Saviour to his own disciples—"I have many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now." To have involved the nature of these demons in the controversy about the fact of the cures, at that time, would have only been to embarrass their ministry. It was left to correct itself through the influence of the doctrine of the resurrection, and the Scriptures, when opened to their understandings. The importance of the resurrection filled the minds of the apostles after Jesus rose from the dead, and settled the question, that without a resurrection there is no future life; and even those who had "fallen asleep in Christ" were "perished." See 1 Corth. xv., 12–18, 32. That fact is demonstration, that whatever the apostles might have thought, during our Lord's personal ministry, they did not believe demons were the souls of dead men when Paul wrote to the Corinthians.

A MAN TRANSLATED!

Do you ask who and where? It was in the City of Brooklyn, N. Y. His name was STARIN. The fact is vouched for by an eminent Methodist Minister, Rev. Abel Stevens, D. D., so there ought to be no doubt in the case. The essential points are thus stated by Dr. Stevens:

CHARLES M. STARIN was born at Fultonville, N. Y., November 17, 1799, and went to heaven from Brooklyn, N. Y., March 23, aged 69. . . . . He has lately been manifestly ripening for heaven. He expected a sudden departure, and prepared his affairs for it. In his last family prayer, on the evening of his death, he invoked a blessing on each member of his family by name. In the night he was suddenly attacked with illness, and before morning was not, for the Lord had taken him.

Is not that a genuine case of translation? True, Dr. Stevens incidentally speaks of "his death," but that manifestly was a slip of the pen: it is the only intimation that death was so much as thought of; for though Mr. Starin was "suddenly attacked with illness, in the night, before morning he was not, for the Lord had taken him." No one can fail to see that these words refer to what was said of Enoch, who "walked with God; and he was not; for God took him." Gen. v., 24. And Paul saith, "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and was not found, because God had translated him." Heb. xi., 5.

Whether our neighbor in Brooklyn was found after he "was not, for the Lord had taken him," we are not told. If the statement concerning him is strictly correct, the friends were saved the cost of a funeral, and the Doctor of Divinity the labor of officiating at a burial. God, according to the statement in the case, made these ceremonies unnecessary. But that slip of the pen—"his death"—is a little stumbling as to the fact that "the Lord had taken him." The Bible way of the Lord's taking His saints is, to translate them, that they shall "not see death;" that they "shall not sleep," but "be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," or if they are dead, to "raise them up at the last day."

But a theological invention has been patented, it seems, to go a shorter and quicker route than was known to the ancient prophets, to Jesus Christ or His Apostles; for none of them use such language as that found in relation to Mr. Starin. Whether this new patented way from this present state to another is quieting to those who seek some other way into the kingdom than the Bible way of a resurrection from the dead, or a translation at the last trump, we do not know; but we do know that its foundation is as baseless as the Romish purgatory, and just as antiscriptural; "born of the will of man," and not of God. Inherent immortality is the womb out of which they have both come forth.

"RANK POISON, BOYS."

SUCH was the expression made use of by one who stands foremost in the ranks of the Young Men's Christian Association of this city on my presenting to some young men, last Sunday, in front of Wood's theatre of this city,(where this society holds meetings every Sunday afternoon) a few of our tracts on the life question, together with one called "The Penalty of Sin"; which latter one was gotten up by me a short time since in refutation of a sermon on "The Tortures of Hell," preached by our nearest Methodist minister. As you have not seen this one I enclose it. If you can discover the rank poison in it, with which I am accused of poisoning my fellow men—except it be contained in the citations I have given of uninspired, fallible men, I should be glad to know it, lest I do any more mischief in that way. Nothing short however of "A thus saith the Lord" and not the cry of mad dog, or any other like subterfuge, is ever going to stop me from "pedling out (to use another one of his expressions) the Bible antidotes of the poison of immortal soulism, which to such a fearful extent permeates the religious systems of the day.

I readily concede that the Young Men's Christian Association is engaged in a noble work when it confines itself to the one object of laboring to win men to Christ; but when it cherishes a spirit of proscription such as it manifested when our tracts were brought to its notice, it certainly mistakes its mission. To wrap itself up never so close in an evangelical garb is not going to conceal its true animus either, for in whomsoever the Spirit of Christ dwells the fruits of that Spirit will not be lacking, and these, and not a standard that men may set up, are the test, by which those that are scripturally evangelical may be known. "Ye shall know them by their fruits," says our blessed Saviour.

To apply to us, therefore, the stigma "unevangelical" matters very little as long as we are found "denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, and we live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, and are looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. "As many as walk according to this rule" will be enabled to say, "truly our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ," though they may be denied the fellowship of their evangelical (?) brethren. And, blessed be God, soon the fruition of our hope of an eternal fellowship with our blessed Saviour in his kingdom will be realized. For yet a little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry." "Even so, come Lord Jesus, quickly." Amen. Yours, looking for our soon coming King and LIFE-GIVER. C. FRANKE.

CINCINNATI, OHIO, April 9, 1869.

NOTE BY EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.

Two pages of the tract by Br. Franke are made up of texts of Scripture, without note or comment. The other two pages contain the following statements, which we think are "Rank Poison" and horrid blasphemy; yet they have passed for "evangelical!" Read them and blush for the corruption of the word by good, but mistaken men. We trust the days for such "heresies" are about over.

THE WORDS OF FALLIBLE, MISTAKEN MEN.

"We are amazed at the inhumanity of Phaearis, who roasted men in his brazen bull; this was joy in respect of that fire of hell which penetrates the very entrails without consuming them." "Husbands shall see their wives; parents shall see their children tormented before their eyes." "The bodies of the damned shall be crowded together in hell like grapes in a winepress; which press one another till they burst." "Every distinct sense and organ shall be assailed with its own appropriate and exquisite sufferings."—Jeremy Taylor.

"The world will probably be converted into a great lake or liquid globe of fire in which the wicked shall be overwhelmed, which will always be in tempest, in which they shall be tossed to and fro, having no rest day or night—vast waves or billows of fire continually rolling over their heads, of which they shall forever be full of a quick sense within and without; their heads, their eyes, their tongues their hands, their feet, their loins, and their vitals shall forever be full of a glowing, melting fire—enough to melt the very rocks and elements; also, they shall be full of the most quick and lively sense to feel the torments: not for one minute, not for one day, not for one age, not for two ages, not for a hundred ages, not for ten thousand of millions of ages—one after another; but forever and ever, without any end at all, and never, never be delivered."—Jonathan Edwards.

"Infinite justice arrests their guilty souls, and confines them in the dark prisons of hell, till they have satisfied all its demands by their personal sufferings, which, alas, they can never do." "God is present in hell, in his infinite justice and almighty wrath as an unquenchable sea of liquid fire, where the wicked must drink in everlasting torture—the presence of God in his vengeance scatters darkness and woe through the dreary regions of misery. As heaven would be no heaven if God did not there manifest his love, so hell would be no hell, if God did not there display his wrath. It is the presence and agency of God that gives everything virtue and efficiency, without which there can be no life, no sensibility, no power. God is therefore present in hell to see to the punishment of these rebels against his government, that it may be adequate to the infinity of their guilt; his fiery indignation kindles, and his incensed fury feeds the flames of their torment, while his powerful presence and operation maintain their being, and render all their powers most acutely sensible, thus setting the keenest edge upon their pain, and making it cut most intolerably deep. He will exert all his divine attributes to make them as wretched, as the capacity of their nature will admit." "Number the stars of the firmament, the drops of rain, sand on the seashore; and when thou hast finished the calculation set down and number up the ages of woe; let every star, every drop, every grain of sand, represent one million of tormenting ages, and know that as many more millions still remain behind, and yet as many more behind these, and so on without end."—From BENSON'S (Methodist Divine) Sermon, "On the Future Misery of the Wicked.

A QUERY.

WAS the prophecy of Hosea xi., 1, literally fulfilled in Matt. ii., 15? It reads thus: "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt." Hosea xi., 1. "That it might be fulfilled which was spoken of the Lord by the prophet, saying, Out of Egypt have I called my son." Matt. ii., 15.

How are we to understand the fulfilment here spoken of? Was Israel typical of Christ? and was Israel, as a nation, God's son in a symbolical sense, and Christ the antitype, the son in the true or literal sense? If so, is Christ not the true Israel of God? And if not so, how was the prophecy fulfilled in Christ? Yours. JACOB GRIM.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

1. The text in Hosea is not a prophecy; it is a statement of facts in the past.

2. The text Matt. ii., 15, does not call that statement a prophecy. It was not uncommon among the Jews to make a secondary application of a fact where there was a similarity in the events. Dr. Adam Clark, in his note on the text Matt. ii., 15, says, "This is quoted from Hos. xi., 1, where the deliverance of Israel, and that only, is referred to. But as that deliverance was extraordinary, it is very likely that it had passed into a proverb, so that 'Out of Egypt have I called my son' might have been used to express any signal deliverance."

Whether such was the fact or not, such forms of expression were used in relation to events which had some resemblance to other previous ones. In the same chapter (Matt. ii., 17) after Herod had murdered the children in Bethlehem, it is said, "Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet, saying, In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation and weeping, and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children, and would not be comforted, because they were not."

Here is a fact referred to; not a prophecy. Jeramiah speaks of the bitter lamentation at the carrying away captive of the ten tribes of Israel, of which Ephraim was the principal, whose grandmother was Rachel. She is represented as bitterly weeping because her children were carried away, and "were not" any longer in the land of promise. This circumstance was used by Matthew, not as a prophecy now fulfilled, but as an event of sorrow and affliction like that which Jeremiah records. To suppose that Matthew applies it as a fulfilment of the saying of Jeremiah and as a prophecy, is to prove the prophecy false; for Jeremiah lays the scene in Rama, in the tribe of Ephraim, and the weeping at Herod's slaughter was far to the south of Rama in Bethlehem. Hence, as a prophecy it would be untrue. But as an event of a similar character it was true.

Such we regard as the true state of the case in relation to the texts presented by Br. Grim. To us it removes all difficulties in these cases and many other of like character.

FROM DR. J. K. FINLEY.

NILES, MICH., April 12, 1869.

BR. STORRS: A few days ago an old friend of mine who formerly lived here, but removed to Illinois about fourteen years ago, called to see me. In the course of our conversation, I made some remarks about the Life views, which appeared to be an entirely new subject to him, but one which upon a simple presentation of the Bible teachings, struck him very favorably. He expressed a strong desire to see the articles which had been published in the "Niles Republican;" but finding they could not be obtained he gave me a dollar to send to you for them. Please send the HERALD beginning with those articles until you have sent as many as the dollar will pay for; and I think you will find he will become a permanent subscriber.

Does Ezekiel xviii., 26, have reference to anything more than the righteousness resulting from obedience to the Mosaic laws? If he has heretofore kept those laws, but finally breaks them, his previous obedience will not secure him from the infliction of the penalty—death; if death should have been the penalty threatened. This explanation may have been given, but I have never seen it. In reading it, with its context, a few days ago, it seemed to me that this must be the proper explanation, and that it could not refer to the righteousness of faith in Christ. He might be a sincere believer, and yet under strong provocation, be overcome and led to break one of the civil laws by which the Jews were governed; and may properly be put to death for it.

A little occurrence took place at my house some time ago which illustrates several points in orthodoxy. A clergyman, an old acquaintance, visiting Niles called to see me. Having the assurance which orthodoxy imparts, he undertook to ride over one, as the saying is, "rough shod." After hearing what he had to say, without interrupting him, I said, Sir, you are not an honest man. His face colored up, and he evidently began to think assurance was not all on his side. He said, That is a very plain remark. I told him he had made some very plain remarks to me, and I wished to be as plain with him. "Well, I would like to know what you mean." I replied that, as I knew he was a good classical scholar, I would inquire if he did not know that Sheol and Hades, the Hebrew and Greek words of the Bible that were translated Hell, did not either of them mean a place of torment or suffering! He hesitated for some time, and would evidently have preferred not to answer the question. He did, however, at length admit that he knew such was the fact. Now Sir, said I, when you use the word hell in preaching to your congregation, and when you read it to them from the Bible, you allow them to believe that you mean a place where the wicked will suffer the most excruciating tortures throughout all eternity. He here interrupted me by saying they knew better. A lady sitting by, said, No, sir, we did not know better until lately: now some of us do know better. I only remarked, You know now, sir, what I meant when I said you were not an honest man. The subject was dropped and he soon afterward left.

One of your subscribers here died lately. I have every reason to believe he was firmly persuaded of the truth of the Life views, and from conversation with him not long before he died, I have good reason to believe he was a true Christian. I inclose a obituary notice of him, written at the request of his wife's family: not to republish but only to show that men of his stamp are giving attention to the Life views. I am very truly yours.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have sent all the papers except Dec. 17, containing your articles on Immortality. Of that number we have not a copy left. The paper is now sent regularly, as you directed, to your friend in Illinois.

A STRANGE POSITION.

BR. STORRS: I have been listening to a few discourses. In one on the atonement, the preacher gave this view, if I understood him, and I think I did, thus: "The wages of sin is death;" signifying "the second death:" not this natural or common death. Although Christ died unto sin but once, it was a substitute for this "second death;" and, also, that suffering is part of this penalty due the law, for Christ suffered; "he was made perfect through suffering;" and the person who accepts Christ, believes in Christ, becomes in reality a Christian, is exempt from this suffering and death. But the wicked who have not accepted Christ, must all be raised up, live again, be judged, and pass into this state of suffering and death.

I do not know as I give his precise language, but so I understand it. Now, in looking over the Scriptures, I find the punishment due to sin, after the final judgment, is an everlasting punishment; see Matth. xxv., 46. Therefore, if suffering is a part of this punishment, it must be an everlasting suffering. Thus eternal, everlasting torment is proved. But if the suffering, which is a part of the penalty, can cease, why may not the remaining part also cease? And, in fact, the suffering in the substitute did cease; so also the death ceased; for he was holden only three days and nights; and was made alive to die no more; "death hath no more dominion over him." Does the law demand less of the substitute than it does of its lawful victim?

If Christ as a substitute was made perfect through this suffering and death—and this suffering and death had an end—and Christ went to the extent of the law; who can say it will not have the same effect on its lawful victim? and, in fact, it must, if the law is just; and thus Universal restoration is proved true.

Now, I am not a believer in this substitutional atonement; or a Universalist, or a believer in the eternal torment theory. I think I see a more excellent way. Our Lord prayed for his disciples thus: "Father, sanctify them through thy truth." Error cannot have this sanctifying influence.

Therefore my prayer is, O Lord, ever more give us thy truth. Amen. Yours in love of the truth. C. A. HASTINGS.

LITTLE DENE: A TRUE STORY.

MY father lived in Maine. There were six children of us at that time, and I was the baby of the family, and as is very common, I was called by a kind of baby sobriquet, Dene, as Sammy, for the baby name of Samuel, etc. At the time I speak of my grandmother lived with us. She was a Methodist, and had the reputation of being a very pious woman. This was before I was three years old. My story begins on one of the coldest days of winter in that cold climate. The country was new, abounding in wood, and the old-fashioned fire-places were amply capacious to consume half a cord a day; and in extreme weather were piled up to the high mantel-piece. Such a fire we had on the day I speak of. Grandmother had been out in the cold, and came in, and seating herself in the big armed chair, before the unusually hot fire, and looking to me said, "Dene, Dene, come here, Dene." I readily obeyed the summons, and she took me in her lap, and slipping her hand gently over my forehead to put back my hair, and looking wistfully into my little blue peepers, said, "Dene, did you ever tell a fib?" No, granny. "O, tell me sartin: if you ever tell a fib, there is a great God up in the sky; an awful great Being, and he will burn you to all eternity in a fire ten thousand times hotter than this; he will, sartin, and he'll never stop burning you." And at the same time she took my left hand in hers and held the back of it to the big fire, nearer and nearer, until it began to smart and I began to pull back, and she all the time kept saying, "he will, he will, sartin." And seeing she was in good earnest about it, and thinking I had already got enough of eternal burning, I said, he is a dreadful naughty man, granny. "Tut! Tut! if you say so he will sartinly burn you." But this did not in the least move me to repent of calling him a dreadful naughty man; for my little hand still smarted with what I afterward learned to be endless hell torment; the foretaste of which I thought was quite enough without the ten thousand times hotter.

This was my first lesson in divinity: the first time I ever heard of a being called God, and my first impression was perfect hatred toward him. Simple as this story may appear to the reader, it had a powerful influence on my mind in after years. For the first forty it may truly be said to have formed my whole character. As I grew large enough I went to religious meetings, and everywhere heard the same character of my grandmother's God, and still worse: that he was not satisfied with a fire hot as she represented it, but would increase the heat ad infinitum, and consequently the pain to all eternity; and yet I was told to love him. But this I found impossible.

But time rolled on and I was kept at school, where I learned something of the wonderful works of nature, in which I found a God whose works were "all very good." I therefore concluded he was not my grandmother's God of eternal torture, for I thought I had tried burning enough to know that it was not very good. But my ministers made me believe that the Bible taught it, and therefore I denied the Bible and became an infidel; and for more than forty years from my first lesson in divinity my life was all night and winter, without a shadow of hope of any future.

So much for being taught in infancy such a perpetual and horrible burning for telling a fib. But after spending by far the greater part of my life, and all my most vigorous days in deism, it pleased God to put me in the way to hear a few gospel sermons for the first time in my life, the very first of which shook my infidelity out of me and made me ashamed of my ignorance of the Bible, and of the Divine attributes of a God of infinite goodness and mercy, a God whom good men can love and serve with delight.

Since that time I have, in my feeble way, preached the goodness of God, with few exceptions, in nearly all the large cities north of Mason and Dixon's line, and in a multitude of villages and smaller towns, in private houses, log school houses, on steamboats, railroad cars, in tents, groves, in open air, to both large and small audiences, and have written much to inform a misinformed people that God is good, and that the penalty of sin is death, and not eternal torment, nor his twin brother—die twice; but I have done nothing to boast of, but on the contrary, feel condemned for doing so little for that Divine Being who has done so much for me in bringing me out of cimmerian darkness into the marvellous light of the gospel.

And now I would say to all who believe in eternal torment, for God's sake do not teach it to your young children, lest you should drive them into infidelity, there to perish forever. Better let them grow up to read the Scriptures for themselves, wherein they will find that death is the penalty of sin. For I verily believe that the awful doctrine of eternal torture in penal fire has been the means of leading more into infidelity than all the Tom Paines in the world. It is a doctrine of all others which should be kept out of the minds of young and innocent children, for before their little minds are case-hardened in unrelenting cruelty they will hate that great man up in the sky, who seems to the untutored mind so dreadfully cruel.

And be assured of another fact: little children have more thoughts than many people are aware of, and before evil is taught them their thoughts run in a pure channel. Their first thoughts are the gentle flow of nature's crystal stream, on whose hallowed tide eternal torture can never float. LITTLE DENE.

ASHTABULA, OHIO, April 17, 1869.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We know the writer of the foregoing, and know that he is not the only one who has been saved from infidelity by the preaching of the Life views. A thinking child is almost inevitably driven into hatred to such a God as has been presented to his mind by misnamed "orthodoxy." The infidelity may be hidden, but it exists in many a youthful breast.

THE WORKMEN WANTED.

BY LOUISA J. BEACH.

IF ever there was a time in the history of the church of Christ, when men were needed—men of integrity, of firmness and moral standing, yea, and women too, it is the present. Those who cannot be bought or sold, who are willing to sacrifice ease, reputation, and personal emolument for the honor and advancement of the truth and the good of the church—who will make no compromise with error, even though self should sink into oblivion. Well would it be for the cause, if the fearful and faint-hearted would turn back at once, that they no longer retard the efforts of those who would go forward. The battle waxes hotter, and the conflict, though it may be short, will be a severe one, hence a coward will only be a curse in the ranks.

In every great reformatory movement, there have always been individuals, who though enlightened in regard to truth and duty, have always kept in the back-ground, never venturing out boldly into sight—cautiously hiding their colors from the enemy, and refusing to commit themselves, and at a time, too, when help was needed, and the few pioneers in the work were sacrificing their all and suffering for the truth's sake. And when it became apparent that they were prospered in their work—the ground well broken—the severest part of the labor accomplished, it was comparatively an easy matter to join the ranks and share the fruits of other's labor. Something of this we have seen even in our day, and in our estimation, no class of persons look more contemptible.

Perhaps we are somewhat uncharitable; perhaps they should be pitied rather than censured; but they frequently are persons of intelligence and good mental calibre, hence they have little excuse to offer, except it be their own indolence or a lack of moral courage. Nevertheless, truth will ever prosper and triumph in the end, and in every age the Lord will have living witnesses, though He raise them up from the stones of the streets.

Another class who do much evil, and bring sadness to the true-hearted and valiant ones, are those whose sympathies have professedly been with the truth, and who have perhaps been identified with its advocates, but unexpectedly we find them compromising with its enemies—lowering the pure and beautiful standard, and often for the professed purpose of doing more good—of promoting peace, and of reaching the ears and hearts, (and perhaps the purses too,) of some who can be influenced in no other way. Possibly some may be honestly deceived in regard to their own motives. But alas, for poor human nature; the drapery is too thin and superficial to hide the deformity. The man who openly and squarely backs down from a position is more to be honored, than one who prevaricates, or compromises with error.

Notwithstanding the various hinderances which may arise, and often too from unlooked for sources, yet all who are in harmony with God and truth have the assurance that their "labor is not in vain in the Lord." The work of exposing the errors of these last days, and in their stead presenting the glorious plan of God to save a world otherwise doomed to death, is a great one and a noble.

There are truly many adversaries, and the ways and means which they devise and practise to hinder the work, show a zeal and perseverance worthy of a better cause. As in the case of Nehemiah, reproach and ridicule have been restored to, and numerous efforts to draw away the builders from the specific work assigned them. But the work should not cease even for the purpose of taking "counsel" with its opposers. It is too far advanced—the day too far spent for any to falter now—and "onward" is the only motto known.

The words of a late writer, just brought to mind, seem to be in place and to the point. "It is the truth which is assailed in any age that tests our fidelity. It is to confess we are called, not merely to profess. If I profess with the loudest voice and the clearest exposition, every portion of the truth of God except precisely that little point which the world and the devil are at that moment attacking, I am not confessing Christ, however boldly I may be professing Christianity. Where the battle rages hottest, the loyalty of the soldier is proved; and to be steady on all the battle-field besides is mere flight and disgrace to him, if he flinches at that one point."

"The harvest truly is plenteous, but the laborers are few: Pray ye, therefore, the Lord of the harvest, that he will send forth laborers into his harvest."

WESTWARD BOUND.

IF the Lord will that I live and am well, I think to go West about the 20th of May, to preach, as much as in me is, the gospel, where the way opens; and work (not play) for the benefit of all. Should any Brother, in the East or anywhere, desire a share in the blessing and honor, they can have it, with use, by sending help to pay my expenses. Thanks to that Brother who sent the twenty dollars. I will try and use it right. I go to Michigan first; stop a while, and then go beyond, if I get the means. My address is FINDLEY'S LAKE, Chautauque Co., N. Y.

DANIEL L. OSBORN.

LOOKING FOR A PAPER.

ELD. GEO. STORRS: I wish to subscribe for a weekly religious paper that is devoted, in part at least, to the restoration of the lineal descendants of Abraham, (the Jews). I am about adopting that unpopular idea, and wish a paper that advocates it. I do practise that unpopular custom of some whose manner is to keep in memorial the creation of the world by doing no work on the Sabbath of the Lord thy God;—but not one of the S. D. A. Viz., school: no, no.

It is my impression that you publish a paper in favor of the return of the Jews. If so, please send me a specimen and I will transmit the price by return mail. I believe in a resurrection of the wicked dead, also. I make these statements thinking that it affords some satisfaction to an editor to know what his readers believe. Yours in the blessed hope of the soon advent of David's Son to reign in Zion. L. R. LONG.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM ELD. C. F. SWEET.

THOUGHTS ON A FEW THINGS.

IT becomes me first, to acknowledge the receipt of the HERALD OF LIFE, as the freewill offering of some unknown, but kind hand. May God bless the donor, the Editor, and the reader in the promotion of every truth, the curtailment of all error, and the establishment of practical godliness among the people. I am as firm a believer as any man can be, I think, of the doctrine of LIFE ETERNAL only through Jesus, at his second personal coming. Also, I am a decided unbeliever in the mortal resurrection of the saints, and I am greatly surprised to learn, that some of our would-be great men, have embraced a doctrine so far removed from the positive statements of the word of God. I could just as readily admit no life, or "resurrection," to the ungodly, as to admit the mortal resurrection of the saints. I do not see as either sentiment has power, of itself, in the abstract, to disinherit a child of God; (if indeed they are errors.) Some think and speak of the non-resurrection of the wicked as a defection from the truth of deadly and damnable nature. This may be so. But I do not so look upon it. I see as much love, long-suffering, and patient forbearance, among that class of my co-religionists as others, and that is what gives them place in my affections and fellowship. The Scripture saith, what a man thinketh to be sin, to him it is sin. Hence when I find a man that appears to devoutly believe any sentiment that I do not see the Scripture to teach, I weigh his or her Christianity by the NEW COMMANDMENT, John xiii., 34, and if the scales preponderate in favor of obedience in daily life, I set it down as genuine. But when I see and hear loud professions and at the same time the golden rule is cruelly violated, I say to myself, all that white bunch is not meal, whether in Editors, Publishing Committees, Ministers, or Laymen.

I am surprised to find the following paragraph from the "HERALD OF LIFE," published in the "Crisis." What does it mean. Is the sun again commanded to stand still?

"To be delivered from the bondage of the doctrine of inherent immortality, and to know that future life is only for those who are in Christ, or who receive that life as a free gift of God, and that all who do receive it are eternally holy and happy, is truly 'glad tidings of great joy,' designed for all people, but which has been stolen from us by 'the traditions of men.'"

The italicism is mine. But who after reading that in the Crisis will deny any longer that "the world moves." Does it mean now to ignore all it has ever published in support of the mortal resurrection of the wicked? and if not, then what does it mean by voluntarily publishing it?

FROM ELD. H. ROCKWELL.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., April 3, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Since I last saw you, my life has been crowded with sore trials, accompanied with pain and anguish; but the peace of God has been so abundant that it more than compensates for all my sufferings, physical and mental.

It gives me untold joy to know that when those who oppose the life theme, ask me, with a sorrowful look, if I ever knew of a conversion by the preaching of "No Life out of Christ?" I can look back and count scores, who formerly were as much opposed as they are now, but have renounced their opposition and become as docile as lambs, and as loving and kind as we could wish. This I think a wonderful triumph of the converting power of sovereign grace, when men are so converted, step by step, from traditional error to a consistent Bible truth, and to be so transformed in the temper of the minds as to be begotten to a lively hope of a resurrection from the dead.

Glory be to God for this hope of being found worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, so that I shall not die any more, but be equal unto the angels, and be a child of God, being one of the children of the resurrection. It invigorates me with new life; makes me strong in the Lord, and ready to labor 75 years more, unless the Lord comes to call us from the walls to reap our great reward.

FROM JAS. W. SMITH.

CHESTER, PA., April 3, 1869.

BR. STORRS: As my HERALD OF LIFE has not come at its appointed time, and having nothing to read that is fresh, I will employ the time in writing a few lines to you. I have an only brother residing in Scotland to whom I have been sending the HERALD for the last two years. I was aware that he had given up the immortality of the soul, that ghost-saving humbug that has bewitched the world. I wrote him to let me have his opinion about immortality and endless life only in Jesus. So, last time he wrote me, he says, "When I wrote you last I had some doubts about the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, but I have reconsidered the subject, and have come to the conclusion that they (the wicked), will not be raised, and that they will be allowed to sleep on forever." And he adds, "I love the HERALD OF LIFE. May God prolong the days of the Editor and bless him for the noble stand he has taken against the counterfeits and forgeries committed on God's word."

So you see, Br., that there is a prayer going up to the throne of grace for you, and for the prosperity of the "blessed Hope" of Life only in Jesus; and that, too, away among the big hills of Scotland, where many suffered martyrdom and were baptized in blood, years ago.

Now, Br. S., I have enclosed seventy-five cents, and you will oblige me very much if you will send this brother a full set of "Campaign Documents," including the cheap edition of the six sermons. If you have a copy of the HERALD OF LIFE for March 17, containing your sermon on the "Lord's Supper," you might send it, too. I wish to keep that paper, because I think the view taken is the right one, and I would like my brother to have the benefit of reading it. Love to you and all the brethren.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The works are all sent to your brother, as directed. It cheers our heart to know that prayer is going up to God for us and the cause in good old Scotland. May our gracious Lord cause the light to shine more and more in that "martyr" land.

FROM HENRY A. TROEGER.

SANDWICH, ILL., Mar. 29, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Please find inclosed two dollars to pay for a year's subscription to the HERALD OF LIFE. My uncle, Amb. Ronthaler, of Bethlehem, Pa., first made me acquainted with your views on the immortality of the soul and the punishment of the wicked, etc., and taking considerable interest in the same, I purchased "Life only in Christ" of you last summer on my way home, which I have read several times, and am very much pleased with. Desiring to know more about the matter, you will please forward, as requested above, the HERALD OF LIFE regularly to me.

I have had to suffer a little already on account of my new faith, having been brought up before the class leaders' meeting of the Ger. E. M. Church, to which I belong, on account of my faith, and not knowing the charges preferred against me, I was unprepared to defend myself, and still I was able to fortify my position with such plain truths that they forebore to pass judgment, but handed me over to our Pastor, that he might cleanse my mind of "these wild, speculative ideas," as they termed them. I have heard no more about it, but shall by-and-by request that they prove, by Scripture, the falsity of my position. Praying God-speed to your successful endeavors in unvailing the truth, I am your Br. in Christ.

FROM SARAH G. WADE.

DRY WOOD, MO., March 29, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Many thanks for the Campaign Documents you sent me last summer. They were the first I ever saw. I have read them with much delight, and have given all away. Some read to see if these things are so; others say, they don't want anything to do with "soul sleeping, and they want to see the wicked live as long as God does, and know they are tormented day and night forever and forever." Oh, what a spirit! I am glad for a gospel hope. I don't believe in eternal torment; and the more I read my Bible the brighter my faith in Jesus Christ is; for He is "the resurrection and the life;" and except we obey his commands and believe on him, we shall never see life, but the wrath of God will abide on those that reject life, seeing they have judged themselves unworthy of eternal life. Death without hope must be the greatest punishment that can be; to know that we are to be as the brute that perishes. I thank you for continuing my paper. I should feel more lonely than I do, if I could not hear from the dear brethren and sisters through the HERALD OF LIFE. How welcome its visits. Yours in hope of eternal life.

FROM JOSEPH BROWN.

CARTHAGE, ME., April 6, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Your paper is a welcome visitor to me: for I take comfort in reading its truths and the principles which it draws out from the word of God. I read them, then pass them to the Brethren, hoping and praying it will be the means of spreading the light taught in the Scriptures of divine truth. It has been about eighteen months since I embraced the faith of Life in Christ for the righteous only. It looks blessed to me. It makes the Bible harmonize in all its teachings; and with this view we can see God to be a God of Love; and this is most blessed. My wife and I embraced these views about the same time. There are a few others that see the light. May the Lord help them to come out boldly and stand up for the truths of God's word. We have had much opposition since we embraced this precious truth.

I have had a few of your tracts, which I have read with interest and passed them around. If I had a few more I could distribute them so they would do some good; but as I have not the money to send now I will wait patiently till the Lord favors me with a dollar or two. It is my desire to do what little I can in helping to spread the light.

May God grant that men and women may see the light of God's truths and embrace them, I do feel thankful for the light I see in the word of God. It is my desire so to live in this world that I may, with all the dear Brethren, be accounted worthy of the resurrection, to die no more. Yours, in hope of redemption and eternal Life through Christ when he comes.

FROM JOHN NOYSE.

BETHLEHEM, N. H., April 11, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I feel truly thankful for the privilege of reading the HERALD OF LIFE so long as I have. It is the best paper I ever read, and I cannot do well without it. I am truly persuaded that the doctrine of No future life out of Christ is the truth of God, and a blessed truth it is. I have tried to have some of my neighbors take the paper, but I am old (73) and very infirm; cannot get round much. I have lent my paper to several. They all say its doctrines are true, but don't feel able to take it. I have prevailed on one man to take it. Therefore I inclose four dollars and fifty cents, of which I wish you to apply two dollars for the new subscriber.

Send me the Six Sermons, etc., and apply remainder on my paper.

LOOK UP!

BY REV. DANIEL MARCH, D. D.

MANY years ago, a little boy, while playing in the streets of Baltimore, happened to stand at the foot of a long ladder and look up. He heard the sound of voices and hammers far up on the roof above him, and his childish curiosity impelled him to climb. He set his foot on the lower round and his hands upon the next, and then went on, slowly pulling himself up, hand over hand, round after round, until he was so high that a fall would be instant death, and yet he had not reached the top. He grew tired, and wished he had not begun to climb. He looked down to see how far he had come, and the great height made him giddy. He began to tremble with fear, and was fast losing his strength and his hold. Just then, a man passing along the street at the foot of the ladder, looked up, saw his agitation, and cried out in terror, "My G— that boy is going to fall!" Those startling words were heard by the poor child, and they made him feel much more like falling than he did before. He became more and more dizzy. He thought the ladder swayed to and fro like trees bent by the storm. He thought the house against which the ladder leaned, and all the houses in the street, were working and reeling, like ships on the sea.

All at once he heard another voice, loud, cheery and full of courage, from the roof of the house above him, "Boy, look up." He did look up. Anybody would, hearing such a hearty voice as that. "All right now, come on." He was no longer giddy. He began to climb again, and soon he reached the hand of the kind and sensible carpenter on the roof, whose cheery word had ssved him from being dashed, broken and bleeding, upon the pavement of the street. That boy became a man of genius and culture. His written thoughts went all over this land and stirred strong emotions in thousands of hearts. But to the day of his death, he never ceased to ascribe the preservation of his life and the accomplishment of all that he did in the world to the timely and encouraging words of the carpenter on the roof—"Look up,"—"all right now, come on."

There is many a poor boy, climbing the steep ladder of life, high enough up already to make it fatal to fall, and yet far from reaching a place of rest. He is weary, and getting discouraged. He hears many say, "He will never make anything,"—"He will never succeed,"—"He will certainly fall." And those cruel words make him feel as if there were no use in trying; he might as well let go, and fall at once, if fall he must.

And yet that poor bewildered boy only wants to hear somebody, from among those above him, say, with a kindly, cheery voice, "Look up." He only wants to see somebody above him, bending down to take him by the hand, and he will climb till he reaches the heights of heaven. It is a very easy thing to say to such a poor, struggling child, "Look up;" a very easy thing to stoop down and give him a hand. But those words of hope may save a soul from death; that helping hand may lift a weary child of earth to the battlements of heaven.

And let no one think he has no influence worth using in the world, no power to do even infinite and everlasting good, so long as he can say to the tried and tempted, to the discouraged and heart-broken, "Look up." This is the cheering word which sounds through all the revelations of God to man—"Look up!" "Heaven is above you, the pit is beneath. It is safe to climb; it is destruction to stop and look back." O, ye halting and giddy climbers upon the steep ladder of life, look up, and you will see that all above you is calm and steady, when the earth reels and trembles beneath. Look up, and keep climbing, and you will soon see a divine hand reaching over the battlements of heaven to take yours and help you in.—Am. Presb.

HEALING SLIGHTLY.

ONE of the growing characteristics of the day, is an unwillingness to be put upon inquiry into the propriety of the opinions we hold, or the conduct we maintain; and another characteristic consequent on this one, is the timidity in reproving, or the disposition to extenuate or explain away sins widely prevalent and deeply intrenched. The moral deterioration of public sentiment—the debauch of what we may term the public conscience, which is thus denoted, bodes incalculable evil.

It is impossible for those who are set for the defence of the Gospel to stand against the tide, and maintain their own position on the rock, unless they oppose themselves firmly and distinctly to whatsoever warreth against the truth. Placed as they are to give direction and type to religious thought, any indecision or apparent indifference on their part will serve as positive impetus to that which is evil. The morbid sensibility which repels the application of truth to the conscience is not to be healed by wrapping the sword of the Spirit so as to prevent its piercing to the quick, to discern the thoughts and intents of the heart. The ministry must not deal falsely, nor yield compliance from fear of giving offence by faithfulness and directness of testimony. Neither can the public mind be reclaimed, and the old paths restored without plainness and frankness. It would be hard to produce the conviction that things were much at fault by using pointless speech. To withhold or modify testimony lest it give personal offence, is to revolutionize the whole character of the ministry as commissioned to speak in Christ's stead. To "cry aloud and spare not," to practise the surgery of the word, is often the only safe method of treating the case. "Boldness to speak of the word," will much more powerfully commend the truth, by manifesting its authority to the conscience, and thus forestall the narrow, selfish view which rejects the truth as a personal offence. Let the people be instructed in the importance of coming to the light, that their deeds may be made manifest whether they are wrought in God. A properly enlightened conscience will move the Christian to confession, and lead to brokenness of heart, rather than to affront and resentment.—Selected.

Poetry.

THY WORD IS TRUTH.

FATHER of all! we seek thy face
  In this dark world of strife;
Thy word is our safe resting place,
  Our lamp, our guide, our life,

False lights are gleaming on our path,
  And mingle with thy ray,
Obscuring thy pure light of "Truth"
  To dazzle us astray.

But yet thy simple truth is clear,
  In honest language clad:
Love, Mercy, Justice, all appear,
  And mark, and doom the bad.

Unmixed its precepts all are good,
  And shed a blameless ray;
To life and death it points each road,
  And bids us choose our way.

Hath God decreed for sinners "Death?"
  And can they "never die?"
He saith, like brutes they yield their breath,
  And perish where they lie.

Is sin eternal! Hast thou said
  That sinners shall not cease?
Nor "be consumed?" but on their head
  Shall crimes and woes increase?

Or hast thou said, in "spirits'" sphere,
  Of Fancy's wide domain,
Their leopard spots of sin they clear
  From every putrid stain?

No! God saith, "death" their doom shall be:
  O let his word be true:
He saith, "the wicked shall not be,"
  But "melt" before his view.

Then let not weak and erring man
  Presume to speak for God,
And change—and chain—by creed or plan
  "Death's" import to their nod.

Great Father! help, with steady gaze,
  Thy word to keep in view;
And let no fancy flashing blaze
  Allure to hopes untrue.

A LITTLE GIRL'S LETTER.

CAMPTON, IOWA, March 31, 1869.

DEAR MR. STORRS: Do you ever receive any letters from children? I am a little girl, eight years old. My father's name is LaFayette Norris. Enclosed please find some verses, written by me, and composed by Mrs. Adelia A. Bugbee, the woman whom I was named after. I declaimed these verses at our Sabbath school, last Sabbath, and Pa declaimed them at a spelling school last winter. Will you please publish these verses in the HERALD OF LIFE? Perhaps some other little reader of the HERALD OF LIFE would like to declaim them in their Sabbath School. My Pa would like to see them published in one of your Campaign Documents.

I went to a little child's funeral, not long ago, and the preacher said the child was alive and gone to heaven. But I don't believe that, for I saw the dead baby in its coffin; and besides, my Bible says the dead know not anything. Nearly everybody around here believes that the dead know more than we do who are alive, but I don't think so, for the dead cannot stir or speak, and there don't seem to be any life in them. These people say that the Bible says that dead people go to heaven when they die, but I don't think it does; for I can't find any place in my Bible that says anything about dead people going to heaven. But I have found where it says the dead know not anything, and the dead praise not the Lord. My Bible tells about the death and burial of good men, but it never says anything about their going to heaven at death. But it tells about some dead people being raised to life again and living here on the earth, just as they did before they died. It also tells about our Saviour being raised to life again after he had been dead three days, and after forty days going away to heaven. It also tells about a day coming in which all good people will be raised to life, never more to die, but to live forever on the earth. I am going to try to be a good girl, so I can be raised to eternal life with all the good people.

TOM'S LESSON.

BY MRS. M. O. JOHNSON.

"Go and get it! Go and get it, I say!"

Poor little Dash crept close to his young master's feet, looking up in his face with earnest, pleading eyes, as if he would say,

"Please, please, don't! I cannot do what you want."

Tom was trying to make Dash swim after a stick, which he had just thrown into the river. Now, Dash was not a water-dog, having no more love for it than a cat, and foolish Tom was bent on making him one! He kicked the poor little animal away and repeated his order; then, angry that it was not obeyed, seized him and threw him into the water. The dog was sorely frightened, but by hard struggling reached the bank, and crawled to his master's feet with a pitiful whine, wet, panting, trembling. The cruel boy caught him up with rough words, and was just going to throw him in again, when a pair of strong arms seized him and a man's voice said:

It was Tom's turn to be frightened. He turned pale, trembled and caught his breath, as the stranger lifted him in his stout arms as easily as he had poor Dash; he began to beg.

"Oh sir, pray, pray don't! I cannot swim, indeed I cannot! Oh don't throw me into the water! I will never, never do so again."

The man paused, but did not let go his hold.

"Neither can your dog swim," said he; "but you meant to make him do it, just to amuse yourself. Why can I not make you do it to amuse me? I am as much larger and stronger than you as you are larger and stronger than that poor, panting, trembling dog."

Tom still begged and promised, and the stranger at last released him, saying,

"Now, my boy, let me give you a kind word of advice. Never treat another, whether human being or dumb animal, as you would not like to be treated yourself. Never try to make anybody or anything do what God, when he created it, did not make it to do, or to be what he did not mean it to be. If you keep these rules, you will be a better, wiser, happier boy. Good-by."

THE LITERAL FULFILMENT OF PROPHECY.

BY ELD. J. B. COOK.

THE articles lately published on this general topic have interested and delighted me.

The last as to its application to Israel,—in his dispersion through the seven times, 2,300 days; or "times of the Gentiles—fulfilled"—is, so far, "as true as the Book." The word so reads: "Thus it is written, and thus it must be."

Yet allow me to note the Divine testimony as to the future gathering of Israel: especially touching its relation to the second coming and kingdom of Christ.

While some Scriptures assert Christ's coming to them in their land; there are others which clearly teach this coming prior and preparatory to their return. It is like God's appearance to Moses in Midian—to endow him for his Mission. Then His more public manifestation to all Israel at the Red Sea. Here, God delivers his people from Egypt, and destroys their (then) Gentile foes. The first stage was preparatory; the last was, however, the more open, glorious and triumphant. But both were essential to the fulfilment of the foregoing prophecy.

Thus, "the battle of the Great Day," Rev. xvi., 13–16; Zech. xiv., Hag. ii., are as antitype of the Lord's coming at the Red Sea. But they follow, in each instance, a prior and preparatory event.

"The Great Battle" comes in the progress of "the seven vials"—the time of wrath—the judgment of God on the Gentiles. See Rev. xi., 15–18; xv., 1–4; xv., 5; xvi., 1–18.

Here, the seventh Angel sounds. The sign in heaven, great and marvellous, appears. The Temple of the Tabernacle in heaven opens. Amen.

These are dispensational events; though incipient and introductory to action of the seven angels pouring the seven vials of God's wrath on our Babylonish world.

Note: There is this analogy asserted at least FIVE times in the prophecy: Isa. x., 24; xi., 12–16; xliii., 11–12; Micah vii., 15–20; etc. Hence, this analogy is not left to inference. It is a part and parcel of the Book of Prophecy.

By consequence, we must come first to the incipient, opening event; and then the plagues follow in their revealed order on to the gathering of the nations, after Israel, and their overthrow like Pharaoh and his hosts in the Red Sea.

Again: "The Lord will set his hand the second time to recover the remnant of his people. He shall set up an ensign—gather the outcasts of Israel and the dispersed of Judah—like as it was to Israel, in the day he came out of the land of Egypt." Isa. xi., 11–16. This asserts the truth precisely. It is easy of apprehension.

Our minds often take too narrow a range. We need to see that God now, through this age, acts in grace by the Gospel, "till the times of the Gentiles (are) fulfilled." Then, "the time of wrath—of judgment—follows. But it opens "in a moment"—an atom of time—"at the last—the seventh—trumpet." 1 Cor. xv., 50; Rev. xi., 15. "The plagues—the judgments"—follow in consecutive course, as did the judgments of God on Egypt.

"The sign in heaven" synchronizes with "the seventh trumpet" and the opening of the heavenly Tabernacle. Which events open to the grand scenes of the second Advent, during which he will crush kings. Ps. cx., 5; Rev. xvii., 14, in the Great Battle, and set up his throne in Zion, over "the house of Jacob." Luke i., 33.

The thoughts on Psa. cx., by Br. Cadwell, are refreshing, precise, and comprehensive. His mind has compassed that loftiest of scripture themes, and his hand has drawn out its salient points in a masterly manner—in my humble judgment.

TRUTH REVEALED:

MATT. XVII.

IN Matth. xvii., 24–27, the Revised New Testament, published by the American Bible Union, brings to light interesting and coincident truth.

Verse 24. "The half-shekel," twice, the Greek words being the same in both places; for "tribute money," and "tribute," of the Common Version. And "the half-shekel" is explained at the foot of the page, by referring to Exodus xxx., 13, 15. "The half-shekel" also implies a customary, or yearly offering. "Tribute money" and "tribute" would naturally remind many readers of the Bible of the question in Matth. xxii., 17, "Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?" and would lead them to suppose a "tribute" or tax, for the Roman government was meant. Whereas "the half-shekel" is intended, which every Israelite was originally commanded to give as atonement money when the census was taken, and this money was devoted to the service of the tabernacle. See Exo. xxx., 12–16. In the time of Nehemiah, the people agreed to pay one third of a shekel yearly "for the service of the house of their God." Neh. x., 32. See also 2 Chron. xxiv., 6–10. And in the apostolic age, the Jewish historian Josephus speaks of "that half-shekel which every one, by the custom of our country, offers to God;" "a half-shekel every year . . . as they were previously paying to the temple in Jerusalem." Jos. Antiquities xviii., 9, 1; Jewish Wars vii., 6, 6.

Verse 25. "Jesus anticipated him," that is, spoke first; for "prevented him," which would now be understood as meaning "hindered him," and would consequently give an erroneous and confused idea. "Sons," for children in verse 26, "Then are the sons free." By the original law, and the consequent Jewish custom, every male Israelite was required to give "a half-shekel"—the rich no more than that, and the poor no less—for the service of the tabernacle, God's house. According to the custom of "the kings of the earth," then Jesus, as the son of the Great King, could claim exemption from this tax for the support of his Father's house. Hence the aptness and force of the conclusion to which he comes: "Then are the sons free."

Verse 27. "A shekel;" for the loose and indefinite translation, "piece of money." As the law and the custom founded on it, required every male Israelite of twenty years old and upward to give "a half-shekel," "a shekel" would be the exact amount to be given for Jesus and Peter, "a half-shekel" for each. So beautifully does one part of God's Word harmonize with every kindred part, when, by a full and correct translation, its divine light is allowed to shine forth in its clearness and purity! And yet this instance of its admirable harmony and beauty is entirely concealed in the Common Version.

We may also notice with what strict fidelity our Lord conformed, both in heart and in outward act, to every requirement of duty. "Thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness," as our perfect Saviour and Exemplar. (Matth. iii., 15.)

AQUÆDES.

LEGEND OF ST. THOMAS.

LONG after the Master had left his disciples to carry on the work he had begun, Thomas, from time to time, was sorely perplexed with doubt. And once, in a season of great distress, he travelled all the way to Rome to talk with Paul.

"Paul," he said, "put away your parchments and your inkhorn, I want to ask you a very serious question."

So Paul put away his writing and said, "Well, Thomas, what is it?"

"Paul, I want to ask you, do you think the Lord is risen indeed?"

"O, Thomas, Thomas, why are you yielding to your old doubts again? You have better means of knowing whether the Lord is risen than I have. Besides, I have no time to discuss these things with you; I am busy writing to the churches: the time of my departure is at hand."

"Ah," said Thomas, turning away, "that is just like Paul, he has no sympathy with such temptations as mine. I'll go and see Peter." So he travelled far to the east, and found Peter with sandals bound on and staff in hand, just starting on a missionary journey.

"Sit down, Peter," he said, "I've come to ask you a very important question touching the ministry of the apostleship."

"Well," said Peter, putting aside his staff, "what is it, Thomas?"

"Peter, is the Lord risen indeed?"

"O, Thomas, you're at your old ways again. Go with me and help to preach among the heathen the unsearchable riches of Christ."

"No," said Thomas, "I cannot do that;" and as he went sadly away he said, "I'll go and talk with John about it; he was always kind and sympathizing." So he went to Ephesus, and found John with a crowd of little children around him, and he was telling them stories of the life of Christ. "Send away these children, John, I want to talk with you about the Master." So he dismissed the children.

"John, do you think the Lord is risen indeed?"

"What, Thomas, have I sent away these dear little ones to listen to a foolish question like that? Go to work and then you will have no time for such doubts. I must bring the children back again. I have no time to waste with you."

"Alas! alas!" cried Thomas, "John is as bad as the rest. I'll go to Jerusalem and hear what the women have to say." So he went to Jerusalem, and to the house of Mary. Here he found Dorcas, and many others gathered, who were busy making garments for the poor.

"Sisters," he said, "I have come to talk to you about him whom we all love."

"That's right," said they, "our needles will fly all the faster, while you speak to us of him."

"Sisters, I want to ask you is the Lord risen indeed?"

"Thomas, Thomas, do you think we should have been content to labor all these years if the Lord were not risen? O, if you were but working for Jesus you would have no doubt." And Thomas saw at length that the secret of the strong faith alike of brethren and sisters was this, that all were working, and he too gathered a group of children around him, and he found that as he told them of Jesus his doubts all fled away, and he was filled with joy in the Lord.—Selected by L. THE POWER OF FORGIVENESS.

A SOLDIER, whose regiment lay in a garrison town in England, was about to be brought before his commanding officer for some offence. He was an old offender, and had been often punished. "Here he is again," said the officer on his name being mentioned; "every thing—flogging, disgrace, imprisonment—has been tried upon him." Whereupon the Sergeant stepped forward, and apologizing for the liberty he took, said,

"There is one thing which has never been done with him yet, sir."

"What it that?" was the inquiry.

"Well, sir," said the Sergeant, "he has never been forgiven."

"Forgiven!" said the Colonel, surprised at the suggestion.

He reflected for a few moments, ordered the culprit to be brought in, and asked him what he had to say to the charge.

"Nothing, sir," was the reply; "only I am sorry for what I have done."

Turning a kind and pitiful look on the man, who expected nothing else than that his punishment would be increased with the repetition of his offence, the Colonel addressed him, saying, "Well, we have resolved to forgive you!"

The soldier was struck dumb with astonishment; the tears started in his eyes, and he wept like a child. He was humbled to the dust; he thanked his officer and retired—to the old refractory, incorrigible man? No; he was another man from that day forward. He who tells the story had him for years under his eye, and a better contented man never wore the Queen's colors. In him kindness bent one whom harshness could not break; he was conquered by mercy, and, forgiven, ever afterward feared to offend.—Selected.

WHAT ARE WE COMING TO?

GENERAL H. CARVER, the father of the pacific Railroad, as he offers to prove, writes to an Omaha paper of his future intentions:

"I mean to go right on, propose, and establish, if I live, as nearly as possible, an air-line route between the Atlantic and Pacific oceans (on the surface of which float nine tenths of all the commerce of the world) for a railroad, with a track eight or ten feet wide. The passengers-cars on this road will be travelling hotels, whereas Pullman's cars are only substitutes, and I first described them in a pamphlet written and published at Washington, twenty-one years ago last January. These passengers-cars will be very large and splendid, accommodating from three to four and even five hundred passengers, with all the comforts of any hotel of this or any other country. I will say to the public, call this Utopian, vain, visionary, if you please. My first plan of the present Pacific Railroad was called so, and laughed at four or five years after I had begun to recommend it, write articles for it, and in all ways to labor hard in its favor. Further, I mean, if I live, when the road is completed and all things in order, to travel from the city of San Francisco to the city of New York inside of forty-eight hours. We have got a model car in New Jersey, built of cedar, with each wheel running by itself, like a wheelbarrow, and a small engine, about as large as a barrel, in the bow of the car, and have run it at the rate of over two miles a minute with perfect safety and ease."

MAGNESIUM LIGHT.

LATE scientific intelligence from England expresses the belief that magnesium, by new processes of manufacture about to be introduced, will be brought down to a shilling an ounce, retail. At this price its use in lamps, in the shape of ribbon of the thickness of heavy paper and a tenth of an inch wide, will be decidedly economical. The supply of magnesium ores and other compounds is unlimited. Dolomite, one of the commonest rocks in the Southern States, and extending in a vast range through New Jersey, New York, Western Massachusetts and Vermont into Canada, contains 45.65 parts of carbonate of magnesia and 54.35 of carbonate of lime.

From the magnesium carbonate the chloride of magnesium is prepared, and from that the metal is eliminated; or the chloride of magnesium can be obtained direct from sea-water, and then reduced to metal by the usual process. It is estimated that a ton of sea water contains two pounds of the metal. The sources of supply are thus shown to abound all about us; and the only question involved in the use of the metal for illuminating purposes is that of cost, and that of question, as we learn, is on the point of being satisfactorily answered.

As our readers may not understand the workings of the magnesium light, we will explain that the metal, in the form of a thin ribbon, weighing but little more, for its bulk, than a delicate wood shaving or a strip of writing paper, is coiled about a drum, and fed by simple clockwork into the flame of a small alcohol lamp. The heat of the flame ignites the metal, and it burns slowly and regularly with the purest imaginable white light equal to seventy-four stearine candles and upward, according to the size of the ribbon. As it has the essential characteristic (the actinic power) of the solar says, photographs are easily taken by it. It is, in fact, an imitation of daylight, and therefore specially adapted to the eyes; whereas, the ordinary gas is known to be highly injurious to those organs.

So soon as magnesium can be furnished cheaply enough, Yankee ingenuity may be trusted to invent some still cheaper apparatus for burning it up. It takes but little faith to look with confidence to the introduction of the magnesium lights, (unless a better one can be produced,) as a common substitute for gas. That a man is not rash who would predict that at some day, perhaps not far off, gas will become as obsolete as rush-lights now are in civilized communities.—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

"LEFT OVER."

UNTO what? "To the coming of the Lord." Such is the literal rendering in 1 Thess. iv., 15. Who are those "left over?" "We, the living;" i. e., somebody will live to see him come. Somebody will never fall asleep—never taste of death. Somebody will escape death-bed, shroud, coffin, and the grave. Somebody will never be mourned for, or their names be carved on the marble tomb. Somebody will experience that last mysterious rapture into the air. Somebody will clasp angel hands, and out from living homes, not open graves, will be caught up, up, to join the celestial escort, and see the King of kings. Lost to the world—lost in the glorified bands, lost in the ambrosial, sun-bright sky, lost heavenward. Who ever heard of such a thing? O yes: one of old went up in the cherubic chariots sky-ward, and men on earth saw him no more—type of the living left over unto his epiphany. And the same chariots are waiting to carry up the Bride to the Bridegroom. O ye weary, and worn, and sad, cheer up. Ye sick and suffering and bruised, be of good comfort. Ye who wrestle in agony with the "lost archangel," and whose wrath would sift, and toss, and shake you as wheat, "hold in, hold out, hold on," a little while, and the victory is yours forever. A few more sighs, struggles, tears, temptations, trials, with "stormy waiting," and then if "left over," there cometh the unspeakable glory and the everlasting rest. I beseech you not to cease to WATCH.

CHRISTIAN CHEERFULNESS.

ALLUDING to the impressions that many get that religion is nothing if not long-faced, "The United Presbyterian" remarks:

Let men be taught to know there is as much religion in the good, robust rejoicing, enthusiastic singing of God's praise, as in the sedate and doleful style that is usually styled the most devotional. Let them know that the earnest prayer need not be a drawling jeremiad. Let them feel that good gospel preaching may be in a sprightly delivery of pleasant truths, more than in a whining recitation of inanities. Let them believe that Christianity is a live thing—that it is in sympathy with the active, rejoicing spirit of our humanity—and it will be better commended to their acceptance.

Seriousness ought always to characterize the Christian. But seriousness does not consist in sullenness, moroseness, or even in the sobriety that drives away smiles and the taste for rational pleasures. He is most serious who best brings an earnest, healthy, rejoicing nature to the performance of his duty. Men are most beautifully serious when truthful smiles are playing on their lips, and when their whole countenances are lighted up with a benignant joy.

It ought, therefore, to be the effort of professing Christians to pass through the world so happily as to light it up and fill it with joy. They ought to sing in the midst of judgments, and to sing loudly and cheerily and constantly amid their marvellous benefits. We pass to a kingdom, out of sadness and sorrow, where there will be no sorrow nor sighing. Passing to that place, let us cultivate the spirit that is to distinguish us when we arrive there, and show that we do really begin our heaven on the earth.

"GIFT OF THE GAB."

SIR ROBERT PEEL on more than one occasion invited Mr. Stephenson to Drayton. He refused at first, from indisposition, to "mix in fine company," but ultimately went. On one occasion an animated discussion took place between himself and Dr. Buckland, on one of his favorite theories as to the formation of coal. But the result was that Dr. Buckland, a much greater master of tongue-fence than Stephenson, completely silenced him. Next morning before breakfast, when he was walking in the grounds, deeply pondering, Sir William Follet came up and asked him what he was thinking about.

"Why, Sir William, I am thinking over that argument I had with Buckland last night. I know I am right, and that, if I had only the command of words which he has, I'd have beaten him."

"Let me know all about it," said Sir William, "and I'll see what I can do for you."

The two sat down in an arbor, when the astute lawyer made himself thoroughly acquainted with the points of the case, entering into it with all the zeal of an advocate about to plead the dearest interests of his client. After he had mastered the subject, Sir William rose up, rubbing his hands with glee. "Now I am ready for him."

Sir Robert Peel was made acquainted with the plot, and adroitly introduced the subject of the controversy after dinner. The result was, that in the argument that followed, the man of science was overcome by the man of law, and Sir William Follet had at all points the mastery over Dr. Buckland.

"What do you say, Mr. Stephenson?" asked Sir Robert, laughing.

"Why," said he, "I will only say this: that of all powers above and under the earth, there seems to me to be no power so great as the gift of gab."—Men Who Have Risen.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER; OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

JOHN V., 28, 29, EXPLAINED AT LAST.

BY A BAPTIST MINISTER.

"Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good, unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation."

BEFORE I consider this passage, which apparently so conflicts with the Life views, let me give a literal translation of its original, which I shall have occasion to use, and which I will justify as I proceed. The translation is as follows:

"Wonder not at this: that a time comes, in which all those among the tombs shall hear His voice, and shall come forth; those producing good things unto a resurrection of life, but those doing evil things unto a resurrection of condemnation."

To the progress of one like myself, who has long been pondering the Doctrine of Life only in Christ, a lucid exposition of the above passage removes a great obstacle. For some time I have been constrained to acknowledge, "that the wages of sin is death." Rom. vi., 23, not three deaths, spiritual, temporal, and "the death that never dies," nor two deaths, the first and second; but simply death. The Psalmist says, of "those who trust in their wealth," "Nevertheless man being in honor abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish." "Like sheep they are laid in the grave: death shall feed on them." "He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light." "Man that is in honor and understandeth not is like the beasts that perish." Psa. 49. Isaiah says, of certain wicked souls, "They are dead; they shall not live: they are deceased; they shall not rise." Isa. xxvi., 14. Jeremiah, from the mouth of God, says of the Babylonians, "In their heat I will make their feasts; and I will make them drunken, that they may rejoice, and sleep a perpetual sleep, and not awake, saith the Lord," Jer. li., 39. Peter says, of "them that walk in the flesh," "These as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. ii., 12. Paul suffered all his hardships, "if by any means he might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Phil. iii., 11. But though I have felt the force of all these and a host of parallel passages, yet the text under consideration has appeared to stand up in fearful opposition. I have seen it expounded many times, but no exegesis has ever satisfied me; and the Bible has seemed like "a house divided against itself," Jesus has been "a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence to me, even to me who stumbled at the word." But the same blessed Saviour, who bids us "search the Scriptures," also says, "Seek and ye shall find," I have sought, and I have found.

1. In rending in twain the veil, which has so long hung over this glorious passage, let me first just notice the "HOUR, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear His voice and shall come forth." The original word for "hour," in the text, is "hora;" and it means "any limited time or period." How it is to the disadvantage of those, who believe that this text refers to the last day, that this time is represented as coming in the present tense. The present indefinite is used. Let us use the present definite which is better. "Wonder not at this:" says the Greek original. "Wonder not at" what? Why, that a time comes, in which all those among the tombs shall hear His voice and shall come forth. Now what this "hearing His voice" and "coming forth" is, I will presently show. And meantime, I do not believe that Jesus, when He was here, preached one thing in one place and another in another. John the Baptist came preaching, "Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Matt. iii., 12. After his temptation, "Jesus began to preach and to say, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Matt. iv., 17. He also said, "The hour (hora, time) cometh and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth; for the Father seeketh such to worship Him." John iv., 23. And again, in our context, "The (hora, time) is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear shall live." John v., 25. All these passages have an important bearing on the point in question.

2. Next, what is intended by this "all that are in the graves?" The original word for "graves" here is not "hades," the state of the dead, but "mnemeion." It signifies a memorial, or monument, and is applied to the Eastern tombs, on account of the rich, monument-like fashion, in which the Jews constructed these sepulchres. Hence, the words of our Saviour, "Woe unto you, Scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye are like unto whited sepulchres, which indeed appear beautiful outward, but are within full of dead men's bones and all corruption." Matt. xxiii., 27. Bishop Lowth, in his translation of Isaiah, Vol. II., p. 121, says, in reference to these tombs, "You are to form to yourself an idea of an immense subterraneous vault, a vast gloomy cavern, all round the sides of which there are cells to receive the dead bodies; here the deceased monarchs lie, in a distinguished sort of state, suitable to their former rank, each on his own couch, with his arms beside him, his sword at his head, and the bodies of his chiefs and companions round about him." This throws light on the passage in Ezekel, "And they shall not lie with the mighty, that are fallen of the uncircumcised, which are gone down to sheol with their weapons of war; and they have laid their swords under their heads, but their iniquities shall be upon their bones, though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living. Ezek. xxxii., 27. Horne says, "The Jews had their sepulchres in gardens, in fields, and in the sides of mountains. The graves in which they chose to be deposited, were commonly in solitary and unfrequented places. Thus we read that the demoniac of Gadara wore no clothes, and abode not in any house; but had his dwelling among the tombs, (Mark v., 2, 3, 5. Luke viii., 27), delighting in these gloomy and melancholy recesses, as most friendly and congenial to the wretched state of his mind. Josephus also states, that these sepulchres were the haunts and lurking places of those numerous and desperate bands of robbers, with which Judea was at that time infested. And a recent traveller, whose researches have thrown much light on the sacred writings, informs us, that these burying grounds frequently afford shelter to the weary traveller, when overtaken by night; and that the recesses are likewise a hiding place for thieves and murderers, who sally forth from them to commit their nocturnal depredations," Horne's Intro., Vol. III. p. 500, 501. Now are not all mankind, with the sentence of death upon them, only not executed, aptly illustrated, in our text, as being among the tombs? Some may be disposed to find fault because I have rendered the phrase "en tois mnemeiois"—"among the tombs;" but if our King James translators have a right to render the same phrase "among the tombs" in Mark v., 3, and they have, then I have the same right in this passage. This rendering is strictly in accordance with grammars and lexicons, and in beautiful harmony with this context and other scriptures. The demoniac of Gadara, whom Christ met, (Mark v., 15; Luke viii., 27.) had his dwelling "in the tombs;" (en tois mnemasin the primitive of mnemeion, which means the same); but no one supposes that he necessarily lived within the tombs but among them. But I will not be strenuous. Let "en tois mnemeiois" mean "in the tombs," or even "in the graves" as our English version renders it, and yet this exposition holds good; for, "by the offence of one, judgment came upon all men to condemnation; and the whole unredeemed human race are figuratively represented, in the Scriptures, as being "among the tombs," in the sepulchres, or, if it please better, "in the graves." We read that "through the tender mercy of our God, the dayspring from on high hath visited us, to give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death." Luke i., 78, 79. Is not this synonymous with being "among the tombs?" This state of death was long ago understood by the Prophets. "The people that walked in darkness have seen a great light; and they that dwell in the land of the shadow of death, upon them hath the light shined." Isa. ix., 2. Again, "to open the blind eyes, to bring out the prisoners from the prison, and them that sit in darkness out of the prison house." Isa. xlii., 7. Is not this the same as being "in the graves?" Yes, and so Jesus regarded it; for he said, "The people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death, light has sprung up." Matt. iv., 16. Oh! Is not this sin cursed race here represented, as in sheol or hades, the very region of corruption and shades of death? The Jews always buried the dead, even their enemies; and regarded it as one of the greatest of calamities and dishonors that could befall a person, not to be buried. When therefore their dead were spoken of, it was always understood that they were buried. Now the whole human race are declared in Scripture to be dead. Jesus said, "Let the dead bury their dead," Matt. viii., 22. All through the Bible, this principle must be recognized. And as this is so, whenever this dead race is spoken of, they are understood to be buried. They are understood to be "among the tombs," in the sepulchres, or "in the graves." Their doom is forever sealed, unless raised to life in Jesus.

3. Again, the MANNER in which "all that are in the graves shall hear His voice and shall come forth." How shall they come forth? Ans. "They that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." Or, which is better, "those producing good things, unto a resurrection of life; but those doing evil things, unto a resurrection of condemnation." Two classes are mentioned in the text, and a different verb, in the original, expresses the actions of each class. The verb which expresses the actions of "those that have done good" is "poieo," which signifies the production of an effect; while "pratto," the verb used for those that have done evil, means the management of business, or the performance of an act. Hence there is a distinction, and it should be expressed in the translation. I take the phrase "producing good things," to mean the same as "Bring forth fruits meet for repentance," (Matt. iii., 8; Luke iii., 8), where the same word is used. The phrase "doing evil things," speaks for itself. It expresses the sinner's occupation.

4. Fourthly, WHOSE voice shall "all that are in their graves hear?" The voice of Jesus, of course. But what is Jesus? "He is the first fruits of them that slept." "Christ is the first fruits." 1 Cor. xv., 20, 23. "He is the first that should rise from the dead." Acts xxvi., 23, "He is the head of the body, the church, who is the beginning, the first-born from the dead," Col. i., 18. "He is the RESURRECTION and the life," John xi., 25. Now mark. If Jesus is the RESURRECTION, and if all that are in the graves, (the dead human race), shall hear his voice, then they must hear the voice of the resurrection. Further, if Jesus is the resurrection, and if all that are in the graves shall hear His voice and shall come forth, then they must "come forth unto the resurrection." This is the key which unlocks the mystery.

5. Fifthly, THE MYSTERY SOLVED. JESUS is the "RESURRECTION." And all those "in the region and shadow of death," who hear His voice, hear the "resurrection's" voice; and those who hear His voice and come forth unto Him, hear the "resurrection's" voice, and come forth unto the "resurrection;" "those producing good things unto the resurrection of life," for JESUS is life to them; "but those doing evil things unto the resurrection of condemnation," for JESUS is death to them. To those "who produce fruits meet for repentance," Christ is "the savor of life unto life;" but to those who do "evil things," He is "the savor of death unto death." 2 Cor. ii., 16. Is not this plain? JESUS himself is the "resurrection;" and when the dead human race hear His voice, they hear the "resurrection's" voice; and when they hear JESUS' voice and come forth unto him, they hear the "resurrection's" voice and come forth unto the "resurrection." And "those producing good things" come forth "unto the resurrection of life," for Jesus is "the SAVOR of life unto life" to them; but "those doing evil things" come forth "unto the resurrection of condemnation," for Jesus is "the savor of death unto death" to them. Turn to Luke ii., 34, where the same sentiment is expressed, "Behold, this child is set for the FALL and RISING again of many in Israel." The word "again" is not in the Greek, and the word rendered "rising" is "anastasin," the same word rendered "resurrection" in our text and elsewhere. The correct translation, then, is, "Behold, this child is set for the FALL and the RESURRECTION of many in Israel." And so to those who hear the gospel call and come forth "doing evil things," Christ is the "fall," the "stone of stumbling," the "savor of death unto death," the "resurrection of condemnation." But of those who come forth "producing good things," Christ is set for the "RESURRECTION." He is their "savor of life unto life."

I think that it will be readily acknowledged, that Jesus is the "resurrection of life" to those who hear His voice, and come unto Him "producing good things." Such ones hear His voice, and "come forth unto the resurrection of life." But how is Christ the "resurrection of condemnation," to all who come forth "doing evil things?" I think in the following manner: He is the "resurrection and the life," and the "LIFE is the LIGHT of men." John i., 4. They who hear His voice and come forth "doing evil things," come unto the "light." "And this is their condemnation: that light is come into the world, and that men come forth unto the light and resurrection, and yet love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil," John iii., 19. Or, when "those among the tombs" hear the "RESURRECTION'S" voice and come forth unto the "light," they must be raised in order to come forth; and if they reject the "light," then their resurrection, their being aroused from their dead state, is only unto their "condemnation." They are raised from the shades of death, come forth unto JESUS, the "resurrection," see Him, "believe not and are condemned already." Christ is "set for their FALL." He is the "SAVOR of death unto death" to them. Truly, do they not "come forth unto the resurrection of condemnation?"

6. Sixthly, HARMONY. This exposition harmonizes beautifully with the whole Scripture view of Life only in Christ. Look at our context, verse 24. "He that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me hath everlasting life; and shall not come into (eis, unto) condemnation, but is passed from death unto life." To such an one, Jesus, who is the resurrection, will not be "the savor of death unto death." Such an one shall not come unto Jesus, "the resurrection of condemnation," but unto Jesus, "the resurrection of life:" "he is passed from death unto life." On the other hand, "If I had not come and spoken unto them they had not had sin; but now they have no cloak for their sin." "If I had not done among them the works which none other man did they had not had sin." John xv., 22, 24.

The fallen races, though dead in sin, are yet alive in their own imagination, "vainly puffed up by their fleshy minds." To such Christ comes as a kind of a commandment, and speaks to them; and "when the commandment comes, sin revives and they die" and the resurrection, "which was ordained to life, they find to be unto death." Rom. vii., 9, 10. Jesus, the resurrection, is condemnation to them. Again, consider verse 25 of our context. "The hour (hora, time) is coming and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God; and they that hear (none others) shall live." They are "in the region of darkness and shadow of death," the gospel call shall awake them from their lethargy, (Rom. xiii., 11; Eph. v., 14) and they that have an ear (an inclination) to hear the voice of the Son of God (believing that He is the Son of God) shall live. Jesus, the resurrection, is a "savor of life unto life to them." So, on the other hand, we can understand why the "Woe" is pronounced upon Beth saida, Chorazin, and Capernaum, (Matth. xi., 20; Luke x., 13–15,) and why "the men of Nineveh shall rise in judgment with this generation and shall condemn it." Matth. xii., 41; Luke xi., 31, 32. As Paul "had not known sin except the law had said "Thou shalt not covet," (Rom. vii., 7,) so Chorazin, Capernaum, and Bethsaida, and also "this generation" had not known their darkness and death unless the light had come into the world. Jesus is the "savor of death unto death" to them. They hear His voice, and come forth "doing evil things;" but it is only "unto the resurrection of condemnation," for they come unto the light, which does but show them their darkness and mortality. To all those who hear the voice of the resurrection and come forth unto Him, Jesus is "the resurrection of life." "And ye will not come to me that ye might have life." John v., 40. "There is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved;" (Acts iv., 12,) and by not coming to me in faith, you make me "the resurrection of condemnation" to you. If you are starving, when a feast is set before you and you refuse to partake of it, it is the same to you as though no food had been provided. The repast is as nothing to you. Or, it is the same as starvation to you; and you make it so. O my impenitent friends! You are dead. Jesus, "the resurrection and the life," is set before you. But if you refuse to hear His voice, and will not come unto Him "producing good things," then it is the same with you as though no resurrection and life had been provided. Jesus is as nothing to you. Or, He is as death to you; and you make Him so. Oh! why will you come forth unto your resurrection and life, and make Him to be condemnation to you? "Him that cometh unto me I will in no wise cast out." John vi., 37. Yes! Jesus will never cast out into condemnation, those who come unto Him "producing fruits meet for repentance." He will be their resurrection and their life. "He is able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him." Heb. vii., 25. He will be their "savor of life unto life." But why multiply passages? There is not a life passage in the whole Bible, which is not in glorious harmony with the exegesis which I here give, of John v., 28, 29. The Bible is one glorious whole, like its great Author. Bless His name!

7. Finally, EXAMPLES. The first are Andrew and Peter. Like the rest of the depraved race, they dwelt "in the region of darkness and shadow of death." But they heard Jesus, voice saying, "Come and see;" (John i., 39,) and they obeyed, and came forth unto "the resurrection and the life;" for they come "producing good things." They both breathed their last in the service of the resurrection. On the other hand, we have the example of the young man. Matth. xix., 16–22. He was dead in sin; but he heard Jesus, voice, and came forth unto the resurrection saying, "Good master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?" This was "producing good things;" and thus he continued to do until Jesus told him, "Go and sell that thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me. But when the young man heard that saying he went away sorrowful; for he had great possessions." Through his choice, Jesus became "the resurrection of condemnation" unto him. The next example is Philip. John i., 43. Now Philip dwelt in a more corrupt place than "among the tombs." He was of Bethsaida, (verse 44,) one of the very cities against which Christ pronounced His woe, and worse in sinful corruption than the very sepulchres of the dead. Jesus said unto him, "Follow me." He heard His voice, came forth unto his resurrection "producing good things," and Jesus was "the savor of life unto life to him."

On the other hand, again, we have the example of Herod. Matth. xiv. He was living in sinful intercourse with his brother's wife. He was also living in a worse place than "among the tombs," for his court was more corrupt than the Eastern graves. He heard the resurrection's voice speaking through John, but refused to produce good fruits; and so Jesus was set for his fall, which was a most dreadful one, as history informs us. Herod came "forth unto the resurrection of condemnation." Finally, we have the demoniac of Gadara, Mark v. Now here is a literal exemplification of this exposition. "And there met Him out of the tombs, (met Jesus, the resurrection) a man with an unclean spirit, who had his dwelling among the tombs. (en tois mnemeiois), verses 1, 2. But when he saw Jesus (saw the resurrection) afar off, he ran and worshipped Him," (came forth unto the resurrection and worshipped Him, verse 6,) and cried with a loud voice, "What have I to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of the most high God?" He "brought forth fruits meet for repentance" unto his resurrection, and in so doing, he "came forth unto the resurrection of life;" for Jesus cast the legion out of him, and thenceforth became his life.

Now the thoughts which I have presented, are not only an exposition, but also they contain a great principle: the principle that "God is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe;" (1 Tim. vi., 10,) the Saviour of all men, in that He is "the savor of death unto death" to some, but of "life unto life" to others; "specially of those that believe," in that He is set, not for their fall but for their resurrection.

Henceforth let no one set this passage in array, against the non-living again of the wicked dead; for instead of opposing such a doctrine, it is one of its strongest supports. And strange it is, that to me, this text should be the very weight in the balance to bring down the scales in favor of "Life only in Christ." But God's ways are not as our ways; neither are His thoughts as our thoughts. Amen. SCAVENGER.

"CALAMITY OR PENALTY."

[The following article is from Br. S. COOPER, Windsor, Conn. He is one who did not get the HERALD of March 24, at the time of its issue, and hence had not seen our remarks on the above subject, which will explain what he says in his introduction. We thought we had said all that was necessary on the article spoken of; but Br. Cooper has spoken more fully on the subject, and we give place to his remarks.—EDITOR.]

BR. STORRS: When there appears in print an article evidently mistakingly written, with premises and conclusions wrong, we feel that something ought to be said to correct that error when the article has gone before the public and been commended to notice.

When an article under the above heading appeared in the "Crisis" of March 17th, from the pen of a beloved Br., we could but feel deeply anxious that something should be said through the press to show our Br. (and those who may have favored his illustrations and conclusions), their incorrectness. As I have seen nothing touching it in the HERALD, I would like to address the author through its columns in relation to the article.

Br., you say, "To the lost race of Adam the Adamic death is evidently a calamity or a penalty. In their natures they are wholly unlike. Calamity is a misfortune occurring casually, and involving no guilt in the parties concerned."

Br., do we not read, "Sin is the transgression of law?" "There is none that sinneth not:" "Death has passed upon all men, for that all have sinned:" "And all the world may come guilty before God." "For whosoever shall keep the whole law and offend in one point is guilty of all." "The soul that sinneth it shall die."

Br., did not Adam sin? Do not you and I belong "to the world?" Have we not "offended in one point?" Are we not members of a guilty party? If you admit it, how can you argue as you do, that the Adamic death, our dying and turning to dust, is but a mere "calamity," accident, or mishap, "incurring no guilt on the parties concerned?"

But we proceed no notice your supposed case as an argument or proof to the point. You say, "Suppose an individual to lose his property by fire, while he is indebted its entire value. His loss is a calamity. Suppose he again acquires property, his previous loss does not invalidate the claim of the law, which again takes it from him to pay its penalty." Stop a minute, Br. You have just said "penalty is the punishment annexed by law for the commission of crime." Do you mean to say, to be in debt is a crime? By your unscriptural and misapplied term you certainly do say it. But let me suppose he had lost his life with his property. Would the law have had any claim upon him, or upon his posterity, for his debt? It would not. Neither has the divine law any demand upon the dead sinners, for they have ceased to be. We may notice this point again.

You say, "He might suffer a score of calamities, and yet the penalty stands charged to his account. Should he never acquire property he could not pay the penalty, for nothing but property can pay it; and being already deprived of that by calamity the penalty remains unpaid." "The Adamic death is apparently" (not really), "a calamity to the human family, because the innocent as well as the guilty suffer it." (That the dying of the "human family" is a calamity, is far from my humble view of it.) "Both the innocent and the guilty may be victims of calamity, but only the guilty can justly suffer penalty." Br., you say, "The divine law, which the wicked are under, requires their lives to pay its penalty; nothing else will suffice; and as they have already lost that by calamity (accident or mishap), they cannot pay the penalty unless they are raised from the dead, and thus furnished with life for "that purpose."

Br., does God require of man that which he hath not, and is out of his power to give? You say he does, in that the law requires the life of the wicked; and that, you say, they have already lost. Very queer, indeed, that God, an all-wise being, should require something of a dead man (and that which he had already lost), to make satisfaction to himself, and in order that he (God), might take that something from the wicked, he exerts his Almighty power to reorganize and give them life that he might have the privilege of torturing them awhile, and taking away that which he had given them! "O, consistency!" Would not such be a glorious development of God's divine attribute of love?

Br., you have frequently used the phrase, "Adamic death." I would ask, is there any difference in the Adamic death state from that of any other death state? I will let you answer. You say, "Man was created from the dust of the ground, and animated by the breath of life. When the breath is taken away, death results; there is no intermediate position, consequently, no degrees in death. Countless ages add nothing to its awful gloom and silence." Very good. Then why try to make a distinction by another unscriptural term, "Adamic death," by the use of which and the supposed case of loss by fire, and the necessity of the man's gaining property again to pay his creditors, as nothing but property will pay it?

You argue that the wicked must lose their life, be raised from the dead, live again, that they may have life to pay the penalty of the divine law. Query: Will this latter life be any more the sinner's life than that which he possessed before dying? But let us compare the two cases and see if they are analogous; if not, then there is no weight in the supposed illustration. The man who lost by fire must first have life; when by his own effort he may have acquired that which he lost. The sinner cannot possibly acquire that which he loses by dying, i. e., life. The loss of property by fire does not necessarily impair the loser's physical or intellectual powers.

The wicked, having lost life by dying, turns to dust; his thoughts perish, and he is as though he had not been. The man who lost his property, after his loss may, by his industry, acquire much more than what he lost by fire.

The wicked, in that death state of "no degrees and awful silence" are totally deprived of all power to do, and are out of existence, they will "be no more."

The other, by his own effort, redeems himself from that power invested in the creditor, by law, which you call "penalty," and lives, perhaps "scores" of years, enjoying the protection of law—lives a Christian, falls asleep with an assurance that he will awake when Jesus comes. So I find nothing analogous or illustrative in our brother's supposed case, which has the least weight to prove the wicked dead will live again.

But to show a parallel case, I will suppose the man to have lost his life by fire, with his property, then the "penalty," according to my Br.'s use of it, would forever have come to an end. There is no law whatever, human or divine, that has any claim upon or requirement of the dead. God is not a God of the dead. The righteous sleep in Jesus. Their life is hid with Christ in God; and they that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. But the wicked dead "are like the beasts that perish." "They shall remain in the tomb." "The wrath of God abideth on them." "They shall never see life." "They shall remain in the congregation of the dead." The Scriptures, you quote, using the term "law," I think can be easily shown to have no bearing to the point in question; i. e., the re-living of the wicked who have died.

Quoting Rom. vi., 23, you say, "The wages of sin is death." "Wages is the price paid for service rendered; and as the infant has never rendered any service to sin, why should it be entitled to the wages?" The law of God (in the sense you use the word law), has nothing to do with infants; they are not under law in that sense. Again you talk of "rendering service to sin. Why talk of things that are not? No man ever "rendered service to sin," which, if they had done, sin is under obligation to reward with something availably good. But why strain out the gnat and swallow the camel? Why appear to ignore two important facts, viz., that sin entered the world, and death by sin, and that death has passed upon all? "The wages," the consequence of sin is mortality, dying, and death. But the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Were I to ask, To whom is the promise of eternal life given, and also the resurrection from the dead? you would answer, To believers. Were I to ask, What is the wages of sin? you would not say, dying, but death. If I ask, what is the state of death? you would answer—It is a state of "no degrees, in awful gloom and silence." Again, if I ask, "When do men enter that state? your answer is, "When the breath is taken away, death is the result." They then enter that state to which untold "ages can add nothing."

These answers you have given in your language quoted. I ask, Why appear to ignore the fact that men are dying mortals; and all, irrespective of character, must enter that death state? And the other fact, which appears to be unnoticed, is this, that God has made exceeding great and precious promises to all who will love, hearken, believe and obey him: that he, with special care and power, will keep them until the day of redemption, when he will bring them out from their graves in glorious triumph over death, through Jesus, our LIFE-GIVER, when this mortal shall put on immortality, and death be swallowed up in victory. This is God's plan of redemption: while the other class—unbelievers—remain in the congregation of the dead, having perished in their own corruption.

You contend that this, which you call the first death or dying in Adam because that the innocent and Christians die and enter that same cheerless and changeless state, is not the wages of sin or penalty of the law. But show me a Christian that has not sinned and is not embraced in the "unchangable fiat of the Almighty, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," and I will show you one who does not need the atoning merits of Jesus.

But those "infant and innocent" ones, who have not known to choose the good and refuse the evil, they die and enter that state of death because of their weak, imperfect, dying nature; they are not subjects of law, but they may be subjects of grace in the resurrection, for ought I know. It is God's wise plan that the just shall be freed from the trials, care, labor and pains of this life, and rest in their dusty beds until the resurrection morn; when all will come forth with songs of triumph. Will you contend that this sleeping in the dust, of believers, is holding them as criminals and unjust, if the wicked rise not from the dead? I cannot. But I esteem it a great mercy that they rest, having "hope in death," with much assurance; while the wicked are driven away in their wickedness, as the chaff of the summer threshing floor, and no place is found for them.

For the human family to live on in their carnal, corrupt, suffering and fighting state, without dying, would be a sore "calamity." But to raise to life all the wicked dead, to suffer the flames of the last day, looks like a calamity with a vengeance, unbefitting the character of a God of love and justice. Your Br. in hope of life through Jesus.

FROM WARREN SMITH.

CAMBRIA MILLS, MICH., April 18, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Through the mercy of our heavenly Father I still enjoy the blessings of life and health, and am striving as best I can, to live in obedience to the gospel of our Lord and Saviour, looking for that blessed hope which will be ours to enjoy at His appearing and kingdom if we are truly his. So let my prayer be, Lord help me to do thy will. We may truly take courage at the desire for investigation by those that think for themselves; and some are studying to know the truth. The Lord is giving light, and in this place the prejudice is in a measure disappearing as touching our Life views as held forth by you. I can truly rejoice that the precious HERALD OF LIFE has been sent out and cheered the waiting ones to be faithful a little longer; for it does bring with it such good news in doctrine, and also those cheering epistles from those of like precious faith, that it encourages me to still strive for the promised kingdom. May the good Lord bless and keep you at your post until your work here is all done; giving you health and strength, and finally an abundant entrance into his everlasting kingdom, is my prayer.

NO PAPER NEXT WEEK.

As the first of May is the great time of exchanging residences in this City and Brooklyn, we shall not issue a papar next week: please remember this. We give but 48 numbers for a volume; consequently there are four weeks in a year that there is no issue, and we arrange these omissions so as to meet moving days and holidays.

Our friends in these cities who change their residences should give us immediate notice of their new location; otherwise they may lose several papers, which we cannot pledge ourself to replace.

NOTICE.

THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD OF LIFE will preach at Cooper Institute, Room 24, on Sunday afternoon, May 2d, at 3 o'clock.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, APRIL 28, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE PASSOVER FEAST, or anniversary of the LORD'S SUPPER, held in this City last Monday evening was more numerously attended than ever before. We judge there were from a hundred to a hundred and fifty who united therein. It was a season of much interest, and one of the deepest feeling of union and love that we have ever witnessed. All praise and glory to our LORD and LIFE-GIVER. Some came a long distance to be with us. We parted rejoicing in Him who redeemed us to God by His blood, and in hope of soon meeting our Lord at His table in His kingdom.

BOOKS AND TRACTS ON COMMISSION.

INQUIRIES are made of us about the above matter. In reply we say, Our funds will not permit us to comply with any calls of that kind. We are only able to keep a supply for cash calls, or to meet urgent calls for gratuitous circulation: the latter not as fully as we wish we could; but we are gaining ground as rapidly as we could expect, and even faster. All praise to our covenant Lord and Master. The onward march of the Life views has become so rapid that we can hardly realize how much these things have been reviled and opposed by men professing to love the truth, even among so called "Adventists." But vain has been their opposition; like the children of Israel, under their task-masters, "the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew;" (Exo. i, 12) "and the Egyptians were grieved because of the children of Israel." So have been a class of those professing to reject the inherent immortality dogma, and yet clinging to a rotten limb thereof with a tenacity that would better become an open advocate of eternal torture. In spite of all opposition the glorious truth of "No future life out of Christ, and no re-living of the wicked dead" is gaining strength every day. New accessions are constantly coming to light, and the leaven of truth will yet bear down all opposition among candid men who love truth more than sect or party.

Help us still, friends, to multiply tracts and to scatter them all over the land, and to the ends of the earth, if the Lord gives us time to accomplish it.

DEVIL—SATAN—DEMONS.

A. PENNELL, Honeoye, N. Y., writes: I see the tract on the old serpent, the devil, is out and ready for delivery. I intend to aid a little, and inclose $2. Send me a few of each of the Campaign Documents, but I want more of the tract on the devil than the others, simply because that old serpent will be a harder creature to kill than any other in the whole range of fanciful theological dogmas. Nothing that you have ever published attacks a more vital point in popular theology than this. If you can succeed in getting people to believe that they have, by nature, no immortality, that the doctrine of eternal torments has no existence, only in fancy, and that the existence of a personal spirit-devil is off the same piece, you will remove much of the rubbish that now dishonors God and makes his word of none effect. I have not time to write on this subject now; but I feel a deep interest in the cause of truth—just the truth as it is in Jesus. Amen.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We are well aware that by our attack on the stronghold of EVIL we have laid the axe at the root of the rank paganism of nominal Christianity, which has for long centuries divided its supreme homage between God and its "Devil;" and the cry of "Great is Diana (the devil) of the Ephesians" (the nominal church), is to be raised against our inroad on the popish superstition and the Protestant admiration of the foreign gods which have been imposed on them by the superstition of the dark ages when men supposed that whatever their priests proclaimed as truth must be accepted as such unquestioningly. Those days, to some extent, are past, and thinking men will think in spite of priests, learned or unlearned: and such notions as reason revolts at must die, however old, or superstitiously held and taught.

A spirit-devil of such character, power, liberty and wonderful working, always and everywhere present, deceiving the poor, feeble, unsuspecting children of men, and more powerful in producing evil than the God of heaven is in producing good; whose very existence depends on the will of God, and yet only lives to carry on works of darkness against God and his ignorant creatures, the perishing children of Adam, is an absurdity and blasphemy too long held and promulgated by the nominal church; and the time has come to "cast out these devils" that the bewildered people may be restored to their right mind and sit at Jesus' feet confessing their sins are their own, and have come of their own neglect to exercise a rational restraint on their natural desires, which God, their Maker, implanted in them to complete their felicity by a rational and temperate indulgence of them all, but which they have abused by irrational and excessive use, thereby abusing the goodness of God and refusing to yield to the counsels of his wisdom and the appointments of his love.

This refusal to be in subjection to the wisdom and love of God has produced all manner of evils, misery, sorrow, and death; and it has been of themselves alone; they have become their own devils and satans, or adversaries, and have added sin to sin by throwing the blame of their wicked course on a fancy spirit-devil, and thus indirectly on God himself as the Creator of that imaginary being, and the constant supporter of this hidden satan, whom he suffers no man to see, while he allows him to go on with his satanic work of deceiving and destroying the largest portion of the children of men.

In the name of God, of truth, and of the reason God has given us, we have commenced a war on such superstition, blasphemy and maliciousness; and intend, through the grace of that God who is "LOVE," to continue to fight against that whole "devilish" system while we have life and strength continued; and to make men see and feel that this changing their sins from their own heads to the head of a spirit-devil is but an aggravation of their guilt and rebellion against God and his moral government.

Men, good or bad, may revile us for our course, and say all manner of evil against us; but "none of these things move us." We have, by God's good help, fought these horrible corruptions of Christianity for thirty years past, regardless of the speech of friends or foes, and we have no idea of abandoning what we believe to be the cause of truth and of God when our mortal career is so near the end. No; praise the Lord, we come to this last conflict with EVIL—the notion of spirit-devils—with the same courage and determination, only intensified, that we have attacked inherent immortality, eternal torments, and making dead sinners to live again, under the pretence of satisfying justice by judging, tormenting, and killing them again.

Our course has become a fixed habit; and the word is "onward;" following the Lord and his truth, though all worldlings and the nominal church oppose. In dependence on the arm of the Almighty, we "shall fight it out on this line," let the conflict be as long and severe as it will; not but that we shall abandon any point when convinced it is not rightly taken. Such has been our course heretofore; nor do we intend blindly to attempt to hold a post when satisfied we ought to proceed to a higher one.

The tract on the "Devil, Satan, Demons" is being sent out as called for. A thousand or more have already gone on their mission, and another thousand is ready to follow. We think it will help the candid reader to understand the true, Bible theology of this long-concealed enemy. Let not the friends of truth be afraid to read and circulate it. A GRAND DISCOVERY.

Do you ask, What is it? We will tell you. Br. I. C. WELCOME, one of the most prominent ministers of the Advent faith, has discovered a "Sound Argument" against the non-living of the wicked dead. Truly, this is a wonderful discovery, after himself and his fellow-laborers have used all their ingenuity for about fifteen years in vain to find such an "argument," Br. Welcome has at last made the discovery. Where, kind reader, do you think he found it? He tells us honestly, as an honorable man should do, that it was written by "Geo. Storrs," and that he found it in the "Bible Examiner, V. v., pp. 43, 44:" that is, in March, 1850, nineteen years ago! No matter; if Geo. Storrs had only just found, ten years before that, that the iron shoes of sectarian theology had sadly galled his feet, in his endeavors to run in the way of truth, and had emancipated one foot, he must never emancipate the other lest his feet should both be free, and he might possibly outrun those who think "one iron shoe is better than none:" they would have us go limping all our days because they do; so to excuse their own limping gait they are anxious to keep us halting as if one hip was out of joint; and, to their joy, they have discovered that nineteen years ago Geo. Storrs still wore one of the old iron shoes that had been fastened on his feet, by the traditions of men, before he had come "to be a man." This gives them great joy: it is pronounced a "Sound Argument" for holding fast to one iron shoe.

"Geo. Storrs had no business to throw off this one, just as we had begun to follow his example through the benefit of his arguments against inherent immortality and endless torture! We had just come to rejoice with him in his emancipation, and felt one foot so easy that we could not bear the thought of being made any happier by having the other iron shoe removed; and just as we were exulting in the pleasure our emancipated foot felt, Br. Storrs asked us to take the iron off our other one! This, to us, was horrible! and we have labored hard for twelve or fifteen years to find a 'Sound Argument' to prevent our brethren from being so deluded as to consent to spare the remaining iron shoe; but, alas, all our labor seems about to be lost; for this same Geo. Storrs has held right on his way with both feet free so long, that many of our best brethren have had the temerity to follow his example, and we, who have fought him so hard and persistently, see his 'pamphlets' flying like leaves all around us, and it seems as if we should soon have the whole glory of wearing the one iron shoe, unless we can get a 'sound argument' somewhere back of our own efforts to stop this Storrs: but if we do, we shall be obliged to be dependent on him for it: that is rather mortifying, it is true; yet if it is a bitter pill we must take it, for we have tried all other means and failed: so now we give you one of his articles, written about twenty years ago, when he was a babe, and just beginning to get his eyes open, and only 'saw men as trees walking;' but he gave a 'Sound Argument' in favor of the re-living of the wicked dead to torment and kill them again; and as a last effort we reproduce it verbatim et literatim; so please take notice that Storrs himself speaks in what we here give you."

Thus substantially talk our brethren who hold on to one limb of the dying monster, inherent immortal-soulism and future torments. We admit the argument reproduced by Br. Welcome, which reappears in "The World's Crisis" of the past week, is the best and strongest that we have ever seen, and it seems to find a place periodically in that paper, as it was republished there in 1862, by Eld. P. B. Morgan, then "Associate Editor" of the "Crisis," and who soon after went off to the Episcopalian Church. That was a wise act in him. If one iron shoe is good, two must be better.

Now we would make a suggestion about the matter. It is this—As no opposer of our having two free feet has ever written a better argument in favor of keeping on one iron shoe than the one Br. Welcome has just pronounced a "Sound Argument"—and he must be a good judge—let the "Crisis" have it stereotyped and become a standing column, inserted every week. There will be two advantages in this; first: it will save composition, and thereby save money to the concern; second: it will save the trouble and expense of publishing so many un-"sound arguments" on the subject, and make room for better matter. We do not know that our suggestion will be acted on, but perhaps it may be considered. We have seen entire articles of our own on the immortality question, with a slight alteration of a few words, in that paper, over the signature of another person. But let us have the entire article that Br. Welcome pronounces a sound argument over our own signature. We say "the entire article." Br. Welcome conveys the idea that he has given the whole of it, but an important introduction is entirely omitted: we say "important," because it goes to show the provocation we had from our opponent at the time, and explains somewhat how we came to write as we did at that time when we were first called upon to look at the unpopular doctrine of "No future life out of Christ."

The person we then opposed conducted himself toward us in a manner that was calculated to disgust us with any theory he might seek to become the "leader" in; and shortly after he abandoned entirely the whole immortality question, and returned to his "wallowing in the mire" of inherent immortality and eternal misery. We might say much as to his course, but forbear. We have said thus much of him, as some apology for the strong prejudice under which we wrote what Br. Welcome calls a "Sound Argument." If he concludes to take the fathership of the article and have it for a standing column in the "Crisis," we may, perhaps, review it, and show its errors, which it is not difficult to do, and which we have often done, though without direct reference to that article itself.

If our brethren who oppose the doctrine of "No future life out of Christ" choose to become petrified in their past attainments of knowledge, or turned to pillars of salt, like Lot's wife, we do not. We shall, by the grace of God in Jesus Christ, follow truth wherever it leads, nor stop our efforts to spread our faith abroad so long as our heavenly Master sees fit to continue us in this field. If we had yielded to the opposition, reproach, and even contempt heaped on us for our abandonment of the old theological notion of inherent immortality, we might have had both iron shoes on our feet to-day; and many who now reproach us because we have "followed on to know the Lord," might have been groping their way with both feet bound in iron instead of the partial liberty they now enjoy. But by the grace of God we are what we are in the liberty of the gospel of Christ; and our glorying shall be only in the Lord, who hath dealt wondrously with us, and led us in the way we knew not. If others are blessed through our labors, we give God the glory, and thank him that he has enabled us to endure without the fear of men, great or small; and we trust he will keep us unto the end, through evil and good report. To him and his grace in Christ be glory now and forever. Amen.

DR. TRUE AND THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

"THE Christian Advocate," of this city, in its issue of the 22d inst, notices "The Methodist Quarterly Review" for April, remarking upon the several articles therein briefly. One of the articles, entitled "THEODICY," is by C. K. TRUE, D. D., of the New England Conference of the M. E. Church. On this article the "Christian Advocate" speaks as follows:

Dr. C. K. True, of Upper Newton, Mass., furnishes the sixth article, entitled "Theodicy," a review of Charles Beecher's "Redeemer and Redeemed." He finds Mr. Beecher's scheme unsatisfactory, of course, and attempts one of his own. Dr. True's scheme is more unsatisfactory to us than Mr. Beecher's is to him. Sin, depravity, and atonement are reconcilable with the divine justice and goodness, if the punishment of the finally impenitent is not too great. The real difficulty in a theodicy, then, lies in the penalty of sin. If punishment is unceasing, no vindication of the divine justice is possible. This new theodicy from a Methodist pen, therefore, teaches the cessation of the penalty, but whether by some method of restoration or the annihilation of the wicked does not appear. The Scripture doctrine is not touched; "perhaps in its nature, if not in its duration, it is left in obscurity and mystery;" but whatever it be, "it behooves us not to accept any doctrine which reflects upon the divine justice and goodness." This does so reflect; it is therefore false. Metaphysics first, Scripture afterward. Nay, terrible as is the doctrine of an eternal hell, it is to us far less mysterious than the existence of any sin at all in the universe. Dr. True must revise his scheme by the light of Holy Scripture. If he thence draws his notions of goodness and justice, so must he that of penalty.

We had not had time to examine the article by Dr. True previous to reading the above notice. Since then we have examined it, and would be glad to transfer the whole to our columns, if it were not for its length, that our readers might see what endless confusion and jargon results from the doctrine of inherent immortality. It is painful to see how good and intelligent men, men of piety and learning, grope in "darkness, and know not at what they stumble," while the sun of eternal truth blazes in meridian glory all around them. But they see it not, because this inherent immortal soul and a spirit-devil all but produce a total eclipse of the glorious luminary God has given us to "guide our feet into the way of peace."

Dr. True is evidently far in advance of the Church, generally, of which he is one of her most excellent ministers; and we earnestly pray that he may yet not only "see light in God's light," but be enabled to proclaim it fearlessly at whatever cost. He is clearly dissatisfied with the theology styled "orthodox" in relation to the punishment of the lost; but how far he sees the truth we have no means of determining definitely. That he has abandoned the idea of eternal suffering is tolerable clear; and this seems to alarm "The Christian Advocate," as the foregoing notice shows.

As a matter of interest to our readers we give the concluding remarks of Dr. True in his article on "THEODICY," as follows:

PUNISHMENT.

It remains to consider the nature of the penalty which is attached to sin in the law. Theologians seem not to be conscious that it is here the real difficulty lies in the vindication of the Divine government. We can reconcile with our ideas of the justice and goodness of God the origin of sin, the depravity of our fallen race, and the atonement, on the supposition that accountable beings are not, in the trial of their virtue, put to the risk of too great consequences in case of failure. The plea that they are free, and if they know their doom, whatever it may be, they are to blame for incurring it, is not satisfactory. They should not be allowed to take such responsibility. Besides, the guilty are not the only ones affected by their doom; their friends, the angels of God, all sympathetic creatures, and God himself, are concerned in their sufferings. Yet on this superficial plea theologians have, to alarm the wicked, piled up horror upon horror, lasting unrespited through eternal ages, not considering in what an odious light it places the character of the Creator, nor whether such exaggerations are not likely to stagger all faith in revelation. Indeed, most of the infidelity of Christendom can be traced to the revulsion which kind and considerate minds have experienced on this subject. It is time for the Christian world to wake up to the effect of such dogmas if they would not have evangelical religion completely wrecked upon these sand-bars. It is not our purpose to define the scriptural doctrine of future punishment; perhaps in its nature, if not in its duration, it is left in obscurity and mystery. Our point is, that it behooves us not to accept any doctrine which reflects upon the Divine justice and goodness. This is indeed the very first principle of correct interpretation. The following schemes for eternal punishment are now pressed upon our attention:

1. Mr. Beecher's view of the doom of sinners is, that it depends for its continuance upon the continued impenitence of the condemned. At any moment when they will submit to God and ask for mercy they will receive it; but then he believes that they never will submit. This is the view taken by the author of Ecce Deus, (and by Bledsoe in his Theodicy,) who displays equal ability with our author in treating of this perplexing topic, subject, however, to one drawback in respect to his absurd and almost blasphemous remarks upon the impossibility of the Almighty's annihilating moral beings.

2. There is the doctrine of Dr. Bushnell, that sinners receive a certain measure of sorrow at their doom; but their being may grow less and less without ever reaching a complete extinction, as the asymptote of a circle is a line so projected as to be always approaching the circle without ever touching it.

3. The doctrine that the penalty-state is exile from heaven forever, in a depraved character and under eternal despair of any improvement, but not increasing in sin or in misery by any proclivity derived from a state of probation, but subject to such alternations as may arise from keeping or breaking the rules of prison discipline.

4. The opinion that by the law of habit sinners will grow more and more wicked, and consequently more and more miserable forever.

5. The doctrine that in addition to the pangs of a guilty conscience and disappointment of heaven the wicked will be positively and ceaselessly tormented by burning unconsumed in actual fire, or its equivalent in the power to torture.

6. The doctrine that fire is but the symbol of swift and painful destruction, and that the eternal doom of the wicked is literal death at the day of judgment; that is, the extinction of consciousness and all capacity of thinking, or feeling, or acting. This ends, of course, the terrible scene of sin and suffering by the destruction of the subject.

7. The human soul is material or inseparable from the body—and perishes with the body at death; a destiny which will be reversed only in the case of the righteous by resurrection at the final coming of Christ.

8. The resurrection of the wicked at the last day to receive a public judgment and the doom of utter annihilation.

9. Transformation, or moral death, by the elimination of the moral attributes of wicked men and the oblivion of memory; the abuse of man's moral capacity ending in its destruction, and degrading him, like Nebuchadnezzar, to the level of the beasts of the field.

All these theories agree as to the eternal loss of heaven as being the main element in the doom of the lost. To the inquiring mind, reconsidering the question de novo, the problem would be to determine which theory is most agreeable to the Scriptures and to rational considerations, and especially the justice and wisdom of God and the moral order and peace of the universe. With some of them a rational vindication of the divine government is easy; but with others no theodicy is possible, whatever views may be taken of the origin of sin, of depravity, and probation.

Of the nine "schemes for eternal punishment," here presented by Dr. True, we are glad and rejoice to say, the "seventh" is ours: all the others we utterly reject; and, through the mercy of God in Christ, we are saved from all the bewilderment that attends the speculations on either of the other eight schemes. If others choose to flounder in them, we can only say, our prayer is, that all who sincerely desire truth may find the same peace of mind which our covenant God has granted us since we became fully satisfied that any and all life after death is wholly dependent upon a resurrection from the dead, "at the last day," through the power of the "Eternal Spirit," given to none but believers in and through our Lord Jesus Christ, who is "The Resurrection and the Life;" or, God's appointed LIFE-GIVER for the children of Adam. By Him, through Him, and in Him alone can any of the human race ever see life after death once sets in. To all others, the eternal night of death is their doom. There is no future life of misery to any soul of man: that idea is born of the bewildering doctrine of an inherent immortal soul, and dies with the overthrow of that human invention. May God hasten its downfall.

P. S.—Since the foregoing was in type, Br. Rufus Wendell called into our office and left the following statement:

BR. STORRS: Allow me to add to your foregoing remarks that Dr. True is an out-and-out believer in the final extinction of the impenitent. I have had frequent interviews with him, in Boston, during the past few months, and know whereof I affirm. Eight weeks ago to day—Monday, March 1st, the Doctor frankly avowed and bravely defended the view I have imputed to him, in the Boston Methodist Preachers' Meeting, at which from forty to sixty of his brother Ministers were present.

It was my privilege to attend the meeting in question, and I can assure the editor of the Christian Advocate that Dr. True's Quarterly Review article does not mean the final salvation of all men. R. W.

"DEMONOLOGY."

LAST week we brought down our examination of Dr. Campbell's "SEVEN PILLARS" to the close of the fourth. We proceed to "feel" of the three remaining ones. He says:

PILLAR 5. "This consists of historic evidence. It is from a passage in "the epistle to the Smyrneans, written by Ignatius, the disciple of the Apostle John. He quotes the words of our Lord to Peter when Peter supposed he saw a spirit, or a ghost. But he quotes him thus, "Handle me and see, for I am not a daimoon asomaton—a disembodied demon;"—a spirit without a body. This, adds Dr. C., "places the matter above all doubt, that with them of that day a demon or ghost were equivalent terms."

Not so fast, Dr. C., you have added to the words of Ignatius, "a spirit without a body." We do not object to it, however; yet we think the words are capable of a very different construction from what you have placed upon them. You have maintained the point that demons were the ghosts or souls of dead men. If so, it would be exceedingly superfluous to say, "I am not a disembodied demon." Our Lord might say—"I am not a spirit without a body," for the exceedingly good reason that there is no such thing, so far as revealed to us; but there are spirits who have "not flesh and bones" as Jesus had; and that is Jesus' own explanation, however "Ignatius" might have regarded it; but these spirits are not the spirits of dead men, for reasons already noticed. But, finally, we have no reliance upon anything quoted from the so-called fathers; knowing, as we do, that their writings have been corrupted, and that some of the "fathers" were turned from the simplicity of the gospel by the philosophy of the Pagans.

PILLAR 6. The Dr. erects for his sixth pillar, the "word angel." This he says "is of Bible origin, and confined to those countries in which that volume is found." He tells us, the Pagans had no notions of such beings, and could not therefore use the term demon as a substitute. He says—that the term angel does not enter into the idea of a demon "in the Christian Scriptures, is evident for the following reasons:"

"1st. Angels were never said to enter into any one." [But, Doctor, "Satan entered into" Judas.]

"2d. Angels have no affection for bodies of any sort, either as habitations or vehicles of action."

This is pure assumption. Did not angels appear in "bodies of" some "sort" to Abraham and Lot? Aye! Did they not, eat too, of Abraham's "fatted calf," etc.? Paul saith—"Be careful to entertain strangers, for some thereby have entertained angels unawares." Think you, they were bodiless beings? Or, were they in bodies for which they had "no affection?" But letting all this pass—we ask—How does Dr. C. know that "angels have no affection for bodies of any sort?" He has surely given us no proof except his bare assertion. Does he know that they have none? If so, where did he get the knowledge of the fact?

"3d. Angels have no predilection for tombs and monuments of the dead;" he says.

Another pure assumption. Having triumphantly assumed his ground he says:—

"1st. Demons have entered into human bodies and into the bodies of inferior creatures.

"2d. Demons evince a peculiar affection for human bodies, and seem to desire them both as vehicles of action, and as places of habitation.

"3d. Demons also evince a peculiar fondness for their old mortal tenements: hence, we so often read of them carrying the possessed into the grave-yards, the tombs, and sepulchres, where, perchance, their old mortalities lay in ruins."

Marvellousness must be wonderfully developed in any head that can believe this last item. If "disembodied spirits" are conscious, they are either happy or miserable. If happy, the grave-yard must be a fine specimen of heaven to them, that they should have such a "fondness" for it! If they are miserable, they know full well their "torment" will be increased when they shall be clothed in bodies again, as they of the Dr.'s school hold they will be; and yet according to Dr. C. they have "a peculiar fondness for their old mortal tenements!" The doctor proceeds—

PILLAR 7. "Among the evidences of the papal defection intimated by Paul, he associates the doctrine concerning demons with celibacy and abstinence from certain meats, as chief among the signs of that fearful apostacy. He warrants the conclusion that the purgatorial prisons for ghosts and the ghostly mediators of departed saints, which, equally with commanding to abstain from lawful meats, and forbidding to marry, characterize the times of which he spoke, are attributes of the same system, and indicative of the fact that demons and ghosts are two names of the same beings. To this we may add the testimony of James, who says the demons believe and tremble for their doom. Now all eminent critics concur that the spirits of wicked men are here intended; and need I add that oft-repeated affirmation of the demoniacs, 'We know thee, Jesus of Nazareth; art thou come to torment us before the time?' Thus all the scriptural allusions to this subject authorize the conclusion that demons are ghosts, and especially wicked and unclean spirits of dead men."

We have given this full statement of the Dr.'s "seventh pillar" that it might be fairly before the reader.

Whatever "all eminent critics concur" in, matters not to us, as we "call no man father upon earth." The authority of Jesus Christ and his apostles is strong enough for us. Dr. Campbell has said, "There is but one devil or satan in the universe:" but he admits he has legions of angels and demons. Will he tell us who these legions of angels are? as he distinguishes them from demons, while the Scriptures, so far as we can find, make no such distinction. Besides, when the Pharisees charged our Lord with casting out demons by Beelzebub, the prince of the demons, Jesus said "If satan cast out satan he is divided against himself:" plainly denominating these demons satan; thus explaining their true nature; Matt. xii., 26; and Peter saith, "Jesus went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed of the devil"—diabolou. Here are two Scripture witnesses that demons are properly denominated satan and devil, notwithstanding that demon ["knowing one"] Dr. Campbell affirms, "There is but one devil or satan in the universe." Further,—Peter warns against the devil—diabolos—who "walketh about seeking whom he may devour;" but gives them no caution to beware of "the spirits of dead men;" a most necessary caution if our author's theory is true. A good being is never called demon in the New Testament—no, not once. A fatal fact this to Dr. Campbell's theory, and hews down his whole "seven pillars;" for, if his theory is true, the spirits of good dead men are just as much demons as the spirits of bad dead men: yet he has to admit, "Amongst them [the Jews] the term demon generally, if not universally, denoted an unclean, malign, or wicked spirit." So the truth will out. The term demon in the time of our Lord's ministry was used, and used only, so far as any evidence appears, to signify the devil's angels—his family or household; and our Lord thus denominates them more than once.

As to what Dr. Campbell has said about Paul's reference to papal defection, we reply—Papacy never would have come into being, and never could have lived, had not the church first fell into the serpent's lie—"Ye shall not surely die"—and made death nothing but a transition; the essential man escaping it altogether. It was this apostacy that led on to the development called Papacy. Paul indeed forsaw it, and warned the church against being "spoiled through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ;" and adds—"Let no man beguile you of your reward in a voluntary humility, and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen." The worship of the spirits of dead men he does not caution them against; for the very good reason that he had taught them that all future life depended on the resurrection from the dead. See again 1 Corth. xv., 12–18, 32. There was therefore no danger of the Church being led to worship the spirits of dead men only through the worship of angels, and thus apostatizing into the belief of the conscious existence of dead men; which, indeed, Paul foresaw would take place in the last days; but he equally forsaw that it would be a "departing from the faith" of Christ and the Scriptures, and would result in the denial of the resurrection, "saying that the resurrection is past already and overthrow the faith of some." All this has resulted from bringing into the Church the doctrine that "demons are the spirits of dead men;" and Dr. Campbell, and all who travel in the same train, are doing much to strengthen the papal apostacy, with all its attendant blasphemies.

We have given thus much attention to the "Demonology" of Dr. Campbell, because of the favor his work has received, and because some say—"We consider it fully demonstrated that the demons of the New Testament were spirits of deceased human beings."

We consider that point as far from being demonstrated as the old serpent's lie to Eve. Nor can it ever be demonstrated while inspiration positively declares "There is no knowledge in sheol." Dr. Campbell and others affirm sheol is full of demons—knowing ones—the spirits of dead men; who, according to them, are not dead, but alive; and, of course, have life independent of the redemption by Christ. But we leave them to answer to their own Master, exhorting all to beware how they forestall the resurrection, and rob Christ of the honor due to the second Adam. The first Adam brought all his posterity down to the dust: eternally must they remain there, in "darkness" and "silence," except they are delivered by the second Adam. No Resurrection, No Future Life. Let all remember that.

PREDESTINATION: OR THE DIVINE PLAN.

ALMOST endless disputes have arisen on this subject, which have doubtless been the result of a mistaken conception of the great principles of the Divine plan for man's redemption. With a desire to lead the reader's mind into a refreshing and profitable channel of thought, we wish to offer a few ideas which have been suggested by a careful and candid consideration of the subject. Space will not permit us to elaborate many interesting features intimately connected with the subject; therefore we will bring before the reader's mind a few prominent points.

Paul says, "whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son." Thus his foreknowledge appears as the ground work of predestination. That God is a being of foreknowledge we believe no Bible Student will deny. But that "such foreknowledge is equivalent to so many decrees," as some maintain, we emphatically deny. To avoid the fatal conclusion that "whatever is, is right," it is not necessary to deny the foreknowledge of Jehovah; and, indeed, to take the opposite extreme, and maintain that his foreknowledge extends to all events, both great and small, would be equally unreasonable and untrue. To sustain the Bible view of this doctrine we need only contend that his foreknowledge embraced a certain plan for the accomplishment of a desired work.

Many declarations of Scripture show the predetermination of Deity regarding the great work of redemption. By this we understand that certain things or events were decreed by God to take place in the history of the world; and from the moment the decision passed the divine mind they became unalterably fixed, and his Almighty power stood committed for their execution. Again, we understand that the events embraced in these decrees are of such a nature as to demand divine interference for their accomplishment, as they would never take place in the natural course of things. Though this is a broad admission, yet when we consider the subjects of these decrees we should vastly differ with many able and learned theologians of the Calvinistic school.

A plan must have been formed in the mind of God prior to issuing his decrees, which relate to the execution of his purpose. His foreknowledge must reach to the utmost limit of his plan, and his decrees, sustained by his promises for their execution, are the certain pledge of the accomplishment of the work which he had purposed to perform. It thus appears very clear that his foreknowledge produces no effect. The accomplishment of his plan depends upon the execution of his decrees, which require His Almighty power to be put forth.

With this view of God's foreknowledge and decrees how completely harmonizes the doctrine of man's free moral agency. Nothing is more plainly set forth in the Scriptures than the moral freedom of mankind, and that they are held accountable for the choice they may make. Again, the nature of man's constitution furnishes an unanswerable argument on this point. Man, by nature, is capable of voluntary motion, which could not be the case if he was not a moral agent. He could not develop a character in harmony with God's will, nor be a rebel against his righteous law were he not possessed of freedom of choice. The first man was placed in the garden of Eden as a moral agent, and to develop a character was placed under a law which made it necessary for him to exercise this quality of his constitution. To produce a a moral character Adam must bring into action the reasoning qualities of his mind, and his future depends upon the decision which he shall make. True, God by his breath could wither him to dust, but this act from a higher being could not change Adam's moral character.

Oh, how perfectly all the parts of God's wise and beneficent plan fit together! He works for a purpose; in all He does is connected some design—the ultimate of which is to glorify his holy name forever. To this end he has issued his decrees, and committed his Almighty power for their execution.

Paul speaks of those who "are the called according to his purpose." Albert Barnes, whom we highly esteem as a commentator, remarks that this "implies that God had a plan, purpose, or intention in regard to all who BECAME Christians." The great scope of his purpose regarding mankind relate to the future destiny of all who shall develop a character in harmony with His will. This is very clearly stated by Paul in his Epistle to the Romans, when he declares: "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to his purpose. For whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first born among many brethren. Moreover, whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified." (Rom. viii., 28–30.)

This passage opens before us the broad field of God's plans and purposes, but which we cannot now examine in detail. There are two points, however, presented, which we wish to make the subject of investigation. (1) To ascertain who were the subjects of this predestination; and (2) To show to what they were predestinated. To obtain a clear understanding of this matter we shall briefly survey the original condition of things.

God had a purpose in the creation of the world, which, as a work of his own hands should glorify his name throughout eternal ages. It was created for his abode; and it was also his purpose to create intelligent beings to have dominion over, with whom he should dwell. Therefore, he purposed a most blessed union between heaven and earth.

But his eternal glory and happiness of his creatures depend upon perfect harmony in his vast universe. To secure such a blessed condition their loyalty must be tested; which involves the necessity of creating man as a free moral agent, with the capability of developing a character which shall decide his eternal destiny. This test of man's character would decide whether he would prove a loyal subject, or a rebel to his Creator. God, in his foreknowledge, saw the possibility of the introduction of evil which this condition of man involved, and that his original purpose shall not be frustrated he makes provision therefor. Though man should prove a rebel to his Creator, fall from his exalted position, and bring the world under the blighting effects of sin, yet God's design shall not be frustrated—no part of his plan shall fail—but the execution of his decrees shall, at the appointed time, exterminate completely all evil, and by the power of the restitution, the earth shall be brought forth from the effects of sin in its original Eden beauty and glory. "The seed of the woman shall bruise the Serpent's head."

God's plan or purpose may be considered as a whole, and yet may be considered as parts; but has one aim—viz.: to bring about his eternal glory by a union of his creatures with whom he shall dwell. His plan may be considered in two parts. (1) His original plan; and (2) His redemptive plan; but they are one in purpose, hence if one fails all is lost. But no failure can occur, as he has issued his decrees, and committed his Almighty power for their execution. According to God's foreknowledge all the parts of his plan were fixed in his mind before the foundation of the world, with the purpose, in case evil should be introduced into his newly created world, to put into operation the redemptive plan which should be committed to the hands of the promised "seed"—Christ. The redemptive plan contemplates the eternal destruction of evil, and offers salvation to the posterity of Adam—offers an immortal existence, which is obtained upon the same terms that were rejected by Adam—i. e., obedience to the law of God.

Again, the positive penalty which was attached to the Adamic law made a necessity for putting in operation a redemptive plan, (in case of Adam's fall) available for his posterity, for if they had come under the same positive penalty of the Adam law, eternal death would have been their final end, and thus God's original purpose to dwell on this earth with holy and immortal beings would prove a failure. Adam perished without any hope of a future life; and so does every man who dies a rebel to God.

Many greatly error in arguing that the penalty for Adam's transgression simply conferred on him a "dying nature." The truth is he never possessed any other, and the penalty that he came under deprived him of the possibility of obtaining any other. He was created mortal—and without he obtained immortality, he would die as a natural consequence. His posterity, by his failure to obtain immortality, therefore, posess a nature subject to death. But Adam's penalty was an eternal state of non-existence; and as the same penalty for disobedience is in force under the redemptive plan, the righteous can in no way suffer this penalty by a temporary confinement in the grave. One enters the land of darkness with a bright "hope of LIFE," having the "incorruptible seed" dwelling in them, by which He who has conquered death will bring them forth by the production of a new life—Spiritual and eternal; the other class go down into death "without hope"—"as the beasts that perish,"—and enter the same hopeless eternal state to which Adam was consigned.

With these few remarks—though the subject is so vast that space will hardly permit us to glance over it—the reader will perceive that everything is now being done according to the purpose of God which was formed "before the foundation of the world." Paul says, "He hath chosen us in him (Christ) before the foundation of the world . . . having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ . . . . That in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth; even in him; in whom we have obtained an inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will."—Eph. i., 4, 5, 10, 11.

This portion of revelation plainly unfolds the purpose of God in the great plan of redemption, though formed "before the foundation of the world," was put into operation, after Adam's transgression, for the salvation of his feeble, dying posterity. But we must now return to the points proposed for investigation.

(1.) "For whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate" Rom. viii., 29. When God contemplated the plan for the redemption of a fallen race, he did foreknow that some of the human family would comply with the conditions of salvation—would develop a character in harmony with God, and would thus become Christians; for this language has sole reference to the saints of God, as is justly intimated by Mr. Barnes. The language is positive in declaring that all things work together for their "good." All the afflictions calamities, trials and persecutions to which they may be subjected, are appointed for their welfare, by bringing them into that perfect harmony with God which will ultimate in their salvation. They are the "called," or the "chosen" of the Lord in the sense that they have complied with the conditions of heirship, and by a union with Jesus Christ have become the subjects of God's predestination.

(2.) As Paul clearly shows that the saints are the subjects of God's predestination, it only remains for me to show to what they are predestined.

(a.) They are "to be conformed to the image of his Son." "Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his . . . But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii., 8, 10. Many passages show that this shall be the future destiny of God's people; and they alone meet this salvation from the grave and conformation to the image of Christ, that he should be "the first born among many brethren." Christ's resurrection from the dead was a subject of God's decree, and He has also decreed that death shall not "prevail" over those that are Christ's. Thus we see that the resurrection of Christ and his people are the subject of God's predestination. "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept." All the dead that are "in" Christ shall be made alive. "But every man in his own order; Christ the first fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." (1 Cor. xv., 22, 23). Now we should like to have any man show from the Bible that the resurrection of the wicked dead is a subject of predestination. All the events of the future that transpire embraced in God's plan were pre-determined by Deity; therefore all he does he always meant to do. As the Bible clearly and fully shows that all who are predestinated to be raised from the dead, are those who have the spirit of Christ dwelling in them and who shall "be conformed to the image of his Son," therefore, the doctrine of the future re-living of the wicked dead stands directly opposed to the great plan and purpose of God.

(b). Again, as further proof of the position that we have taken, Paul shows that the saints are predestinated to be "called" from the dead. He says: "Whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called them he also justified; and whom he justified them he also glorified." As is common in the sacred writings the past tense is used with reference to a future event. We are well aware that some suppose that this calling has reference to the calling of sinners to repentance; but that this position is wrong is clearly demonstrated from the fact that they are "called" to be conformed to the image of Christ. This refers to an undivided company. All who have been predestinated to this end are called; and all who are called are justified; and all who are justified are glorified. This is very far from being true with regard to those who have been called to believe the gospel, as but a small portion, comparatively, heed the glad message of salvation. Even when called by the Master Preacher himself to accept the offer of life, but very few accepted. But this is not the case with those embraced in this divine decree. This call comes only to sleeping saints, and when divinity utters that call they shall feel the mighty throb of immortality pulsating through every fibre of their nature, and they shall come forth formed and fashioned like unto the glorious body of Christ. "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall arise." None of God's sleeping ones are left, but as an undivided, immortal company, come forth to the marriage supper of the lamb.

The reader cannot fail to see that as the righteous only are predestinated to be called from the grave, the wicked are excluded from a future life, or a life beyond the grave. They enter a state from which there is no deliverance for them; for by rejecting Christ they chose eternal death, as he is "the resurrection." "Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." (John vi., 51). "Yet a little while and the world seeth me no more; but ye see me; because I live, ye shall live also." (John xiv., 19).

We believe the Bible perfectly harmonizes upon the points that we have hastily sketched over in these few thoughts. While revelation plainly shows that the saints of God are predestinated to be raised from the dead, it also equally shows of the wicked dead that "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise," but God has made "their memory to perish." Isa. xxvi., 14. WM. H. SPENCER.

THE SUCCESSFUL CHRISTIAN.

As we hear talk of the successful merchant, the successful manufacturer, inventor, or writer, we should, anon, hear of the successful Christian. Merely to be a Christian should no more satisfy the professor than merely to be a merchant, manufacturer, or writer, satisfies these classes. Contented plodding is no honor to either; it is more likely to lead to the overthrow of all. A Christian must by all means have an ambition to succeed as such. He must aim to know, and value, and reach, the great capacities of his profession. He must be thoroughly ashamed of low attainments, cold affections, scanty knowledge, halting progress and ineffectiveness in the service of the Master. The powers of his soul must be enlisted for Christ. Instead of reserving all his dulness, or the mere odds and ends of his life for his religion, while business and secular concerns get its brightest hours and its best energies, he must make it really and truly his chief end to glorify God; with animation, energy and enterprise, he must pursue this object, and business, and secular life, and fashion, and amusements, and studies, must be arranged in subordination to this.

The successful Christian is the one who thus shows respect to his own heart's choice, and puts its full significance into it. Whatever that is, he will be a Christian, and not only have the name and varnish of one. He is more than the successful moralist who has kept the commandments from his youth up. He has entered manfully into the inward conflict of which the legalist knows nothing. He has fought spiritual battles and won. He has put to flight the army of alien doubts; his faith has grown calm, steady, and healthfully mature. He has the witness in himself; he knows that Christ lives, for he lives in him; and you cannot, by any amount of sophistry, shake a living conscious man's faith in his own existence. He is strong in faith, like faithful Abraham. The promises with which God's word is studded, are the lamp to his feet and the light to his path. He believes in them; rests upon them; lives, trusts, bears up and rejoices in them.

The successful Christian is he who has grasped the great idea of a present personal Redeemer. He has found out that he has Jesus as an actual, living companion; present indeed to faith, in the spirit and not in the flesh, but for that very reason nearer, more intimate than one in the flesh ever could be; so near that nothing can separate between them, not death itself. He has learned to live and walk in the blissful sense of that presence day by day.

The successful Christian has become skilled in the use of the weapon of all prayer. He does not talk idly to God, or waste the sacred seasons set apart for prayer. His prayers tell. They are real powers. He prevails with God. He has a meaning—a specific purpose, in his approaches to the mercy seat. He comes believingly, boldly, importunately. He goes away hopefully, with inward refreshment and elevation. He has met with God. The prayerful spirit has been cultivated until it has become more than a part—rather the informing principle, the mode—of his life. As incense, without effort, his thoughts mount up to God, and through all his activity there runs a reference to and a dependence on God, which makes it a continual act of worship.

The successful Christian has struck a well of water springing up in his heart into everlasting life. He no longer has to draw water painfully, by the dead pull of duty. He has ceased to feel the demands and denials of the Christian life to be burdens. He has been enabled by grace to bring his will into conformity with the Divine will, and his whole self glows as a living sacrifice. That God's wise and holy purposes should be put in place of his own narrow and unworthy ones, seems to him the highest of privileges. With such springs of action at the centre, the movements of his Christian life are almost spontaneous. As by the power of appetite, as by natural impulse, he does easily now what once he did with pain and self denial. The Circe of worldly amusement sings her songs in vain for him. Higher affections pre-occupy his soul. The burden of the cross has grown light. Already it has begun to change into a crown.

The successful Christian has learned the power and comprehensiveness of Love. Love caught from the cross, and flowing out toward every creature, becomes more and more the type of his exprience and the principle of his active life. He has learned, under the impulse of this love, the business of saving the souls of his fellow men. He is wise to win souls, and he turns many to righteousness.

Oh, can we not have more successful Christians, and fewer failures; fewer bankrupts; fewer listless, half-hearted, unenterprizing souls, through whom has never run the thrilling sense of the greatness of their calling. To succeed as a Christian! That must be the watch-word of our busy age. There are palms for this success, too, as well as for that of the world. Would you gain it? Take it to heart as much as you do worldly success. Lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset you, and run with patience the race set before you, looking to Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith.—Am. Presb.

"Seen of Angels."

He comes! He comes! At his mighty voice,
  Worlds into space are springing:
The "Sons of God," with shouts rejoice,
  The morning stars are singing.
Darkness obeys his high command,
And light beams o'er a lovely land.

He comes! He comes! With the thunder-crash
  On Sinai descending:
Bright forked lightnings round him flash,
  And hills of rock are rending:
His angels gaze in sacred awe,
While he gives forth his "fiery law."

He comes! He comes! In a lowly stall
  A helpless babe is sleeping:
Angels adore him "Lord of all,"
  And "o'er him charge" are keeping,
While Eastern sages humbly bend,
Worshipping him, the sinner's friend.

He comes! He comes! With the trumpet's sound,
  His angels all attending:
The tribes of man are gathered round,
  Throughout all time extending:
Joy to the saints on that bright day—
The lost—O hide their doom away!

"Making Up."

For several mornings, Mrs. Morton had noticed that something went wrong with her little May. She seemed happy as usual at the breakfast table, but, when school-time drew near, she became restless. She got her hat and cape long before the hour, and stationed herself at the window, looking up the street as if waiting for the time; yet, when it came, she went reluctantly, as if she had no heart to go.

"Why don't you start, May, if you are all ready?" said her mother, one morning, when this performance had been repeated so many times as to awaken her curiosity.

"I don't want to go yet," was the reply. "Perhaps Alice Barnes will call for me."

But, when there was only ten minutes left, May hastened away alone with a troubled face. She came home at noon sadder than she went.

"What does grieve the little girl?" asked her mother, as she came into her room looking the picture of despair.

"O mother!" said May, crying outright at a kind word. "You don't know!"

"Yes; but I want to," said Mrs. Morton. "Perhaps I can help you."

"No, ma'am," said May: "nobody can help me. Alice Barnes and I—we've always been such friends! and now she's mad with me."

"What makes you think so?" asked her mother.

"Oh, I know so! She always used to call for me mornings, and we were always together at recess and everywhere. I wouldn't believe it for the longest while; but it is a whole week since she called for me, and she keeps away from me all the time."

"Now I know what Alice has done, dear, can you think of anything you did?"

"Why, mother Morton! No, indeed! I don't need to think. I haven't done a thing. I thought too much of Alice." May cried again at the bare idea.

"There, dear, don't cry. Perhaps you haven't; but you must not be discouraged till you have asked her why she keeps away. Very likely there is some little thing that you never thought of."

"I don't want to ask her, mother. It is her fault, and she ought to come to me."

"Ah then," replied Mrs. Morton, "I fear that your pride is stronger than your love to Alice." She was brushing May's hair as she spoke; and she stooped to kiss, her forehead with a loving motherly kiss and then went to see about dinner. They were not alone again till school-time came. But it seems that May knew her mother was right; for she went straight up to Alice when she saw her on the sidewalk after school, and said:

"Alice Barnes, what makes you mad with me?"

"I shouldn't think you'd ask me, May Morton," replied Alice, "when you've said such unkind things about me."

"No such thing," said May, indignantly.

"May Morton," said Alice, looking as solemn as her round rosy face would let her, "didn't I hear you, with my own ears, telling Bessie Potter that I was the most mischievous little thing you ever saw?"

"When?" demanded May, feeling as strange and helpless as if she were in a nightmare.

"Last week, a Thursday, in your seat," said Alice, "just before the bell rang for school to begin."

May looked blank for a minute, and then she burst into a laugh. Alice turned angrily away; but May caught her by the arm; and choking down her laughter as fast as possible, she said, "Alice, don't you know I named my new canary-bird Alice, after you? I was telling Bessy Potter about her, and how she tore her paper to pieces, and scattered her seed all over the floor."

Alice stared and drew a long breath. May's eyes twinkled again; and both little girls forgot their grievances in a peal of hearty laughter, ending in an affectionate shake and hug.

"There, Alice," said May afterward, "If ever we get put out again, let's speak about it the very first thing. Perhaps it will be something as funny as this."

I have told this story for the sake of other children, large and small. Many a pleasant day is spoiled, and many unkind, painful feelings are caused, by little mistakes which a few words would set right. True love is not too proud to speak first. It is pride that prevents; and, if we could see pride in all its selfish ugliness, we should make haste to tread it under foot.—Selected.

Shall not the Judge of all the Earth do Right?

AN INQUIRY BY ELD. H. ROCKWELL.

The above inquiry was made by Abraham of the Lord, Gen. xviii., 25. Will our Christian friends of every creed indulge an old man, who has, through the great forbearance of a just and merciful God, been permitted to live 74 years, by candidly and prayerfully answering the above question, and those that may follow? Allow me to say, the questions I may suggest, as they occur to my mind, in the answer I may give to the one above, shall not be for the sake of sustaining a theory, but as my honest convictions of a vital principle of Bible truth.

I will here state my reasons for adopting this method. It is, that the general discord and confusion of the world, together with the strife, animosity, and bitter hate of the nations, one against the other, with their universal preparations for the destruction of human life, in connection with the teachings of Him who taught as never man taught—and above all other considerations, and that which fills the heart of every humble Christian with gloom and sadness, is the awful apostacy of the mass of those professing godliness. But a few short years have passed since the entire Christian world was stirred with the startling cry "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet Him." On this continent William Miller was prominent in this movement. Ministers and laymen were awakened from the long night of slumber; and active hands and longing hearts, filled with new hopes, caught up the glad sound, and like the lightning's flash, by the powerful agency of electricity, heralded it across the mighty ocean; and clergymen, men of learning, of deep and unquestioned piety, responded to the call. Although the time indicated by Mr. Miller failed, that startling cry remains in the Bible in all its force, and will, in the fulness of time, be fulfilled to the letter. But with its supposed failure, all must see that it ushered in a new era of Bible investigation; and the truths inseparably connected with the one so full of comfort to the lonely and weary follower of Christ, have been searched out from the traditional and theological rubbish of our fallen temple; and in those researches it hath been found written that "God only hath immortality;" and also that man is inherently only mortal; that if he ever obtains immortality, it, must be by a patient continuance in well doing, that he may thereby obtain glory, honor, immortality, eternal life. The discovery of these facts has driven from the minds of many the heathen dogma of an endless state of future torment; and the minds of men, in many instances, have been called to active research after truth; and the result has been that the idea of going immediately to heaven or hell, at the cessation of this animal life, has given way to the Scriptural one that a future life depends entirely on a resurrection from the dead at the last day.

We have now brought our subject down to the resurrection. Many will doubtless say, "This is what we anticipated." They will be ready to inquire, why I so constantly "ride this hobby?" "Why be always advocating that pernicious heresy?" as they call it. This brings me more directly to the question, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?"

To those who reproach us, as above indicated, I answer, The word "hobby" does not occur in the Bible; but if it is meant that a constant referring to truth is a hobby, then all have their hobby. I make no boast of learning, and am under the necessity of forming conclusions from objects within the limits of personal observations. I am therefore constrained to admit that the Judge of all the earth will do right. If this be so, let us proceed to inquire. Do we believe the Bible account of the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, recorded Gen. xix., did ever transpire? I know it to be a fixed fact with all the different creeds of Christians. Please keep this in mind, for we have a point here. As said the Psalmist, "How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." Surely it is quite refreshing, in these days of strife, to know that professed Christians can agree in one Bible truth, if it be only in the destruction of the Sodomites. Do we believe that the company of Dathan and Abiram were burned up in their camp, as recorded in Numb. xvi., 35—"And there came out a fire from the Lord and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense?" I assume that we do believe it. So far there appears to be but one opinion.

We now inquire, Do we believe that the close of this dispensation, or the end of the world or age, or "the day of judgment," as some call it, or the time when the Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise, (1 Thess. iv.,) that at that time the Lord, as recorded Psa. xi., upon the wicked He shall rain snares, fire and brimstone, and an horrible tempest: this shall be the portion of their cup? We wish you to bear these things in mind; so that if you should find us in error in answering the question, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" you will manifest Christian courtesy enough to endeavour to lead us out of error, and place us in the highway of truth. We will pledge ourself not to be obstinate. But I long for truth, and I admit that wiser heads and firmer nerves than mine have erred in theology, as our past experience proves.

Do we believe the prophecy of Malachi iv., 1, will ever be literally fulfilled—"For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch?" I conclude from what I hear and read from Adventists, that they think this prophecy will be fulfilled at the second coming of Christ; and that will make a final end of all those on whom it will take effect. Do you admit this? If so, and so I am constrained to believe, we will suppose there is a class of men who believe that when the Lord from heaven shall be revealed in flaming fire, etc., that, at that time all the human race that ever lived, will be raised to life, and undergo a scrutinizing judgment, and then and there be rewarded according to their works. Do any of you believe this? If so, I must dissent, for the reason that I cannot conceive that in so doing the Judge of all the earth would do right. But I would not judge the Lord by feeble sense. Yet let God appear to our understanding to be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus. For a judge of any civil code of laws to do right, it would be reasonable to suppose that the dignity of his office would require him to keep himself within the limits of the law by administering equal and impartial justice to all men brought before him.

As we cannot enter into the secret things of God, we must frame our conclusions from what is revealed, for these things belong to us and to our children. In regard to the Day of Judgment, let us inquire, Was it not an awful and destructive judgment of God when the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed? and was not their destruction as final and complete when they and all they had were consumed, as will be that of the proud and such as do wickedly at the last great day of the Lord?

Here let us pause and calmly consider, and earnestly pray, "O Lord, as we approach a crisis in which Thy honor and justice is concerned, and in which our future life may be involved, O Father, give us grace and wisdom to understand, fortitude and meekness to endure and holy boldness to advocate Thy truth: let nothing fall from our lips that shall turn the feet of any out of the way of life. Amen." That the destruction of those cities was their last and final day of judgment; and, also, the judgment on the old world, which being overflowed by water perished, is to my mind conclusive. I cannot possibly conceive that the ashes of those wicked men will ever be gathered and reanimated, simply for the reason of burning them a second time. But those who think otherwise may inquire, "Did not God create man from the dust; and can He not as easily gather their scattered ashes and reanimate them again?" We know He can, and we know at the same time that the Judge of all the earth will do right, and we believe in all his dealings with men, He adapts his glorious purposes to man's reason, so that he can know what are His purposes concerning us. We can see no necessity or object in view in this supposed revival of the Sodomites, etc.

It is assumed by some that it must be done to magnify the law of God. An assumption of this kind looks too slender to be presented. What, to magnify the law of God and make it honorable! To magnify it requires instruments to intensify and expand the vision. Was not the law of God broad enough in its enactments to cover its demands? Was it not large enough to inflict the threatened punishment? If so, where is the necessity of magnifying it at this late period? Are we to suppose that God's law needs to be enlarged by "an act in addition to an act," in the manner in which human legislators patch up and revise laws? It is assumed that the honor of God must be vindicated. Do you see anything in the law, at the time of its enactment, or in the execution of its penalty, that was dishonorable? I do not.

Let us inquire, What is the law of God? God saith "The soul that sinneth it shall die." The apostle says, "The wages of sin is death." All this I firmly believe. I believe, too, that the sting of death is sin, and that the strength of sin is the law: and I am constrained to believe that those who have died in their sins, the sting not having been removed, will never see life; but the wrath of God abideth on them: this being the strength of the law, it holds them in the dominion of death.

Again we inquire earnestly, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Since it is so earnestly contended that all the dead must be raised to life again, at the last day, in order that the wicked may know that they have been wicked, and as a punishment they must die a second time; if we admit this, and admit also that the great work is to accomplished in one day, the transition of the wicked dead will be so sudden and short, that in the general confusion of that unnumbered throng many will hardly perceive that they had been out of death's dominion before they are dead again.

We may be told, "the day is a thousand years." We ask such, if they believe the wicked dead will be raised incorruptible? They have, some of them, told us, "They are raised mortal—just as they went down into the grave, just so will they come up: if they went down with one leg, they are raised with one leg: if they die a drunken bloated sot, just so they will come up." I can hardly see any right doing in this one legged, drunken resurrection; but as some desire to have the judgment and resurrection conducted on this plan, we confess that on such a solemn and important an occasion we would not choose to be found in the one legged and drunken throng—and it seems to us that wives and children who have been murdered by those drunken husbands and fathers would prefer other company.

As to the day, if it is to be, a thousand years, it would seem necessary, if they are mortal, that this vast company should have, something to eat; and unless the time is consumed with miracles to supply them, some of the multitude would die of hunger. If the thousand years day is accepted as the time of judgment, many of the vast multitude would die another natural death and need another resurrection, sometime in the afternoon of that long day, to get their second death; or, more properly, their third.

Do you say, "God can accomplish the work at a glance." We admit it, if such a work is to be done; but we remain to be convinced that the Bible teaches any such work is to take place; and we ask again, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Would it not be an act of partiality if those wicked who are alive when the Lord is revealed in flaming fire, in that day, and who are then punished with "everlasting destruction," and so do not die twice; if others, like the Sodomites, are to be made alive and the scene acted over again of burning them up? Can such an idea be harmonized with the grand inquiry, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" If others think it can, I do not. If any are not burned up twice at that day, as I believe reason and Scripture abundantly forbid, then they escape this theological second death; and in this administration we see justice and truth meet together. O vain men, let us concede the fact that the Judge of all the earth has done and ever will do right.

Stephen is Forever Perished,

IF THERE BE NO RESURRECTION.

Permit us further to examine the theological hypothesis of inherent immortality. Materialism has been charged with being so "repulsive and abhorrent to every right mind," that we feel called upon to vindicate the doctrine at every point assailed by our disputant. And we shall at least be able to devote ourself strictly to the subject, because we shall have no further occasion to expose misrepresentations, and to rebut personal allusions.

In the last assault upon materialism, there is an argument which, viewed in the light of popular theology, does not seem to teach the existence of the soul as a conscious being independently of the body. We refer to the Lord and Stephen commending their "spirits" unto the hand of God. But we must look through theological glasses to see it. If we would have it so, we must not examine the texts very critically. The moment we subject them to fair scrutiny, and compare them with the contexts, the mythological creation of an immaterial soul dissolves into nothingness. Let us therefore examine the texts.

Stephen said, "Lord Jesus, receive my pneuma." Pneuma is the same in the Greek, as the word ruach (rendered breath, wind, air, etc.,) is in Hebrew. The primary signification of these words is the air we breathe, but we have never claimed that this is their only meaning. We admit three other significations, viz: (2) a being, as angels: (3) an influence from a being: (4) a state of feeling, or mind: and we are not aware that the words occur in any passage, which may not properly be classed under one of these significations. Never are they connected with a term indicating that the "spirit" of man is deathless or immortal! The following are examples of each signification:

First. "The pneuma bloweth where it listeth, and thou heareth the sound thereof." Does this prove that the sighing wind, the air we breathe, is a conscious and an immortal soul? It is termed the "breath of life," because it is essential to life, and not an animal in the world can exist without it. "And he sighed deeply in his pneuma." And how else should he sigh? Sighing is a physical motion, a peculiar kind of breathing. Webster says, "a deep single respiration," and the "expression of fatigue, exhaustion, grief, sorrow, or the like." The Syriac version reads—"He sighed with his breath." It is quite fair to conclude, that to consider this sighing as a proof of an immaterial soul, requires an extraordinary stretch of the imagination!

Second. In Heb. i., angels are spoken of as "ministering pneuma sent forth to minister," etc. Here the word refers to beings, and not to immaterial souls within beings, or disembodied beings. Angels have never appeared except as tangible organisms: they have come eating and drinking, and were often mistaken for men. They, the angels, the beings, the individuals, are here called pneuma. "God is a pneuma." Again the word denotes a person, or being. That God is a person, is quite clear from Heb. i., 3. But more of this hereafter.

Third. "The pneuma searcheth all things." "I cast out devils by the pneuma of God." These are examples of the searching influence, mind, power, or disposition, of the Supreme Being.

Fourth. "God has not given us the pneuma of fear." "Stand fast in one pneuma, with one mind." "The pneuma indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak." "If any man have not the pneuma of Christ, he is none of his." These are among the many examples where the word denotes a state of feeling, or disposition of the being, or beings spoken of, and not of immaterial beings within the beings. To say a being is meek and quiet, and in temper or feeling like Christ, is no proof whatever on the side of immateriality.

And now what is the signification of pneuma in Stephen's exclamation, "Lord Jesus, receive my pneuma?" Does it mean his person? Can it mean his feelings, or disposition of mind? or his influence? or was it his breath? Ridicule the idea as you may, we humbly believe it was his breath, if he meant anything that could leave his person. This is what he wished to have taken, if he wished anything to be removed, so that his extreme suffering might end by his falling into the sleep of death.

Job says, "The Spirit of God is in my nostrils." Would it not sound very absurd to say that the Supreme Being was in Job's nostrils? What then is meant? Job alludes to the breath of life! the vitalizing air which is in the nostrils of every living creature! Gen. viii., 17. If pneuma in Stephen's case meant anything that could be separated from his organization, it meant his breath, and nothing more, nothing less.

There is another very important fact to be considered. The word dexai, which is rendered receive, may also be rendered sustain or support. Booth, in his Lexicon of Primitive Greek words, gives this as one of its significations. The supplication of Stephen would, according to this, read, "Lord Jesus, sustain my pneuma," or "assist me to suffer." This harmonizes quite as well with the context. There is no need, however, of this rendering, to make sense and get at the truth.

If pneuma, or spirit, here refers to Stephen's "soul"—soul in the theological sense—and not his breath, there is still no difficulty. The spirit, or whatever pneuma is claimed to be, is not necessarily a deathless and separate entity, because commended to God, or because God is called upon to receive or sustain it. David said, although not then about to die, "Into thine hand I commit my spirit." It was not necessarily the bare spirit divested of the body that David and Stephen committed to the care of God, because pneuma may be intended to signify the entire being. Paul said to the Thessalonians, "I pray God your whole spirit, and soul, and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord." There is no reason to conclude that Stephen did not thus wish to be commended.

If Stephen should never be resurrected, he is forever perished. Paul says, "If there be no resurrection of the dead, then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Now where is Stephen? He is dead! And if there is no resurrection, what then? He is forever perished. Nothing but a resurrection to eternal life will ever save him from the power of eternal death.

The narrative shows too plainly that the faithful Stephen, the one who is to be resurrected, the one who is to become like Christ and live eternally, was not that which left his body. The following questions are all fatal to the interpretation of the immaterialists. Whom did the mob "hurry" out of the city? Stephen. Whom did they "stone?" Stephen. Who "kneeled down?" Stephen. Who "cried with a loud voice?" Stephen. Who prayed that God would not lay this murder to their "charge?" Stephen. Who "fell asleep?" Stephen. Unto whose "death" did Saul consent? Stephen's. Who was "carried" by devout men "to his burial?" Stephen. Over whom did these devout men make "great lamentations?" Stephen. Who is now "asleep" in Christ? Stephen. Who is returned unto dust? Stephen. Who is perished if there be no resurrection of the dead? Stephen. Who shall be raised when "the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible?" Stephen. Yes, Stephen, the real Stephen, the only Stephen, is now under the bonds of the death which through Adam all men die. The "spirit" was not Stephen, if it was that which left his body, any more than the ruach (pneuma) in Job's nostrils was Job himself or God himself. The pronouns "he," "his," and "him," in the account of his martyrdom, all represent the same person, the one who was stoned to death, the one who shall live again, and not another Stephen.

In the case of Christ's death the immaterialists have no additional argument, except that after commending his pneuma into the hands of his Father, it is said he "gave up the ghost." Parkhurst, in his Greek and English Lexicon, says, "And it may be worth remarking that the leading sense of the old English word ghost is breath, and is from the same root with gust of wind; and that both these words are plain derivatives from a Hebrew word signifying to move with violence: whence also gust." And most evidently it is the true sense of the word in this instance. To give up the ghost is nothing more than to resign the life.

There is not one clear proof in all the Bible that "souls" exist separate from the body as conscious, intelligent, and responsible beings. Many passages have been cited in this controversy, but not one has been proved to oppose the doctrine of man's total mortality. No one text will fairly sustain that interpretation. In fact, those advanced even prove that the "everlasting punishment" of the wicked will consist in their not being permitted to enter into "eternal life," as for instance, Matth. xxv., 46. We regret that immaterialists will not undertake to reconcile the many plain texts by which materialism is sustained, with the horrible dogma of eternal torment and the mythological delusion of inherent immortality. He may term these "atheistic" sentiments, he may express his horror in such terms as "repulsive and abhorrent," and class us with "infidels," but such speech ill becomes one who fails to prove that they are not sound Bible doctrines.—Materialist.—Luminary.

Some employments may be better than others; but there is no employment so bad as having none at all. The mind will contract a rust and an unfitness for everything, and a man must either fill up his time with good, or at least innocent business, or it will run to the worst sort of waste—to sin and vice.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in thei order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition; in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

A FUTURE LIFE.

A CRITICAL HISTORY OF THE DOCTRINE OF A FUTURE LIFE, by William R. Alger, New York; W. J. Widdleton.

THIS is a work of interest, of near 700 pages, octavo, to which is added an "Appendix" of the "Literature of the Doctrine of a Future Life; or a Catalogue of Works relating to the Nature, Origin and Destiny of the Soul," etc. This Appendix contains some 200 pages, and for reference is exceedingly valuable. It forms a work by itself, and we understand can be had separately, if desired, but we presume few would wish it in that way, but would wish both parts combined. If they purchase it, they should be careful to state their wish in the matter, as the two parts are now published in separate volumes as well as combined. Of the above work "The Advance" in its notice says:

It would be both dishonorable and useless to deny its ability and scholarly value because we differ widely from some of its doctrinal positions, and regard its author as a teacher of error in a heretical sect. Mr. Alger is of the "progressive" or rationalistic type of Unitarian ministers, but he is a man of ability and learning, and has produced a volume of much historic value and quite needful in a minister's library, although its criticisms and original teachings are of the most undisguised Universalist character. . . . The research of the author is obvious, his statements are clear, intended to be just, and usually are so; his logical and critical powers are worthy of respect, and are advantageously used on many points; and his style is attractive, though a little too sensational for a production otherwise so scholarly. Mr. Alger is a determined foe of the doctrine of eternal punishment, and spares no argument or invective against it.

Mr. Alger, however, holds fast to the immortal soul theory, and rejects the idea of "annihilation." So far he agrees with the "orthodoxy" of this age; but of "Orthodoxy's hell" he is a most determined foe. On page 546 he says:

"The doctrine of eternal damnation, as it has prevailed in the Christian church, appears to the natural man so unreasonable, immoral, and harrowingly frightful, when earnestly contemplated, that there have always been some who have shrunk from its representations and sought to escape its conclusions. Many of its strongest advocates in every age have avowed it to be a fearful mystery, resting on the inscrutable sovereignty of God, and beyond the power of man's faculties to explain and justify."

A few devout and powerful minds have sought to avoid the gross horrors and unreasonableness of the usual view of this subject, by changing the mechanical and arithmetical values of the terms for spiritual and religious values. They give the word "eternity" a qualitative instead of a quantitative meaning. The everlasting woe of the damned consists not in mechanical inflictions of torture and numerical increments of duration, but in spiritual discord, alienation from God, a wretched state of being, with which times and spaces have nothing to do.

How much better were it for the advocates of the popular theory, instead of forcing their moral nature to bear up against the awful perplexities and misgivings as to the justice and goodness of God necessarily raised in them whenever they really face the dark problems of their system of faith, resolutely to ask whether there are any such problems in the actual government of God, or anywhere else, except in their own "Bodies of Divinity!" It is an extremely unfortunate and discreditable evasion of responsibility when any man, especially when a teacher, takes for granted the received formularies handed down to him, and, instead of honestly analyzing their genuine significance and probing their foundations to see if they be good and true, spends his genius in contriving excuses and supports for them.

It is the very worst policy at this day to strive to fasten the dogma of eternal misery to the New Testament. If both must be taken or rejected together—an alternative which we emphatically deny—what sincere and earnest thinker now, whose will is unterrifiedly consecrated to truth, can be expected to hesitate long? The doctrine is sustained in repute at present principally for two reasons. First, because it has been transmitted to us from the church of the past as the established and authoritative doctrine. It is yet technically current and popular because it has been so: that is, it retains its place simply by right of possession. The question ought to be sincerely and universally raised whether it is true or false. Then it will swiftly lose its prestige and disappear. Secondly, it is upheld and patronized by many as a useful instrument for frightening the people and through their fears deterring them from sin. We have ourselves heard clergymen of high reputation say that it would never do to admit, before the people, that there is any chance whatever of penitence and salvation beyond the grave, because they would be sure to abuse the hope as a sort of permission to indulge and continue in sin. Thus to ignore the only solemn and worthy standard of judging an abstract doctrine, namely, Is is a truth or a falsehood? and put it solely on grounds of working expediency, is disgraceful, contemptible, criminal. Watts exposes with well-merited rebuke a gross instance of pious fraud in Burnet, who advised preachers to teach the eternity of future punishment whether they believed it or not. It is by such a course that error and superstition reign, that truckling conformity, intellectual disloyalty, moral indifference, vice and infidelity abound. It is practical atheism, debauchery of conscience, and genuine spiritual death. Besides, the course we are characterizing is actually as inexpedient in practice as it is wrong in theory. Experience and observation show it to be as pernicious in its result, as it is immoral in its origin. Is a threat efficacious over men in proportion to its intrinsic terror, or in proportion as it is personally felt and feared by them? Do the menacing penalties of a sin deter a man from it in proportion to their awfulness, or in proportion to his belief in their reality and unavoidableness? Eternal misery would be a threat of infinite frightfulness, if it were realized and believed. But it is incredible. Some reject it with indignation and an impetuous recoil that sends them much too far toward antinomianism. Others let it float in the spectral background of imagination, the faint reflection of a disagreeable and fading dream. To all it is an unreality. An earnest belief in a sure retribution exactly limited to desert must be far more effective. If an individual had a profound conviction that for every sin he committed he must suffer a million centuries of inexpressible anguish, realizing that thought, would he commit a sin?

If he cannot appreciate that enormous penalty, much less can he the infinite one, which is far more likely to shade off and blur out into a vague and remote nothing. Truth is an expression of God's will, which we are bound exclusively to accept and employ regardless of consequences. When we do that, God, the author of truth, is himself soley responsible for the consequences. But when, thinking we can advise something that will work better, we use some theory of our own, we are responsible for the consequences. Let every one beware how he ventures to assume that dread responsibility. It is surely folly as well as sin. For nothing can work so well as truth, the simple, calm, living truth, which is a chime in the infinite harmony of morals and things. It is only the morbid melodramatic tastes and incompetencies of an unfinished culture that make men think otherwise. The magnificent poetry of the day of judgment—an audience of five hundred thousand millions gathered in one throng as the Judge rises to pronounce the last oration over a dissolving universe—takes possession of the fancy, and people conceive it so vividly, and are so moved by it, that they think they see it to be true.

Grant for a moment the truth of the conception of hell as a physical world of fiery torture full of the damned. Suppose the scene of probation over, hell filled with its prisoners shut up, banished and buried in the blackest deeps of space. Can it be left there forever? Can it be that the roar of its furnace shall rage on, and the wail of the execrable anguish ascend eternally? Endeavor to realize in some faint degree what these questions mean, and then answer If anybody can find it in his heart or in his head to say yes, and can gloat over the idea, and wish to have it continually brandished in terrorem over the heads of the people, one feels impelled to declare that he of all men the most needs to be converted to the Christian spirit. An unmitigated hell of depravity, pain, and horror, would be Satan's victory and God's defeat; for the very wish of a Satanic being must be for the everlasting prevalence of sin and wretchedness. As above the weltering hosts of the lost, each dreadful second, the iron clock of hell ticked the thunder-word "eternity," how would the devil on his sulphurous dais shout in triumph! But if such a world of fire, crowded with the writhing damned, ever existed at all, could it exist forever?

Could the saved be happy and passive in heaven when the muffled shrieks of their brethren, faint from the distance, fell on their ears? In tones of love and pity that would melt the very mountains, they would plead with God to pardon and free the lost. Many a mourning lover would realize the fable of the Thracian poet who wandered into Hades searching for his Eurydice; many a heroic son would emulate the legend of the Grecian god who burst through the iron walls of Tartarus and rescued his mother, the unfortunate Semele, and led her in triumph up to heaven.

Could the angels be contented when they contemplated the far-off, lurid orb and knew the agonies that fed its conscious conflagration? Their gentle bosoms would be racked with commiserating pangs, they would fly down and hover around that anguished world, to moisten its parched tongues with the dropping of their sympathetic tears, and to cool its burning brows with the fanning of their wings.

Could Christ be satisfied? he who once was rich, but for our sakes became poor? he whose loving soul breathed itself forth in the tender words, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest?" He who poured his blood on Judea's awful summit, be satisfied? Not until he had tried the efficacy of ten thousand fresh crucifixions, on as many new Calvaries, would he rest.

Could God suffer it? God! with the full rivers of superfluous bliss rolling round thy throne, couldst thou look down and hear thy creatures calling thee Father, and see them plunging in a sea of fire eternally—eternally—eternally—and never speak the pardoning word? It would not be like thee, it would be like thine adversary, to do that. Not so wouldst thou do. But if Satan had millions of prodigals, snatched from the fold of thy family, shut up and tortured in hell, paternal yearnings after them would fill thy heart. Love's smiles would light the dread abyss where they groan. Pity's tears would fall over it, shattered by the radiance into rainbows. And through that illumination THOU wouldst descend, marching beneath the arch of its triumphal glories to the rescue of thy children! Therefore we rest in hope knowing that "Thou wilt not leave our souls in hell."

Who can blame a believer in inherent immortality for such sentiments as the foregoing? But more than ever we see and feel the utter irreconcilability of the immortal soul theory with any theory based on the word of God. More than ever are we settled and grounded that any future life revealed in God's message to us is only to be obtained as a "gift of God through Christ," to such, and to such only, as have accepted the "Light" God has given them, in whatever dispensation they may have lived. "The King eternal" requires only the improvement of what he has given; and he who refuses that, dies, and his death is eternal: the righteous only live hereafter, or, they only rise from the dead "at the last day."

FRIENDS EARNESTLY AT WORK.

THE "Review," a paper published in the interests of the "orthodox" branch of the Society of Friends, contains the following statement of circumstances attending a large accession to the society within the limits of one "subordinate" meeting in Ohio. It says:

"So far as human agency was concerned in this awakening, it was in this wise:

"Nearly one year ago, a committee was appointed by the Monthly Meeting to hold meetings for worship and tract readings, and to visit families, where there was an opening for it, with and among those not in membership with Friends, but who lived in neighborhoods adjacent, and had few religious advantages. A First-day school was established and kept up during the summer and fall in a school-house. Many of the families, who have since applied for membership, were visited by a part of the Committee. Meetings for worship and tract readings were held alternately on nearly every First-day afternoon.

"About two months ago, meetings were commenced of evenings, continuing every evening for about two weeks in one school-house, and in daytime meetings were held nearly every day in some dwelling-house, (school being in session in the school-house in daytime.) Such meetings were held in three different school-houses. Those who attended were the dwellers on an area of say six or eight square miles of contiguous territory.

"In these meetings the gospel was preached 'in the demonstration of the Spirit and with power.' Several of the most active workers, ministers and others, remained in the neighborhood most of the time, visiting from house to house, between meetings, and laboring with those who were under conviction. The people flocked together, filling the houses to their utmost capacity, many being compelled to stand during an entire session for want of seats.

"After the series of meetings closed, many gave their names as applicants to be joined in membership with Friends. When their application reached the Monthly Meeting, a committee of six men and six women Friends were appointed, to visit them in their families, and report to next meeting the names of those whom in their opinion it would be proper to recommend for admission to the Church.

"The Committee entered upon their work with a deep feeling of the responsibility resting upon them, and with uplifted hearts to Him who 'giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not,' for the guidance and help of the Holy Spirit. On visiting them in their homes, we found that the work of grace had been very deep in most of their hearts, and that they were already bringing forth 'the fruits of the Spirit.' After they had thus been visited in a private way, they were called together, and the leading doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends were explained to them, with which they all seemed to be satisfied, although to many of them it was looking at things from an entirely new stand-point.

"When first visited, there were a few of them who thought that water baptism was a command of Christ, and they must submit to it. Their attention was called to the text, 'One Lord, one faith, one baptism.' They were deeply in earnest to know the truth. In this condition the committee left them. After a few days they were again visited, when it was found they were entirely out of the waters and the fog. They said, 'We have read our Testaments carefully and prayerfully, and have become fully satisfied that the "ONE BAPTISM" is that of Christ, which is not of water but the Holy Ghost, and we can only wonder that we had never seen it so before.'

"The committee reported 155 names as in their judgment in a condition to be admitted into religious fellowship with Friends. The Monthly Meeting, with much feeling and great unanimity, opened the arms of the church and received them into membership. A committee was appointed to inform them of their reception. Four other persons living in a different neighborhood were received the same day, making 159 in all.

"'This is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.' To Him be the glory forever!"

This, we think, may truly be said to be "the largest number of persons ever received into the Society of Friends in one day." We learn also that one meeting in Tennessee has lately received ninety-three persons into membership. We heartily congratulate our fellow laborers in the vineyard of the Lord, and trust they may continue to receive such substantial and blessed encouragement. As a society, a marked change has come over them. From a condition of inactivity (and that only a few years in the past) which threatened their very existence, they are developing an earnest activity, an invincible determination to stamp their impressions of truth upon others, that will soon place them in the front ranks of workers for Jesus. Unlike too many other religionists, large numbers of them are becoming zealous students of the Bible. As a result of this the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and second coming of Christ, both of which had come to be almost universally denied, are rapidly spreading among them, and not a few have already come to a knowledge of the truth as to man's nature, and God's purposes respecting the race. We look with no small degree of confidence for a liberal growth of the "Life views" among this class of Friends; for, though, like others, they have many and varied prejudices to overcome, their researches after truth are not opposed and hindered by the many obstacles that well-nigh forbid any progress on the part of those who are allied to a jealous and designing priesthood, to say nothing of the bonds of iron-clad, man-made creeds. We trust our friends will not grow weary in their efforts to know the truth, and that those already blessed with advancement in the knowledge of it will let their light shine, faithfully proclaiming the good word in meekness and godly fear, for a rich field of labor has opened to them. To this class we would say, if you are only loyal to the important trusts confided to you, the time will soon come when a glance over your ranks will be rewarded with the spectacle of such an army of valiant "soldiers of the cross," arrayed in the impenetrable armor of truth, as will constrain you often to exclaim, "this is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes."

SECOND COMING OF CHRIST:

EVENTS CONNECTED THEREWITH.

BY WILLIAM H. WHITMAN.

BR. STORRS: We have thought considerably upon the above subject; and wish to present some of our thoughts to the HERALD's readers, if you think them worthy. There were certain noted events that transpired in the first advent. For instance, there was the birth of Jesus, in fulfilment of the prophecy of Micah v., 2. See Matth. ii, 6, Luke ii., 11–14. Another noted event was, the Holy Spirit descending on him, after his baptism, and God owning him as his Son. Matth. iii., 13–17. The third noted event was, his riding into Jerusalem on the colt, in fulfilment of Zech. ix., 9. Fourth, He was crucified, buried, and rose again the third day.

Here are four noted events; and it takes all of them, we think, to accomplish the first advent of Jesus. We merely mention the above to make our idea more clear on the second coming. His second coming will consist of a succession of events.

1. He will come as a thief in the night. 1 Thess. v., 2.

2. He will come like the lightning. Matth. xxiv., 27.

3. He will come as a great warrior. Zech. xiv., 3.

4. He will come as a peace maker. Zech. ix., 10, Micah iv., 3.

In the first event, the Lord Jesus will descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God. At this period, all the dead, small and great, stand before God, (in judgment,) and the books are opened; and another book is opened, which is the book of life; and the dead will be judged out of those things written in the (symbolical) books, according to their works. Rev. xx., 12.

Here will be a judgment on all the dead; then comes the execution. They that are accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, (Luke xx., 35) will be made alive. The sea, death, and hades, will deliver up the dead in them, and they will all come forth immortal, never to die any more. (Luke xx., 36, 1 Cor. xv., 42–51.) Here is the executive judgment on all the dead, in accordance with the law under which they have lived. Then comes the judgment upon the living. The believers which are alive, and remain on the earth, will be changed from mortality to immortality; then all will be caught away together (that is, those that have been raised, and those that have been changed) in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air. So shall the believers ever be with the Lord. Here ends the individual judgment, and its execution.

Then John vi., 39, 40, 44, 54, 1 Cor. xv., 24–26, 51–55, will be realized. This event will mark the commencement of the day of the Lord; which will come as a thief on all the world, except the foolish virgins. They will be looking for Jesus, but will not have enough oil, (spirit) to take them in to the feast. The nations of earth will hardly miss the few living ones that will be translated. Perhaps it may be a three days, wonder what has become of them. They will not even know that the day of grace is closed. Jesus and the saints will descend to the earth together, (perhaps to Mount Sinai, or some secret place) and arrange an organization for the government of the world. All this will be unknown to the nations of the earth.

In the second event, Jesus and the saints will appear, after a lapse of time, on the Mount of Olives, as a great warrior, and in time of great trouble, (Zech. xiv., 4, 5), and this news will be flashed over the earth like lightning. Matth. xxiv., 27.

In the third event, "The Lord will go forth and fight against those nations, as when he fought in the day of battle." Then will begin the judgments upon the nations of earth. Jesus will set up a kingdom then, that will break in pieces all other kingdoms. He will take authority in the land of Canaan; which will arouse the nations to arms. They will go up to take Jesus and his saints; not knowing who they are. He will then execute judgment on them, as it is recorded in Zech. xiv., Matth. xxv., 31–46, Joel iii., and many parallel texts that speaks of national judgments, Jesus is ruling in the midst of his enemies. Psa. cx., 1–6.

Fourth event. After all his enemies are subdued, he will send forth his laws over the remnant, or left of the nations, and they will beat their swords into ploughares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. They shall fear him as long as the sun and moon endure. In his day shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth. He shall have dominion also, from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him, and all nations shall serve him. Blessed be his glorious name forever: and the whole earth shall be filled with his glory. Amen, and amen.

A great deal more could be said upon each one of the above mentioned events, which will succeed each other in order, and also will occupy periods of time. Therefore may not Jesus appear at any time to take away his waiting ones? But as short articles are preferable to long ones, we will close, hoping to hear from abler pens upon the events connected with the second coming of Christ.

GALESBURG, ILL., April, 1869.

THE RESURRECTION IGNORED.

"Say ye, His disciples came by night and stole Him away while we slept . . . and this is reported among the Jews until this day." Matth. xxviii., 13–15.

Are the Jews the only class of persons who in effect deny the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead? Protestant Christians profess to believe it: it is in their creeds; yet their clergy seldom, or never introduce it in their ministrations—while they have solemnly promised to declare the whole counsel of God. They surely do not believe the resurrection to be among His counsels. Listen to the morning thanks and invocations in the churches! How seldom, if ever, are thanks expressed that God the Father has, on the morning of the first day of the week, brought from the dead the Lord Jesus. Everything almost is remembered, while the great event that towers above all else is ignored. Why this, if it is believed? Paul did not esteem it so insignificant an interest. After stating our lost condition, if Christ be not risen—still in sin—preaching vain—hope vain—triumphantly exclaims, "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept."

I have constantly attended upon the ministrations of the orthodox clergy for fifty or sixty years, and have never heard from them but one sermon on the resurrection; that was in 1833, from a young Licentiate. I was surprised that the Bible made so much of the resurrection. I should now pronounce the author of such a sermon a Life-believer; yet he was not, and is not now, that I know of. He is honored with the title of D. D., and has probably learned ere this better than to preach such sermons. The truth is, he gave us a plain Bible discourse on the resurrection—much as Paul preached, which many saw clashed with an intermediate conscious state without it.

It seems from the record, that the Disciples found more opposition to this doctrine than all others. Some were grieved; some mocked, while others declared that they brought "strange things to their ears." What hinders this cardinal doctrine now, in this enlightened age, and this professedly Christian nation? A Bible reader can hardly fail to see that it is the key note of salvation—the foundation on which the hope of eternal life rests, through Christ. And yet Christian watchmen neglect to preach it! What, but vain Philosophy—immortal soulism? They cannot harmonize the two, and therefore wisely let the resurrection alone or treat it as a non-essential; for the shell the man has inhabited is of little consequence after he drops this mortal coil and is a glorified, disembodied spirit without it. How foolish, Paul was to strive for an event of so little consequence! He must have been beside himself, as Felix charged him, when he speaks of the power of Christ's resurrection! What power can there be in that which is of so little moment that the professed lovers of truth and teachers of righteousness never bring it before their hearers except to read it from the Bible or in their creeds? O, say they, we believe in the resurrection—we have no idea that the disciples stole Him away! "How forcible are right words," said Job, "but what does your arguing prove?" Unbelief is plain as a sunbeam.

There is power in the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead that can be comprehended only by those who expect life from the dead through Him. To them it is the rising star of hope. Christ is risen and the Spirit that raised Him will quicken all who sleep in Him, saith Paul. Jesus bears the same testimony, oft repeated in John vi, promising to all who believe in Him eternal Life, and that He will raise them up at the last day.

LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

ST. PAUL, MINN., May, 1869.

WRESTLING PRAYER.

THERE'S nae good dune, John, till ye get to the close grups." So said Jeems, the doorkeeper, of Broughton Place Church, Edinburgh, to the immortal Dr. John Brown, the author of "Rab and his Friends." Old Jeems got into a marvellous nearness with God in prayer, and conversed with him as he would with his "ain father." He understood the power of a close grip when an earnest soul is wrestling with God for a blessing. Jacob, the patriarch, had such a struggle in that remarkable and mystical scene at the Penuel. We are told that he wrestled with the angel until the breaking of the day. The angel said, "Let me go, the day breaketh." Here was a trial of the patriarch's faith. "What is that to me," thought the eager man; "that the day is breaking? I must have the blessing now. There is no daylight of hope for me unless I obtain what I am struggling for. I will not let thee go, except thou bless me!" He triumphed on the spot. So clung the Syro-Phenician mother to Christ when she was beseeching him to heal her sick daughter. The Master seemed to put her off, in order to try the mettle of her faith. But she came up into what the old Scotchman called a closer grip with the heart of infinite love, and she carried the day. "Go thy way," said Jesus unto her. "Oh, woman, great is thy faith; be it unto thee even as thou wilt." And so he granted to a great faith what he might have denied to a little faith. Precisely so is it with Christians now, and with churches. An honest, persevering faith—a faith that works while it prays, a faith that holds on though discouragements—achieves the result it pleads for. For faith creates such a condition of things that it is wise for God to grant what would otherwise be denied.—Selected.

The Words of Jesus.

"Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said" . . . "Because I live ye shall live also." John xiv., 19.

THE IMMUTABLE PLEDGE.

God sometimes selects the most stable and enduring objects in the material world to illustrate his unchanging faithfulness and love to his church.

"As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so doth the Lord compass his people." But here the Redeemer fetches an argument from His own everlasting nature. He stakes, so to speak, his own existence on that of his saints. "Because I live, ye shall live also." Believer! read in this "word of Jesus" thy glorious title-deed. Thy Saviour lives—and his life is the guarantee of thine own. One true Joseph is alive. "He is our Brother." He talks kindly to us. That life of his is all that is between us and everlasting ruin. But with Christ for our life, how inviolable our security! The great Fountain of being must first be dried up before the streamlet can. The great sun must first be quenched ere one glimmering satellite which he lights up with his splendor can. Satan must first pluck the crownfrom that glorified head before he can touch one jewel in the crown of his people. They cannot shatter one pillar without shaking first the throne. "If we perish," says Luther, "Christ perisheth with us." Reader, is thy life now "hid with Christ in God?" Dost thou know the blessedness of a vital and living union with a living Life-giving Saviour? Canst thou say with humble and joyous confidence amid the fitfulness of thine own ever. changing frames and feelings, "Nevertheless, I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me?" "Jesus liveth!" They are the happiest words a lost soul and a lost world can hear. Job, four thousand years ago, rejoiced in them. "I know," says he, "that I have a living Kinsman." John, in his Patmos exile, rejoiced in them: "I am he that liveth" (or the living One), was the simple but sublime utterance with which he was addressed by that same "Kinsman" when he appeared arrayed in the lustre of his glorified humanity.

"This is the record" (as if there was a whole gospel comprised in the statement) "that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son." St. Paul, in chapter viii. to the Romans—that finest portraiture of Christian character and privilege ever drawn, begins with "no condemnation," and ends with, "no separation." Why no separation? Because the life of the believer is incorporated with that of the adorable Head and Surety. The colossal heart of redeemed humanity beats upon the throne, sending its mighty pulsations through every member of his body, so that, before the believer's spiritual life can be destroyed, Omnipotence must become feebleness, and immutability become mutable!

But, blessed Jesus, "Thy word is very sure, therefore thy servant loveth it."

"I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand."—Selected by A. Powell.

Pray with Your Children.

A young mother made it her daily practice to carry her little ones in supplication to the throne of grace, and yet complained of a want of faith and definiteness in asking for them the influences of the Holy Spirit.

"Do you pray for each child separately, and by name?" inquired the Pastor.

"No, that has never been my habit," was the reply.

"I think it of much importance as a help to our faith and to the clearness and intensity of our desire on their behalf. You pray with them, I trust, as well as for them?"

"Sometimes I do, but not often."

"Let me persuade you, then, to take your little son and daughter each separately to the place of prayer, and kneeling with them before the Lord, tell him the name, the daily history, the special want of each, and see if your heart is not opened to plead for them as you have never done before."

Tears were in the eyes of the young mother as she said, with trembling lips, "I'll try."

As evening came she had not forgotten her promise; but as she saw that Sarah, her daughter, was unusually peevish, she thought it best to take her little son first to her chamber. Willie was a bright and pleasant boy of five years, and when his mother whispered her wish to pray with him he gladly put his hand in hers and knelt by her side. As he heard his name mentioned before the Lord a tender hush fell upon his young spirit, and he clasped his mother's fingers more tightly as each petition for his special need was breathed into the ear of his Father in heaven. And did not the clinging of that little hand warm her heart to new and more fervent desire as she poured forth her supplication to the Hearer and Answerer of prayer?

When the mother and child rose from their knees Willie's face was like a rainbow, smiling through tears.

"Mamma, mamma," said he, "I am glad you told Jesus my name; now he'll know me when I get to heaven. And when the kind angels that carry little children to the Saviour take me and lay me in his arms, Jesus will look at me so pleasant and say, 'Why, this is Willie Huston; his mother told me about him; how happy I am to see you, Willie.' Won't that be nice, mamma?"

Mrs. Huston never forgot the scene. And when she was permitted to see not only her dear Willie and Sarah, but the children afterward added to her family circle, each successively consecrating the dew of their youth to God, she did indeed feel that her Pastor's plan was "the more excellent way." So she resolved to recommend it to praying mothers by telling them this touching incident.—Selected.

More "Translations."

A short time since we gave an account by a "D. D." of the translation of one man in the city of Brooklyn, N. Y. Since that a terribly disastrous railroad break-down occurred, a few miles out of the same city, by which several persons were instantly killed, mangled in a most horrible manner, literally torn to pieces, the bottom of the car being swept away, dropping the car flat upon the road, and dragging the passengers under a grinding process till life was extinct, and mangled bodies, nearly unrecognizable, were strewed on the bloody road. The account was read with horror. Among these victims of railroad butchery were three worthy members of churches in Brooklyn, highly esteemed, and justly so, we presume, from what we learn of them. These three were relatives, by marriage or otherwise. One of them, Mrs. Pray, was a daughter of the venerable Judge Dykeman, of Brooklyn, and with her, her son, Dr. Pray, a young man of much promise, and a member of H. W. Beecher's church. The other, Wm. C. Rushmore, President of Atlantic Bank, Brooklyn, and brother-in-law to Mrs. Pray, whose sister he married.

By this calamity it will be seen that Judge Dykeman lost a daughter, a grandson, and a son-in-law. This was a crushing event to our aged friend, but we doubt not he found the grace of God sufficient for him, and many have sympathized with him; but from what we have known of him in years gone by, we do not believe that the language employed by Mr. Beecher at the funeral, and since reiterated by the "Christian Advocate," of this city, found any response in Judge Dykeman's heart or understanding. They both represent these deaths a "translation." Mr. Beecher is reported to have said at the funeral that, it was a "day of triumph." The following extracts from the "Christian Advocate" of last week will show what sentiments on the subject are entertained by Mr. B. and the "Advocate." The article is headed "Consolation in Disaster." Much of it is good, and the reflections worthy of a Christian paper, but toward the close we find the following:

> Death must have come to them sooner or later, as to us all. How were they to enter heaven, the eternal life, without death?

Thus the resurrection from the dead, the hope of the gospel, is set aside, and "death, the wages sin," opens the door into "heaven." Death is glorified, and Jesus, "the resurrection and the life," is set aside. But again, says the "Ch. Advocate:"

> Their departure was probably instantaneous. The blow fell, and they were in the skies; and we, beholding the mere material effects of their instant translation, are dismayed.

What shall be said of such theology? If it had come from professed Spiritualists, it could readily be said, "Behold the result of a rejection of the Bible and its teaching: the resurrection ignored—apparently, not thought of, and utterly rejected." Such is the fruit of traditions, and the result of the false teaching as to man's nature. How long will professedly Christian men "make void the counsel of God, that they may establish their own traditions?"

Our Lord says of the believer, "I will raise him up at the last day." Paul tells us when that day is, viz., "at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible," etc. 1 Corth. xv., 52. 'Not so," saith corrupted theology, "their departure" at death, yea, by death, is to "the skies"—"instant translation." Let not such teachers ever again reproach any one with being "infidels." If such teaching is not infidelity, can they tell us what is? It is setting aside the main doctrine of the Bible—"the resurrection from the dead." No wonder the "Christian Advocate" nor Mr. Beecher, either of them, says anything of the resurrection connected with this matter: they both "preach another gospel" from that preached by Christ and his apostles.

The "Advocate," after thus speaking of the "instant translation" of these murdered ones, by railroad mismanagement, says:

> Mr. Beecher both forcibly and happily illustrated the truth of the case by an anecdote. A boy who had been for years from his home in New York, wandering over the world, returned to seek his parents, but they had moved, and time had changed the whole city. He spent the day in seeking them up and down many streets; at last, wearied out, he applied at a house, and leaning against the door in his exhaustion, it was pressed open; the noise drew the family from an apartment; his parents were the occupants, and fell upon his neck! So these wearied ones had been seeking heaven; they were leaning against the door, it unexpectedly opened, and lo! all beyond was heaven.

Let us contrast such human inventions to comfort mourners with Paul's manner of doing it. "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope: for if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus [not those who are in the 'skies' by a 'translation'] will God bring with him." [Where did God bring Jesus from? Let the same apostle tell: "The God of peace that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus:" Heb. xiii., 20.] "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, [not by man's traditions], that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent [literally, precede or go before], them which are asleep: for the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv., 13–18.

How does Paul's method of comforting us about our friends who have died in the Lord agree with Mr. Beecher's and the "Christian Advocate?" Surely light and darkness are not more opposed than the two methods. Paul speaks "by the word of the Lord:" they speak by the traditions of men. No wonder the apostle said to the Colossians' "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ." Col. ii., 8.

How long shall we follow "cunningly-devised fables" about going to heaven by death, and calling it "translation;" making "death the gate to endless joy," instead of waiting for God's Son from heaven to raise the dead in Christ and change the living saints, that they "shall not see death?" How long, O, Lord, how long shall thy word be turned into foolishness by the devices of men? and the hope of the gospel be buried under the rubbish of human traditions, which originated in heathen speculations, and were brought into the church by men who had a profession of Christianity, but understood not the great principles relating to a future life through a resurrection from the dead, or a change at the last day, if alive at the last trump?

Shall truth be longer trampled under foot by such sentiments as those contained in the foregoing extracts? O, ye men of God, who have received some light on the mehod by which the gospel proposes to give men eternal life, how long will you keep your light under a bushel while you are asked "How" men are "to enter heaven without death?" as if death, and not Christ, is "the door" to "eternal life" through which we must pass to reach the promised glory? Will you, for any cause, still hold your peace and see Christ and the resurrection set aside to save human traditions? Ye men of God, show yourselves and "stand up for Jesus," at whatever cost. He has long enough been crucified in the house of his professed friends. "Death" is extolled, and Jesus, "the resurrection and the life," is practically ignored, and "Death brings the crown of life." Jesus says, "I will give you a crown of life"—"I will raise you up at the last day:" but they tell us death is the way.

"A Man of Straw."

"The Advent Herald," (orthodox), last week, in replying to a correspondent, making inquiries as to whether a tract called, "Semi-Sadduceeism Exposed," etc., had been criticised by any one, says,

> The criticism of Eld. Storrs is the only one we have met with; and that our correspondent may judge for himself how effectually he has demolished it (?) we will give the tract, followed by his criticism.

It then gives the contents of the tract, and what it calls "Eld. Storrs' criticism." We gave no formal criticism of that tract: we considered it beneath criticism. The points in it, if it had any, have been met and refuted so often, and the writer was so manifestly ignorant of the subject he undertook to write about that we considered it altogether superfluous to formally criticise it. We said:

> She quotes the texts, "No man hath ascended into heaven, but he who came down from heaven, even the Son of man which is in heaven:" and "If Christ be not risen, then they also who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished;" both of which she summarily disposes of, and then adds, "These two [texts] are all the New Testament texts which it is pretended teach the doctrine."
> We do not like to attribute to a "Lady" either ignorance or deliberate falsehood; but if the author of such a statement had been a man we could not avoid the conclusion that he was a great ignoramus, or else uttered a known falsehood. But a "Lady" cannot be supposed to merit language so severe applied to her, so we are compelled to conclude, that "as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety," so this good "Lady" has been deceived by too much confidence in some pretended theologian who had not the manliness openly to show himself, but follows the illustrious example of the supposed author of the text, "Thou shalt not surely die."

Thus it will be seen why we did not give a "criticism" of the tract. There were, probably, none of our readers so ignorant as not to see the author of that tract was a mere pettifogger, who understood not the subject, and dealt in a few bald texts without regard to their contexts, and ignoring the general tenor of the Bible, and numerous texts which as clearly contradict the theory attempted to be established by the tract, as language can do it. We said:

> Her object is to "prevent" the spread of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ;" or of, No future life without a resurrection from the dead. This doctrine she calls "Semi-Sadduceeism," and affirms the believers in it "cannot produce one text in the New Testament which teaches it." Suppose this assertion were true, is she willing to stake her doctrine of an "immortal soul" on the finding of "one text in the New Testament which teaches it?' We will go a step further—If she can find one text in the Bible, anywhere, that saith, "The soul is immortal," or that man's "spirit is deathless" we pledge ourself to travel all the way to Minnesota, and on our knees confess to this "Lady" our great error in ever having promulgated the doctrine of "No future life out of Christ;" and that such life is only conferred on the saints by a resurrection at the last day, or a change to immortality, if alive when the last day comes. If she cannot find one text in the Bible affirming "the soul is immortal," is she willing to confess her error? We will help her to one that comes nearest to her view to be found in the Bible; it is this, "Thou shalt not surely die." Gen. iii., 4. The author of those words she may determine for herself.

How did this challenge affect our "orthodox" editor of "The Advent Herald?" Listen! He says:

> It is easy to set up, like a man of straw, the phrase "immortal soul" (a phrase which we never use) and then knock it down as Elder Storrs does, but when that is done the Scripture texts advanced in the tract in support of the doctrine of consciousness between death and resurrection are still to be disposed of.

We are glad to learn that our "orthodox" brother has made some advance toward the truth. He has discovered "the phrase 'immortal soul'" is "like a man of straw," and he "never" uses it. We are glad of that. How long is it since "Eld. Storrs knocked it down," so that "The Advent Herald and its coadjutors have abandoned it, and all idea of making it stand on its legs, as the Philistines abandoned the idea of making Dagon stand up before the ark of God? See 1 Sam'l v., 1–5. They kept putting Dagon on his feet as often as he fell "upon his face to the earth before the Ark of the Lord; but after repeated efforts they found their poor god, Dagon with his "head and both his hands cut off," and nothing was left of him "only the stump." Thus it has been with this "immortal soul" god. He has been broken, crushed, thrown down and ground to powder so many times that "The Advent Herald" (or its editor) does not use the "phrase;" no, "never;" and has become satisfied it is "like a man of straw!" We hope he will be able to convince all his coadjutors and correspondents, of the same fact, so that they will no longer use that unscriptural and anti-christian phrase. We think we see it in that paper every now and then. You have done right, Br. "Advent Herald," in letting your readers know that "the phrase immortal soul is like a man of straw"—a deception palmed on Christianity to corrupt the truth, and without which no man of sense, in the exercise of the reason his Creator gave him, in reading the Scriptures would ever have thought of a future life except by a resurrection from the dead, at the last day.

It is that "man of straw," disguise it as they will, which has corrupted the gospel of life from the dead through Jesus Christ, and turned the great theme of Christ and his apostles, of the resurrection, into a fable, and has "made the counsel of God of none effect by your tradition" of going to heaven at death.

Now that our Br. Editor, in Boston, has abandoned that anti-scriptural phrase, immortal soul, and found it to be "like a man of straw," we hope he may also abandon the fruit of that poisonous deception, and come back to the Christian doctrine of the resurrection from the dead, at the last day; and teach his readers and correspondents that, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi., 53, 54.

Who or what is the "him?" It is not that man's body; but the man himself, to whom the promise is made. It is the believer; the now conscious personality who accepts Christ as his Life-giver. "This is the record, that God has given to us eternal life and this life is in His Son: he that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v., 11, 12. "This record" exactly agrees with the testimony of Jesus above quoted, and proves the doctrine of inherent immortality and going into a conscious state at death to be alike fables; human inventions.

But to this testimony we may add that of Paul, "If Christ be not raised . . . then they also which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished:" showing that a future life depends on the resurrection from the dead. If there be no resurrection, then all hope of a life after death is cut off, so that, "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not? let us eat and drink: for to-morrow we die." 1 Corth. xv., 17, 18, 32.

Put these texts and their conclusions together, and let any man say, if Paul's language here can be harmonized with the idea of a future life without a resurrection from the dead, or of a conscious state before the resurrection "at the last trump," when "the dead shall be raised incorruptible:" verse 52. On the 32d verse Dr. Adam Clarke, the great Methodist Commentator, says:

> "What the apostle says here, is a regular and legitimate conclusion from the doctrine, that there is no resurrection; for if there be no resurrection, then there can be . . . no future state of rewards and punishments; why, therefore, should we bear crosses, and keep ourselves under continual discipline! Let us eat and drink, take all the pleasure we can, for to-morrow we die; and there is an end of us forever."

The truth is, while a few texts, taken isolated from the contexts, and separated from the general tenor of Scripture, and aided by the traditions of men, seem to teach the conscious state of some of the dead; the general teaching of the prophets, Jesus Christ, and his apostles condemn the idea of any future life except by a resurrection from the dead "at the last day" . . . "at the last trump." Without the theory of an inherently immortal soul no such idea as a conscious life after death and before the resurrection can stand in the light of revelation.

Let those "men of straw,"—"inherent immortality, immortal soul, deathless spirit, always dying but never dead"—all "go to the moles and the bats," and perish with the Dagon of the Philistines, as they surely will, sooner or later.

The Wicked Resurrectionists.

J. Hamilton, Fredonia, N. Y., under date of April 25, writes: I have just received a visit from C. W. Low, of this place. He had the "World's Crisis," an article in which he wished to read to me, to disprove the non-resurrection of the wicked, and wanted my mind on it after hearing it read. It was an article sent the "Crisis" by "I. C. Wellcome," prefaced by his remarks. Low did not read to me the preface. After reading he asked what I thought of it? I supposed that it was a piece lately written by some one unacquainted with the Scripture doctrine as now promulgated in the Herald of Life. I told him there was no argument in it to disprove to me the non-living of the wicked dead, and I thought the man who wrote it was an ignoramus on the subject, or not honest. Low appeared to think he had caught me in a trap, and informed me it was written by Geo. Storrs. I told him I had nothing to retract, and I thought you would bear me out in my expression that you were at that time (twenty years ago), ignorant of what the Scriptures taught on the non-resurrection of the wicked dead. What say you?

Response by the Editor.—The course of Wellcome, Low, and others, concerned in this matter, shows both a bad taste and a bad spirit, and is beneath honorable men, to say nothing of honesty. They know the article in question was written at a time when we had given no special attention to the question, and were but "a babe" in the Life views. Suppose some one of orthodox proclivities should go back twenty years and hunt up some of their old sermons to prove the soul immortal and deathless—as they were once defenders of immortal-soulism—and should take the same course that Welcome, Low, and others have with our old notions, in our ignorance: would they count such a proceeding Christian, honorable, or even honest? Let them take up our abandoned positions, word for word, seeing they cannot invent anything equal to them, but let them call them their own, and advance them as such; then there would be a show of honesty, though they would look small playing with worn-out and cast-off garments, worn by us in childhood, when "we spake as a child, and thought as a child," and which, having "become a man," we have "put away," after the example of Paul.

If our opposers choose to act in this disreputable manner, let them do it. We can tell them they hurt themselves and their cause more than they can hurt us or the truths we now promulgate and defend. It calls attention to the inquiry, "How came Geo. Storrs to abandon the position he occupied twenty years ago?" It is a clear case, he did not do it to gain honor from men, nor for any pecuniary considerations; and he was old enough to know he would not gain any worldly good by such an unpopular course.

Thus thinking minds will be likely to look at the subject, and be led to inquiry, and that will lead to conviction, and the result will be an advance in the same direction, into the liberty of the gospel, and a deliverance from all the old Babylonish garments, which have bred and sustained superstition, persecution, and unrest in the religious world, and produced a spirit of hate and revenge instead of love and good-will to men. This will bring peace of mind and joy in the Holy Spirit, and the cheerful and blessed hope of entering the immortal state unaccompanied by any of the old revengeful theory of useless and hopeless torture for any of the human family.

Let our opposers, then, mock on, and dig up putrid theories as well as putrid carcasses to gratify a morbid spirit of revenge toward their fellow creatures, and to preserve in their systems the elements of the torture theories, which they have professed to repudiate. Let them take their course. We shall pursue that to which we believe God, reason and humanity have called us.

"Ghostography."

We believe this word has not yet taken its place in our dictionaries; but it means taking pictures of ghosts, or of the fancied souls of dead persons, called "photographs of spirits." It is the last development of the monstrous delusion called "Spiritualism." It has been the cause of much talk in this city recently. The following article contains all that we care to say on the subject. It is from the "American Baptist."

SPIRITUALISM.

Notwithstanding the repeated exposures of the tricks and duplicities of spiritualism, we still meet them in one form or another, flourishing and impudent as ever. Still the impostor Hume is welcomed and admired by a few aristocratic dunces among the nobility of "the Old World; and a few well-meaning, perhaps, bnt very credulous literary writers are still found to give their indorsement, and keep the world agog, on a subject which ought, long since, to have been buried with astrology, the philosopher's stone, and the black art.

In America, for the last year, the great spiritualistic sensation has been "planchette." The originators of this cunning humbug did wisely in making no claim to the assistance of spirits, yet asserting that their machine would do all that spirits profess to do. It has been a mine of wealth to the proprietors. Religious papers, among others, have kept it before the public by mysterious speculations as to whence the power came, without stopping to inquire whether it had any power. It is not a month since we saw an editorial in one of our religious journals, discussing with an owlish gravity, the secret of this mysterious agency. Every such advertisement of the humbug sends a dozen or two orders to the venders of the article. Some months ago, in consequence of the marvellous certificates in a "scientific" journal and other papers, we bought one and gave it a fair trial. We have made every endeavor to find a person under whose manipulation it would perform the antics ascribed to it, but without success; mediums and non-mediums showed the same result. The instrument writes in no other way than a pen writes; that is, by the force of human muscles. It is true that from the extreme ease with which it moves on its rollers, few persons can hold their hands so still, for five or ten minutes, as not to give it some motion; and however slight the pressure, the pencil at the other end will show it by a corresponding crooked or zigzag mark. This is done unconsciously, and we do not deny that an imaginative mind may be so far unconscious of its own doings, as to fancy that the hand remains passive, while writing intelligible words and sentences. But we know that when we write with it there is a volition, at least enough to give a direction to the muscles, and the same has evidently been true in the case of all whom we have seen use it. It is, in short, nothing but a pen, with a very delicate machinery for making the smallest amonnt of muscular pressure accomplish the largest amount of visible movement.

The last month has witnessed another phase of spiritualism, and which has at length got into the courts. This time it is the photographing of ghosts, or ghostography, the chief operator being a Mr. Mumler, whose office is 630 Broadway. He was arrested on a charge of fraud for selling photographs claiming to be ghost pictures when they were not. Mayor Oakey Hall, who is a decided enemy to humbugs of all kinds (we wish him success!) is understood to have set the prosecution on foot. Meantime Judge Edmonds and his fellow spiritualists, being confident of their ability to prove the truthfulness of the ghostographs, were sanguine in the belief of Mumler's acquittal, and the result justifies their sagacity. It was found impossible to prove that a spirit could not be photographed. It was proved clearly enough by the testimony of photographers that there were a dozen different ways in which secondary, or ghost-like pictures might be impressed on photographic plates in connection with the primary images. It was proved that by dexterous manipulation any photographer could impose upon the credulous, and furnish him with bogus portraits of ghosts; but that did not prove that Mr. Mumler's were bogus. So Mr. Mumler was cleared; he has gained a decided triumph; and now that his ghost-photography has become a recognized and legal business, we should not wonder if other professors of the art were to start up in various directions. Mr. Mumler was some ten or a dozen years ago in Boston, but his story was so preposterous it attracted but little attention. Now that planchette and the rappings have run out, ghostography is bound to have its day. Let us not laugh at the Chinese for keeping spirits carefully sealed up in bottles, so long as our brilliant writers and thinkers believe that the atmosphere is filled with flitting forms, which can at any time be transferred to paper, by a photographic lens! Why it is that these spirits do not occasionally flit across the lenses of other photographers, as well as Mr. Mumler's, remains a mystery. An anonymous correspondent of the Tribune (W. D. L.) endeavors to solve this objection by affirming that other cases have occurred, but photographers are unwilling to let it be known. He says that in a photograph of himself, taken by an artist in Connecticut valley, a shadowy female figure appeared with his own, and the experiment was many times repeated with the same result, but the photographer would not allow his name to be mentioned. All we have to say of his story is that we shall not believe a word of it till we have some better evidence than an anonymous letter.

"Ghostography, and the whole system of Spiritism, has sprung from the idea of inherent immortality. That theory produced it and still gives it life and energy. Take away that doctrine, and Spiritism sinks to its proper place, viz., animalism. It is wholly animal; and carried on by jugglery or legerdemain. There are those who practise these feats who are honest enough to tell you that all they do is a mere deception, but a secret they challenge you to find out. But when any claim to do these things by disembodied spirits they are ignorant or dishonest. They may be sincere, but are deluded by knowing swindlers.

A Short Sermon.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

"Behold the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints to execute judgment upon all, and to convince all that are ungodly among them of all their ungodly deeds which they have committed, and of all their hard speeches which ungodly sinners have spoken against him.—Jude 15.

This passage, by many, is considered conclusive evidence of the re-living of the wicked dead, basing this conclusion upon an incorrect view of the doctrine of the judgment as taught in the Scriptures. To obtain a correct understanding of any passage of inspiration, having a doctrinal bearing, due attention must be given to the context; for nothing can be more destructive to the harmony of the different parts of revelation than to give any passage a construction which destroys the force of the context and conflicts with the evident design of the inspired writer. In the passage before us, the very idea therein presented, that "the Lord cometh to execute judgment," does not harmonize very well with the theory, based upon this passage, that His object is to make known to the criminal "why sentence is passed." But the gospel, as now being preached to the world, makes this known; hence we believe the apostle means to convey no such idea, which we hope to be able to show the reader.

The occasion which appears to have called forth this epistle from Jude was that certain "ungodly men" had "crept in unawares," "turning the grace of God into lasciviousness, and denying the only Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ." Hence, it is apparent that he wished to impress upon all the certain result of disobedience and rebellion to God.

"I will, therefore, put you in remembrance," says Jude, "how that the Lord, having saved the people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them that believed not." This is an assurance that he will call to their mind facts which they "once knew," and thus we may reasonably conclude that he will advance nothing contradictory or subversive of the teachings of other inspired penmen. But why call to remembrance the destruction of the rebellious Israelites in the wilderness unless it had some bearing upon the subject which he presents, viz.: the certain doom of all who should continue in rebellion against God's righteous law? Jehovah said to the murmuring Israelites, "Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness . . . . I the Lord have said, I will surely do it unto all this evil congregation, that are gathered together against me in this wilderness; they shall be consumed, and there shall they die."—Num. xiv., 29, 35. Here we have the decisive judgment of God passed upon the children of Israel while they were yet in their rebellion, but Jude calls our attention to the execution of this decision. In turning to the record we find that "The Lord's anger was kindled against Israel, and he made them wander in the wilderness forty years, until all the generation that had done evil in the sight of the Lord was consumed." —Num. xxxii., 13. Now the important question arises—When God sat in judgment upon this evil generation, and his judgment decision was fully executed—were they "consumed" or "destroyed" with any promise of a future life by a resurrection from the dead? We respectfully ask the reader to consider this question with due care and candor. Is there a particle of evidence to show that they perished with any such expectation? Indeed, the terms "consumed," "destroyed," "perished," etc., do not convey a very fitting idea of a resurrection from the dead. But the very nature of the case excludes this generation from a resurrection to life. God sat in judgment upon them; the decision was passed and executed—they were "consumed" —and are now under the full infliction of the penalty. Will any one cast serious reflections upon the character of the all-wise and just Jehovah by maintaining that he will revoke his executed sentence in order that this rebellious generation may live? But for what will they live again? Certainly not to be judged, for this has already taken place. Hence, to assume that he will revoke this sentence is an implication that it was rendered unjustly.

But the commentary of Christ upon these facts must forever settle the question. Upon one occasion the Jews made the following declaration to our Saviour: "Our fathers did eat manna in the desert; as it is written, He gave them bread from heaven to eat." Let us consider, candidly, Christ's reply: "My Father giveth you the true bread from heaven. For the bread of God is he which cometh down from heaven, and giveth life unto the world. I am that bread of life. Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are DEAD. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die." (John vi.) The fate of those who perished in the wilderness, cannot be stated in more emphatic language. They "are dead,"—i. e., they are dead without a hope of resurrection, or a future life. But Christ is the "bread from heaven" that a man may eat thereof and "not die." He does does not mean that they will not be subjects of natural death, but that they will not remain eternally under the chains of death, like those who perished in the wilderness, for Jesus says, "I will raise HIM up at the last day." Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." This language of our Saviour shows conclusively that those wicked Israelites, who were "destroyed" in the wilderness, are excluded from a resurrection, but that those who have a spiritual connection with Christ will not be considered in in this manner "dead," for Christ will raise them up "at the last day." Thus the Son of God himself shows to the world that the saints, the children of the Most High, are alone the subjects of life from the dead.

It is quite certain to my mind that the apostle Jude had his mind fixed upon this hopeless condition of those dead Israelites and by calling to remembrance their fate endeavors to impress upon the minds of all, that such will be the fate of those who would not believe on the Great Life-giver. He refers to the fate of the Sodomites, showing that they, in like manner as the wicked Israelites, are "destroyed." These were executive judgments of God; and those who are thus destroyed are "set forth for an example," of those who should afterward live ungodly. In accordance with this fact, Jude informs us that there will be one more executive judgment, the nature of which he shows by reference to those of the past. The Lord will come to execute judgment upon those "mockers," at the last time, who "walk after their own ungodly lusts," and for "whom is reserved the blackness of darkness forever." May we be delivered from such a fate, is our earnest petition.

Have the Wicked a Right to Live Again?

"The wicked have a just right to live in the day of their judgment. The criminal has a right to know why sentence is passed upon him, and to hear and know the passing of such sentence from the lips of the judge."—Voice of the West.

A correspondent in the above-named paper offers this as a reason for believing that the wicked dead will live again. We know many are deluded into strong opposition to those who advocate a future life only to the righteous by such absurd and unscriptural reasoning as this. As life from the dead, as a gracious gift from God, is at present exciting a good deal of attention, we desire to offer a few thoughts suggested by the above paragraph.

This "reason" appears to be based upon the supposition that the investigative as well as the executive judgment occur after the resurrection of the whole human family, and, of course, implies a simultaneous resurrection of both classes. We do not know that the writer in question is an advocate of the theory of the mortal resurrection of the whole race, but his supposition certainly involves it. But we believe nothing is more directly opposed to the plain teachings of inspiration than such a supposition. If the dead are "raised incorruptible," as Paul most positively affirms, (1 Cor. xv., 52,) then it follows conclusively that the decision of the Judge must have been passed prior to the resurrection. The fact that any of the dead are raised "incorruptible" completely overthrows the claim that the wicked dead must be made alive before the judgment simply to "hear and know the passing of such sentence." A judgment of an investigative character of necessity must occur before the resurrection, which is proved by the fact that at the coming of Christ, when he raises the dead, an eternal division of the human family takes place. "One is taken and the other left." The dead "in Christ," are "raised incorruptible," and together with his living saints, who are "changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye," they are "caught up to meet the Lord in the air." The sounding of the trumpet is the signal for the execution of God's decision, which must be made before it can be executed. Therefore, until Paul's positive declaration has been overthrown, the supposition which is advanced to sustain the doctrine of the future re-living of the wicked, falls to the ground, without the necessity, on our part, of bringing forward other witnesses to sustain the Apostle's unimpeachable testimony.

Again, what an impassable barrier Paul raises up against the theory of the mortal resurrection of any of the human family! His sublime argument affirms that as the body is "sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption." (1 Cor. xv.) He is not trying to prove Universalism, but is establishing the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. But, as he maintains that the "dead shall be raised incorruptible," to what class does he refer? He proves clearly to the world that the Prince of Life was raised from the dead, and he just as clearly, to my mind, proves that the subjects of the resurrection will be raised with the same power of an endless life. By establishing the doctrine of the resurrection he overthrows the claims of Sadduceeism and infidelity; and by proving that the ungodly are excluded from a future life—or life from the dead—he demolishes the superstructure of Universalism.

Again it is assumed that "the wicked dead have a just right to live in the day of their judgment." It would be extremely interesting to see an effort put forth to prove this assumption from the Scriptures, but this the above writer very wisely does not attempt, nor does he even define for his readers the nature of the judgment to which he refers. If he means to assume that the unrighteous dead "have a just right" to live in the day of their executive judgment, we should widely differ with him. If the wicked dead live again because they have a "right" to live, pray tell us where they obtained such a right. Has any man a right to a future life, independent of the promises of God? If so, then why should God hold forth to man a future life as a gracious gift? There is a great difference between a debt and a free gift. If the wicked dead have "a right" to live again they must claim it as a debt, or due them; in that case they can demand it, without being under any obligation to God. But any life from the dead is a gift from God—a gracious bestowment—and no man can claim it as his due.

A dark and deep gloom hung over the world regarding a future life, till Christ came and the gospel proclamation went forth to the world, of life from the dead. "The gift of God is eternal life." "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth on him should not PERISH but have everlasting life."

Oh what a gracious offer is held forth to man, who is perishing without hope unless he accept, of God's unending grace, and by faith in Christ lays hold of the hope set before him in the gospel. Who that loves Jesus should not exult in the glorious prospect—the saints of God shall live again—live in glorious, endless communion with God and the heavenly hosts? Wm. H. Spencer.

"Little Dene."

W. W. Hosford, New Britain, Conn., wishes the above-named article, which we published in the Herald a short time since, published on a single leaf for circulation. He says:

In my efforts to get the people to search the Scriptures for themselves, instead of relying on the traditions of men, I find the best success by, at first, enlightening them on the false, yea, blasphemous doctrine of eternal torments. When undeceived in this matter, they are enabled to look upon God, not as a hateful object, but, as a Being that can be loved. Hence, if we can open their eyes on this subject we shall honor God and confer a blessing on our fellow men. With this end in view, I propose that you publish the story of "Little Dene," which is a real gem, and as an elementary work would prove really valuable, as it would be read by every child into whose hands it could be placed, instilling, as it did in my mind, a lesson never to be forgotten. I will pledge $5 toward the expense of putting it in a leaflet tract.

A gentleman writes us from Nevada City: For a few weeks, last winter, I had the opportunity of reading the Herald of Life, and, I may say, with considerable interest. Having been brought up under Methodist teachings, and hearing scarcely anything else, the doctrine of the Herald of Life seemed strange; but since my attention has been drawn in that direction, and after comparing a few of the leading ideas in your paper with those of the churches and with the Bible itself, I have come to the conclusion they are not so strange, after all. Standing aloof from all sects, I hear all, and hope to judge aright. Please send me the following works.

Note by Editor.—We have sent an entire set of "Campaign Documents," and some other works also.

James Smith, Orrington, Me., writes: I write you a few lines to let you know I am still alive, though eighty years old last October. I feel some of the infirmities of age, but my hope is firm in God, through Christ, that with all the saints I will soon be delivered from the bondage of corruption and reign with Christ at home. I have been out here for twenty-seven years, as many others have, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. It must be we are very near the haven of rest. O how good it will be to know that we have fought the good fight and kept the faith, and obtained the crown. Eternal life! What a hope! Immortality through Christ our Life-giver! What a gift, what favor, what a mercy conferred through Christ. I am glad, brother, that you are still spared to labor for the church. I can say, I like the Herald very much: it is food for the Christian: it is an antidote to meet the false creeds of our day, which are hurrying so many on to atheism and destruction. I hope you will be spared as long as God has work for you to do. Yours in the gospel hope.

B. Mellor, Rockdale Mills, Pa., writes: I send $10, the second half of my pledge on the current volume of our precious Herald of Life. I am thankful to our divine Head that your life and health are still preserved, and that the interest of the paper is so well kept up: doubtless much of this is in answer to the prayers of our brothers and sisters who love the truth. For myself I can truly say, I am delighted with nearly all that we have had since the present volume commenced; especially am I pleased to hear of the progress of truth in England. I am also much pleased that Br. Burbank is laboring so zealously. May the Lord reward him a hundredfold in life and a crown of glory in the world to come. Yours in the gospel hope.

Orthodoxy's Mixture.

Orthodoxy, salvation, and damnation are generally so well mixed up together, now-a-days, that it it almost impossible to separate them. Let us discuss orthodoxy for a little while, and see what it is; and perhaps we may have a solution of the question, why so comparatively few men embrace Christ? which appears to be puzzling so many who are "called to preach." Orthodoxy is a narrow, stony, crooked, uneven road, that leads through an unexplored and unexplorable wilderness. At the entrance of this road stands the orthodox preacher, who points his finger toward the wilderness, and says to the people, Walk in there; it is a long road and is dangerous; but persevere, push forward, keep the road to the right. I cannot go with you to explain to you anything that I have discovered; I have never searched or explored it; I can only give you the same directions which others have given me, and which instructions have been handed down from one generation to another for several centuries. At the end of the road you will find a beautiful city among the inhabitants of which you will find your mother, father, brothers, sisters, children, and friends—all in glory. If you turn to the left, you will find a road which also has a termination; but it ends in a lake of fire and brimstone, in which all the damned are suffering the indescribable torments, which a just God is inflicting upon them. At various points along the road you will find men who tell you that they have gone far in search of a better road to the eternal city, and that they have found one which is smooth, and on which the warmth and radiance of God's sunlight and favor is ever shining; but heed not these, for they are seducers; you must stumble on in darkness and uncertainty over the road in which I have directed you. You will find along the road, too, innumerable devils; real personal devils, with tail, cloven hoof, fiery eyes, horns, etc., who will endeavor to draw you into another way. These you must resist, or they will take you to the lake of fire and brimstone, and cast you in there where you will suffer forever and forever all the torments which unquenchable fire and God's wrath can make you suffer—in that fire where is "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth."

According to orthodoxy, it is eminently wicked to embrace a religion that harmonizes with the teachings of the Divine Master, or to search for light and truth, unless we do so with our minds firmly resolved to reject everything that conflicts with the orthodox creed.

It is no wonder that the masses refuse to accept the terms of salvation when so few teachers of the Divine Word have the learning or the natural capacity to teach.

We hear the same preacher discourse upon a dozen different topics, and at the close of the last discussion he does not even appear to realize that he has again and again contradicted himself. One Sabbath we hear a preacher tell his congregation all about the resurrection on the last day, when "both the just and the unjust" shall arise from their graves, and appear before God, to receive their reward or their punishment, thereby conveying the idea that until the resurrection all the dead "sleep." In a few days, at a funeral service, we hear the same man consoling the afflicted friends with the assurance that the spirit of the departed is now in glory.

Again we hear, within the space of five minutes, the orthodox minister assure his hearers that, unless they repent, they will "die an eternal death" and suffer "all the torments of hell forever!"

Again, that God is all love, but unless they repent they will be forever tormented with the damned.

Why is it that these men cannot convince themselves by study, both by the character of God and the teachings of Jesus Christ, that not to live again would be punishment enough to constrain men to seek the face and favor of their Lord.

Why insist that God will do that from which the vilest human wretch would shrink? Why persist in advancing a law of wrath and cruelty, when we have a law of Love and Mercy? Homo.

The Resurrection.

This is a subject of vital importance to the whole human family. On this hangs the only hope of the Christian. Take away this hope and he is left in despair; dark and gloomy forebodings veil the future: nothing is before us but the long dark night of eternal silence. This was the condition of mankind before Christ came and offered life to all. The world was one vast hospital, filled with the dead and dying. The first pair eat, the poison and all of their posterity partook of the same nature. But Jesus Christ, the great Physician of the human family, came, and offered life: and all that believe on him will be raised up at the last day.

If the Saviour had not come, the race would have slept an eternal sleep. This is the state in which Christ found them. Like men in the midst of a deep whirlpool. He throws in a rope to rescue them; but if they will not obey, they must suffer the consequences—go down in death. This is the time Paul labored that he might attain unto the Resurrection out from among the dead. This is the time that Christ had reference to when he said, They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead. This is the time Isaiah looked to—Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust. They are all coming forth singing; not one to die the second time. As we stand upon the verge of the judgment and look over this world-wide charnel house, we stand in awe to see how few are striving to attain unto eternal life. Yours, in hope of eternal life.

Sheldon, Wis., April 19, 1869.

Br. Storrs: I am forced to write you to stop my paper for want of funds to pay. I am a poor man and crippled in one foot, with seven in family, and beside all that, I have had a sick brother and his wife on my hands for support for the last six months, and they are still dependent on me for a living. I value the Herald of Life next to my Bible: it has been the means of enlightening me in the true ways of righteousness, and also showing me wherein God is love. I now can see the beauty and loveliness of God's dealings with us sinners. It is all the preaching we have here; for we are alone, and are put down by others to be the lowest of human beings.

I know where I stand, and I thank God that I have been enlightened. The doctrine of eternal torments has no place in my mind. What a horrible and God-dishonoring doctrine. I thank God; but words cannot express my thanks: they fail me. I feel so thankful, "that whereas I was once blind, now I see."

My father, who lives with me, is a strong believer in the Life views, and takes great pleasure in hearing me read the Herald. He is now in his eighty second year; he also is praying, "Thy Kingdom come," for he soon expects, if not changed, to sleep in Jesus.

If I had some of the Campaign Documents I would distribute them; and will have some as soon as I can pay for them. I received two; one on the judgment, and the other, the The Living Soul. I have loaned them to some here; the effect I do not know yet; but I calculate to send them to Penn., to a sister, this week.

I crave an interest in the prayers of all the brothers and sisters.

Yours in the hope of the soon coming of our King.

Note by the Editor.—Your paper will be continued. A good Sister, in Philadelphia, Pa., has left us money for it. Your good old father must not be deprived of hearing you read it to him. May the Lord bless you all, and enable you to endure to the end; so shall you receive the "Crown of Life."

From John Billings.

New Rutland, Ill., April 27, 1869.

Br. Storrs: I thought I would drop a few lines for the paper to say to all that I have been sick since last September. All winter I have been pretty much confined to the house. I concluded that my work was done. But as the spring opens, I now seem to be improving some, and if it is the Lord's will that I should have my usual health again, I shall spend my entire time laboring to spread the blessed truths of the gospel, or good news of life for all that will comply with the conditions of the gospel. My circumstances, in consequence of sickness, are such that I have not been able so do anything for the paper, but if the way opens I shall take it. I don't want it unless I can pay for it. If it is to be sent free to anybody I want it sent to some one that is inquiring after light.

Reason and Faith.—The learned and pious Boyle well expressed it when he says that there is much in Christianity above our reason, but nothing contrary to it.

The Prayer.

A young lady was taking a pleasant walk one summer day in a deeply-shaded woodland, and, being weary, sat down to rest on a secluded mossy bank near the summit of a hill. Presently she heard a voice, as of one engaged in earnest conversation, and, on advancing a step or two, she saw good Mr. M—— coming leisurely up the hill, the reins hanging loosely over his horse's neck. "What can he be talking about so earnestly to himself?" she thought; but directly she heard the voice of prayer, and the words which God's providence caused to be especially impressed upon her mind were these: "O Lord, have mercy upon the dear youth of this place!" The good old man rode on, but the voice of prayer was heard, after he had disappeared from her view, in the leafy depths of the forest. The young lady was struck with the thought: "Is this the way Christians go about the town, and mingle with the world? Do they pray thus for our souls? I have hardly ever prayed for my own." From that day she began to pray, and became the first-fruits of a glorious revival.

How and How Not to Make Hens Lay.

Many persons feed hens too much for laying. To keep twenty hens through the winter, give three pints of corn and two of oats or buckwheat per day; also, about twice a week, give them shorts or bran wet with warm sour milk, of which they seem very fond; make it quite wet and put in a large spoonful of ground black pepper. Give them all the green stuff that can be had—such as cabbage leaves, parings of apples, cores and all, etc. So fed, with comfortable quarters, they will lay all winter. Keep only early spring pullets. Change cocks every spring. In proof of the above, we will merely observe that a neighbor had among a lot of hens one that would not lay under any circumstances; and as such hens are not profitable to keep, she was considered a fit subject for the pot. On dressing, she was found to be literally filled with fat, instead of egg ovaries.—Farmers' Home Journal.

INVITATION.

BY S. H. BRICKETT.

Proud and hungry soul that starvest
'Mid the ripened fields of wheat,
Must thou famish in the harvest,
Never pluck the corn and eat?

Fainting in the vineyard, bursting
With its weight of precious wine,
Must thou go forever thirsting
For the draught that is divine?

Must thy pride still spurn the treasure
Offered to thee without price?
Still attempt God's love to measure—
Still reject His Sacrifice?

Far from Him thy feet have wandered,
Vaguely seeking home and rest;
Rich the heritage thou'st squandered
In thy weary, wayward quest.

Esau-like, thou'st sought the blessing
Vainly, with tears and care and cost;
Can'st thou turn at last, confessing
Grace must give what Guilt has lost?

Fruitless other inquisition;
Thou art sick, and blind, and lame!
And there's only one Physician—
Jesus Christ the only name!

Come to Him, O come, believing
He can heal and rescue thee;
Come to Him to-day, receiving
Gifts to make thee rich and free;

All thy life-long debts forgiven—
Bankrupt, that hast nought to pay;
Fear dispelled by hope of heaven,
Darkness changed to glorious day.

Come to Him! He longs to greet thee,
He has welcome, comfort, peace;
Come to Him—He comes to meet thee;
Let thy weary wanderings cease.

Here the Tree of Life is growing—
Cross of Christ—disdained of men,
Health, and Hope, and Heaven bestowing;
Eat, and hunger not again!

Here salvation's fount is streaming;
See the purpling tide outpour!
Earthly founts are false and seeming—
Drink of this and thirst no more!

Children's Department.

LOST IN THE WOODS.

Two little girls, named Carrie and Barbara, had just made each other's acquaintance, and they took a ramble in the woods together, to collect acorns, pine cones, and other curious and pretty things, of which Nature keeps a great store-house in the quiet forest. Barbara's mother was an ignorant and superstitious woman, and filled her children's minds with a variety of silly and impossible stories. In Barbara's belief, the tufts of beautiful moss in the woods were the green velvet cushions on which queer little spirits called fairies were accustomed to sit, and the acorn cups were bowls out of which they drank.

Carrie's mother was a pious and sensible woman, and her little girl, in gathering mosses, admired the wonderful neatness and beauty with which God has formed the humblest thing that grows—while, in looking at the acorn, she remembered that nothing less than His power could cause that little nut to become a tall and stately tree. . . . .

"The children were so busy, and so well amused, that evening came on before they knew it, and, while they were trying to find their way out of the forest, it became quite dark." Then, more and more bewildered, the two little girls sat down, very close together, upon the roots of a huge tree. Here and there a broken ray of moonlight glimmered through the branches above them, but, round about them, all looked black and dark, and, now and then, some wakeful bird gave a strange sort of whistle, or a wild and mournful cry. . . . .

"Oh," sobbed Barbara, "it's dreadful to think of having to stay here all night! I am so afraid! My mother tells such awful stories about people that have been lost in the woods, and eaten up by bears, or wolves, or witches that changed themselves into dreadful beasts, just to tear folks up!"

"Here the two children involuntarily cuddled closer together, but Carrie said: "Well, if there were such things here God could keep them from eating us! My mother tells about a good man that was put right into a den of wild beasts—great, hungry lions—and yet the Lord made those lions keep their mouths tight shut, and lie just as quiet as little kittens, until that good man was taken out of the den unhurt." . . . .

"After this, both the children were still for some moments, and then Barbara began to whimper, "There's nothing that I'm so much afraid of as ghosts! The other evening my mother was telling about somebody that was in some dark, lonesome place, like this, and saw, a good way off, a blue flame, and it came nearer and nearer, (and there was a tall, awfully lean figure, all dressed in grave clothes, and with fire-balls for eyes!)" Here Barbara became too much frightened at her own story to tell any more of it, and concluded by saying: "Didn't your mother ever tell you such stories as that?"

"No, never," said Carrie; "but she told me about one of the old-time saints, named Peter, that was in a worse place than the woods, for he was in a dark, gloomy prison, with chains on his hands and feet, and, in the night, he waked up and saw a bright light, and there stood a beautiful angel, with his sweet, loving face, and dress of sparkling white. The Lord sent this angel to bring Peter out of prison, and,—but see, there's a light over there, among the trees! Who knows but it may be an angel sent to lead us out of here?"

"Oh, I feel certain that it's not!" answered Carrie. "Now I see a man holding a lantern, but may be that's an angel with him dressed in white. Oh, Barbara, they are my parents, come to look for me!"

And, springing joyfully forward, Carrie was clasped to the bosom of a being but "little lower than the angels,"—a faithful Christian mother, whose prayers the Lord had answered, by guiding her to her child.—The Mother at Home.

THE ONE THING NEEDFUL.

THE question is sometimes asked, "Are we a people?" or, in other words, Are we a separate body, as Adventists; a great moving power in the religious world?

This question may be answered in the affirmative. We are a people; a distinct people; a mighty power in the religious world. But here arises another question: Do we as a people fulfil the great mission allotted to us, in a manner commensurate with the advantages and facilities bestowed upon us. Do we as a people employ ourselves in a manner that shall tell most effectually in the salvation of the perishing, and thereby glorify Him who has called us out from the beggarly elements of this wicked, fire-doomed world? Are we as a people occupying a position where it could be emphatically said to us, "Ye are the light of the world?" 'Tis true, we are blessed with great and glorious light, but is that light allowed to shine to the extent that it tells most in leading sinners to Christ, and thus honoring the Giver, who has been so kind as to bestow it upon us?

These are questions of great importance; and how can they be answered truthfully. Happy would it be for all concerned, could each one be answered in the affirmative; but such, alas! is not the case. This people, to whom was committed the grand dispensational message of the soon coming of Christ, and who, more than any other people under the sun, have been instrumental in removing the dark veil of mysticism which for centuries enshrouded the word of God; this people have been in a great measure shorn of their strength; their glory has departed; but we could wish not finally. Often, as we think of the divided, scattered condition of the Advent people, we feel like crying out, in the language of the good old Jeremiah, "How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed!"

And what is the cause of this weakened, and comparatively dormant condition of the Advent body? It is because of the lack of one great principle of Christianity, without which the church never did and never can prosper. That principle is Charity. That principle is the one thing needful among us as a body to-day. And yet some seem to act as if they thought they were doing God service in making the breach wider and wider. All parties among us would do well to stop where they are, and learn to observe one of the first principles of the gospel, which is embodied in the Golden Rule: "As ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them." It is by neglecting to observe this precious precept that we stand to-day before the world a divided and scattered people. But some will say that this dividing and subdividing of the Advent Church is all the work of God; that he is separating the chaff from the wheat. This idea is a cunning device to encourage dissension, and thus destroy the usefulness of the church.

If one goes into an Advent meeting now, this spirit of sectarianism meets him at the very threshold. Instead of seeing brethren of all shades of belief mingling together, and striving to build each other up on their "most holy faith," we find ourselves in a meeting of a strongly sectarian character. Perhaps it is a "Crisis" meeting, so-called; and one marked feature seems to be a great solicitude lest something might be spoken that is not strictly in accordance with their preconceived opinions of truth; and thus the cause of God suffers. Just as if God could not take care of his own work without their aid. They will profess loudly that they make nothing a test of fellowship but Christian character; but we soon find that certain points of doctrine make up a great part of the test. They say that wherever certain doctrines are introduced, distraction and confusion follow. If people have not enough of the spirit of meekness to sit and hear others express their belief without getting affronted, they are not quite ready to be made immortal.

But "Crisis" meetings are not the only ones among us where we see this spirit of exclusiveness manifested. The party which promulgates the doctrine of "No future life for the wicked dead," the "Sabbath" party, and all the parties into which the Advent Church is divided, have each their particular "truth," which must be received, or whoever does not receive it is set down as a heretic.

What we stand in need of more than anything else, is faithful preaching of the word of God in all its parts, giving each part its proper place and due prominence, and not continually harping upon one idea to the exclusion of everything else. We do not need it all practical, nor all doctrinal; but we need the gospel presented in such a way that it will make us better, and fit us for the world to come. Oh, what folly it is for professed preachers of the gospel to take one item of God's word and spend their time in trying to convert people to that one idea, while many of the more weighty matters are passed by in silence. Such preachers and such converts have plenty of theory, but very little vital godliness. Oh, that God would send out more true-hearted servants into the vineyard! The harvest is truly great, and is ripening fast; but the real laborers for God are few.

CHARLES C. TUCK.

BANGOR, ME., April 22, 1869.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We agree with Br. Tuck in the necessity of "Charity," but not among "Adventists" and for them more than for any other Christians. "Adventists," as they are called, manifest the same lack of charity toward other sects as he complains of among themselves. Such a spirit is just as wrong toward others as among themselves. The first grand mistake among believers in the speedy return of Christ from heaven was their calling themselves an "Advent Church," thereby hedging themselves into as narrow an inclosure or sect as any other body, with another name than the Bible warrants. The one only test of Christian fellowship is, and ever ought to be, "Has Christ received him? and does the person possess the spirit of Christ?" That point being settled, we cannot withhold charity or fellowship from him without sin, however that person may differ from us in theory. This remark, however, is not to be construed into the idea of indifference as to a man's theory or belief; but that is not the criterion by which we are to be governed in our love toward the members of Christ's body.

If we agree with those calling themselves "Adventists" in regard to the nearness of the advent we cannot accept that belief as a ground of Christian fellowship, of itself: we must have other evidence that they have the mind of Christ. Organized churches with sectarian names are engines of discord, division, and uncharitableness: such they always have been and always will be. Love is the only bond of union for a Christian body; when that will not hold Christians together they lose their character as such, and become mere sectarians: their charity is not Christian charity, but Sectarian charity, and is worthless except for sectarian purposes.

Let us have the genuine article—Love to all whom Christ has received, and who manifest the spirit of Christ. Then shall men know that we are His disciples and not mere sectarians.

THE INSPIRED.

Who are and have been inspired? The answer depends upon the wider or narrower meaning given to the word inspired. Theologians confine it to those who were used by the Holy Spirit to communicate infallible truth in the Scriptures; and they are sometimes disposed to claim a monopoly of the word, and to make it ecclesiastically criminal to talk of any other kind or degree of religious inspiration. Infidels seize upon this limitation of a word in itself broad, and protest, not without plausible argument, against this setting up of men who lived two and three thousand years ago as alone having had divine enlightenment. Enthusiastic religionists, too, who have had their dreams and impulses, and would fain gain for them a divine authority, re-echo this protest in the name of faith. Moreover grave minds not thus affected, either with skepticism or superstition, feel the chill of utter separation from those grand religious leaders, the prophets and apostles of other days, and would fain believe that God has not altogether substituted the outward Bible, as an inspired volume, for the inward contact of his own Spirit with the human soul.

It would seem wise, therefore, not to undertake to limit the meaning of a word, which has always had a broad and varied use, to a narrow and technical signification. Better is it to discriminate between its applications, and to tell in each case in which we speak of inspiration, what we would imply as to its source, its design, and its actua lresults. And for this we have the warrant of Scriptural usage, so far as our English version is concerned—and it is with the use of an English word that we have now to do. The word inspire does not occur at all in our Bible, and the word inspiration is found but twice. Once it has the narrow or modern technical meaning—when we read Paul's declaration in 2 Tim. iii., 16, that "all Scripture is given by inspiration of God." Once it has the free idea, when it is said of Elihu, in Job. xxxii., 8, that "the inspiration of the Almighty giveth them understanding." In the first instance reference is had to the inspiration needed for the specific work of writing the Old Testament as a guide to religious truth and duty. In the second instance allusion is made to the human mind as originally inbreathed of God, and also as providentially prepared and impelled to utter itself on fit occasions.

Now it may easily be true that the Holy Spirit has used only certain men in certain ages to do the particular work of Bible-making, since these needs to be put into a Bible for all time succeeding the introduction of the Christian or final dispensation. But this in no wise hinders that the same Holy Spirit shall dwell in all saints now, as a genuine inspiration for quite other purposes. It is indeed a truth of Scripture constantly urged, that the Holy Spirit is the life of every holy soul, and the ever present director of this entire dispensation; that he is therefore the regenerator, illuminator, and comforter of individual saints, and a true inspirer of prayers, hymns, plans, and words of spiritual power, while he pours waves of thought and feeling through the church at large, which impel it to appropriate deeds of Christian enterprise. We are not then cut off in this respect from sympathetic connection with prophets and apostles, but even surpass those who were only used as writers of canonical books. Who can doubt that the humblest saint in whom is an inspiration of the Comforter for purposes of sanctification, is far more privileged than the prophet Balaam with all the predictive revelations made to him by the Holy Spirit? We abide with the church of all ages in the unity of the Spirit, prepared and used by Him in our time, as were they in their time, for the varied work now needed. We live in an atmosphere of divine influences, and now as of older days he is the man of power, with tongue or pen, who yields up his soul to the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. "Now there are diversities of gifts, but the same Spirit. And there are differences of administrations but the same Lord. And there are diversities of operations, but it is the same God who worketh all in all."—The Advance.

WHO IS THE COMING MAN?

To answer this question truthfully, is to do it scripturally. Human speculations and conjecture, when weighed in the balances of truth, amount to nothing, only so far as they may be the reflex of Divine prediction. "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." Man, unenlightened by the teachings of God's Spirit, is unable to foresee what is treasured up in the future. This has been so repeatedly verified in the history of the past, that the wisdom of man is at best denominated to be but "foolishness with God." We therefore turn to God, who seeth the end from the beginning, and who has declared what shall be hereafter, for that knowledge of the invisible future, which no uninspired mortal is able to make known. What the Deity has promised to His servants, and foretold by His Prophets, we may regard as certain of fulfilment, however great and marvellous it may appear to us. Divine promises and predictions are always accompanied by such evidence as to insure their belief, except in such cases, as when the mind of man is disposed to do what is contrary to the will of God at all hazard. When God called to Moses from the burning bush, and said, "I am the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob," the evidence accompanying this declaration was such as would convince a man like Moses, however skeptical he might be. There was such a display of miraculous power, and what was equally as convincing, such a distinct declaration to fulfil a covenant made with Abraham upward of four hundred years previous, as to satisfy Moses that he was standing in the presence of, and conversing with none other than the God of his fathers, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. All along the coast of time, beginning with Adam in the garden of Eden, and ending with John in the Isle of Patmos, spanning a period of over four thousand years, we have a record of God's dealings with men, constituting a narrative so full of simplicity, and so free from anything like the art of deception, and withal confirmed with such a variety of indisputable facts, as to put the writings of Prophets and Apostles beyond the power of successful contradiction. We therefore turn away from the vain speculations and ambiguous utterances of uninspired men to consult the utterances of those who spoke as they were moved by the Holy Spirit, declaring the end from the beginning, and from ancient times, the things not yet accomplished, saying, "My counsel shall stand and I will do all my pleasure." The Coming Man as set forth in the teachings of the Eternal Spirit, is, as we have already hinted, none other than

THE SON OF GOD.

The following are some of the titles He bears in the Scriptures of truth; Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, Father of the Age to Come, Prince of Peace, The Lord our Righteousness, Immanuel, or God with us, The Lion of the Tribe of Judah, The Bright and Morning Star, Alpha and Omega, the First and the Last, The Prince of the Kings of the Earth, and last and most familiar of all, Jesus Christ, both Son of God and Son of David. He is also frequently styled the Son of Man, not, however that He is the son of Joseph, as Unitarianism affirms, but because He took upon Him, not the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham. As the Spirit has said, "He was made of a woman," in fulfilment of the prophecy, "behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel." Isa. vii., 14.

For four thousand years Jesus Christ existed in the word of promise, but when the fulness of time came, "the word was made flesh," and He who had been promised as the woman's seed, made His appearance among men. He was miraculously conceived and born through the operation of the Spirit of God and was, therefore, the Son of the Highest, as well as the Son of Mary. We do not regard Unitarianism or Trinitarianism, as expressive of the truth concerning the nature of Christ. He is not, as the latter affirms, the Eternal Father, nor, as the former teaches, simply the Son of Joseph. He is, however, most emphatically, the Son of God made in the likeness of sinful man, that He might, as Paul affirms, taste death for every man, that through death He might destroy him that hath the power of death, that is, the devil." Heb. ii, 10–16.

But while Jesus was as other men, mortal and subject to death, it is nevertheless true that he was God with us in that the Father dwelt in him by his Spirit. The Father spoke through Jesus, and hence, as Paul declares, God was in him "reconciling the world unto himself." The words of Jesus are the words of the Spirit, and not simply the words of himself as a man. He spake as one having authority, at the same time making such a display of power as to confirm the things he taught as heavenly and divine. The eternal Father was with, and in Jesus, so that he could say, "I am the way, the truth, and the life," and again, "he that hath seen me hath seen the Father also," "I and my Father are one," "I have power to lay down my life and power to take it up again," all of which is the language of the Spirit speaking through the man Christ Jesus. Paul says, "great is the mystery (secret) of godliness, from which saying many have concluded that Paul had reference to some inexplicable mystery. But not so. He defines himself fully as follows: "God manifested in the flesh, justified in the Spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory." 1 Tim. iii., 16. The mystery of godliness, as Paul says, is great to those who understand it not, but very easy of comprehension, if attention is given to Paul's explanation of the subject. During the time of his ministry Jesus was God manifested in flesh, by the Holy Spirit, and being put to death by wicked hands, God raised him up to die no more, and therefore, justified in Spirit, by making him incorruptible. Jesus is no longer flesh and blood, like other men, seeing that he has been justified in Spirit, and declared to be the Son of God with power, by his resurrection from the dead. He learned obedience by the things he suffered, and has consequently been perfected and exalted at the right hand of the Father. Being "made of a woman," and appearing in the likeness of sinful flesh, he was tempted in all points as we are, yet without sin. Though he felt the wavering elements of sin working within him, he nevertheless overcame "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life," and came off victor. There is therefore, treasured up in the person of Jesus Christ, an inexhaustible supply of moral power and physical energy. He is able to deliver the world from its evils, and to wipe out the malignant stains of sin, renewing and beautifying the face of all things earthly. He is said to be "a likeness of the invisible God, and the first-born of every creature," because, says the apostle, "by (or more properly for) him were all things created." Col. i. 15, 16. Jesus is preferred above all, and therefore stands at the head of the creation. Paul, in speaking of Jesus as the first-born of every creature, or the new creation, has reference to that future world of which Jesus is especially the first. To understand what the prophets and apostles say of Jesus it is necessary to comprehend that future state of things to which he is related officially as the "Alpha and Omega." The world or (aion) age to come, is termed by John as the "Lord's day." Not, however, as the day of his suffering in the flesh, when, as says the apostle, "He offered up prayers and supplications with strong crying and tears, unto him that was able to deliver him from death," but rather the day of his triumph and glory, when he shall be King over the whole earth. Abraham rejoiced to see Christ's day, for the advent of that day would give Abraham life from the dead, and an everlasting inheritance in the land of Canaan, besides further consummating the covenant made with him, as expressed in the language, "in thee and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed." This covenant has never as yet been fulfilled, seeing that Jesus, his seed, has not yet returned from heaven, nor Abraham roused from the sleep of death. From whatever point of view we look at Jesus in his official character, we always find him stannding at the head, not of the present sinful and mortal state of things, but of that future blessed condition of things which he will inaugurate at his second appearing. He is, therefore, scripturally speaking, the Coming man. He is now absent from the theatre of his humiliation and poverty, and his consequent exaltation and power, but, nevertheless, he has sealed the destiny of earth with his own blood, and will, despite all opposing power, return to restore all things spoken of by the prophets. "He will come down like rain upon the mown grass, and as showers that water the earth." Thus will he beautify the face of nature, and gladden the hearts of men. M.—The Her. of the Coming Kingdom.

NOTE BY EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.—We give the foregoing article, not because we agree with every expression it contains, but because of its general excellence.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Germantown Telegraph says a few sprigs of gum or elder, fresh from the bush, if deposited in and about grain boxes, will be an effective protection from rats and mice; also, that the stalks and leaves of the common mullein will drive rats from their haunts.

GOATS are pronounced profitable to farmers if for no other purpose than clearing the land of noxious weeds, which they will devour with avidity in all stages of their growth.

EVERY farmer's family can find good use for the soot which is usually so abundant in their stove-pipes and chimneys. Twelve quarts of water well mixed with soot, will make a powerful liquid manure, which will improve the growth of flowers, garden vegetables, or root crops. In either a liquid or solid state it makes an excellent top dressing for grass or cereal crops.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 56 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 300 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion, than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which, a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature," and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE vs. TRADITION; in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested; showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject, but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

SHRINKING FROM CHRIST'S COMING.

BEFORE Christ came, the faithful remnant of Israel were consoled with the promise that "their eyes should see" him who was to be their "salvation." "Unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings." Yet it is observable that the prophecy, though cheering and encouraging, had with it something of an awful character too. First, it was said, "The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant whom ye delight in." Yet it is soon added, "But who may abide the day of his coming? and who shall stand when he appeareth? for he is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap."

The same mixture of fear with comfort is found in the disciples after his resurrection. The women departed from the sepulchre "with fear and great joy." They "trembled and were amazed: neither said they anything to any man, for they were affraid." The apostles "were terrified and affrighted, and supposed that they had seen a spirit." "They believed not for joy, and wondered." And our Lord said to them, "why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts?" On another occasion "none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord." It might be from slowness to believe, or from misconception, or from the mere perplexity of amazement, but so it was; they exulted, and they were awed.

Still more remarkable is the account of our Lord's appearance to St. John in the Book of Revelation; more remarkable because St. John had no doubt or perplexity. Christ had ascended; the apostle had received the gift of the Holy Ghost; yet he "fell at his feet as dead."

This reflection leads us on to a parallel thought concerning the state and prospects of all Christians in every age. We, too, are looking out for Christ's coming—we are bid look out, we are bid pray for it, and yet it is to be a time of judgment. It is to be the deliverance of all saints from sin and sorrow forever; yet they, every one of them, must undergo an awful trial. How then can any look forward to it with joy?

And the difficulty is increased when we come to pray for it—to pray for its coming soon: how can we pray that Christ would come, that the day of judgment would hasten, that his kingdom would come, that his kingdom may be at once—may come on us this day or to-morrow—when by so coming he would be shortening the time of our present life, and cut off those precious years given us for conversion, amendment, repentance, and sanctification? Is there not an inconsistency in professing to wish our Judge already come, when we do not feel ourselves ready for him? In what sense can we really and heartily pray that he would cut short the time, when our conscience tells us that, even were our life longest, we should have much to do in a few years?

I do not deny that there is some difficulty in the question, but surely not more so than there is on every side of us in religious matters. Religion has (as it were) its very life in what are paradoxes and contradictions in the eye of reason. It is a seeming inconsistency how we can pray for Christ's coming, yet wish time to "work out our salvation," and "make our calling and election sure." It was a seeming contradiction, how good men were to desire his first coming, yet be unable to abide it; how the apostles feared, yet rejoiced after his resurrection. And so it is a paradox how the Christian should in all things be sorrowful yet always rejoicing, and dying yet living, and having nothing yet possessing all things. Such seeming contradictions arise from the want of depth in our minds to master the whole truth. We have not eyes keen enough to follow out the lines of God's providence and will, which meet at length, though at first sight they seem parallel.

I will now try to explain how these opposite duties of fearing yet praying to have the sight of Christ are not necessarily inconsistent with each other. Why we should fear it, is not strange. Surely when a man gets himself steadily to contemplate a state of things beyond this life, he is in the way to be overpowered by the thoughts which throng upon him. How dreadful to the imagination is every scene of that unknown hereafter! This life indeed is full of dangers and pains, but we know what they are like; we do not know what shall be in the world to come. "Lord, whither goest thou?" said the apostles; "we know not whither thou goest." Supposing a man told that he should suddenly be carried off to some unknown globe in the heavens, this is the kind of trouble in its least fearful shape, which the future presents when dwelt upon. And still more trying is the peculiar prospect which presents itself of Christ's coming in judgment. What a prospect, to be judged for all our doings by an unerring Judge. Try to trace back the history of your life in memory, and fancy every part of it confessed by you in words before some intimate friend, how great would be your shame! but how gladly would you in that day resign yourself to a disclosure to a fellow sinner, how gladly to a disclosure to a world of sinners, compared with the presence of an All-holy, All-seeing Creator with his eyes upon you, "beholding you," as the gospel speaks of him in the days of his flesh—and one deed of evil after another told forth, while all your best actions and best qualities fade away and become as discolored and unsightly as if there were nothing good in them. I do not presume to say that all this will happen; but this is what is meant by a judgment in the earthly sense of the word; and that awful trial is surely not called a judgment for nothing, but that we may gain some ideas from it. Think of all this, and you will not deny that the thought of standing before Christ is enough to make us tremble. And yet his presence is held out to us by himself as the greatest of good; all Christians are bound to pray for it, to pray for its hastening; to pray that we may speedily look on him whom none can see "without holiness," none but "the pure in heart;" and now the question is, how can we pray for it with sincerity?

1. Now, first, though we could not at all reconcile our feelings about ourselves with the command given us, still it is our duty to obey the latter on faith. If Abraham could lift up his knife to slay his son, we may well so far subdue our fears as to pray for what nevertheless is terrible. Job said, "Though he slay me, yet I will trust in him." Under all circumstances, surely, we may calmly resign ourselves into his hands. Can we suppose that he would deceive us? deal unkindly or hardly with us? Can he make use of us, if I may say so, against ourselves? Let us not so think of the most merciful Lord. Let us do what he bids, and leave the rest to him. Thus, I say, we might reason with ourselves, if nothing else could be said.

2. But next, I observe, that when we pray for the coming of Christ, we do but pray in the church's words, that he would "accomplish the number of his elect and would hasten his kingdom." That is, we do not pray that he would simply cut short the world, but, so to express myself, that he would make time go quicker, and the wheels of his chariot speed on. Before he comes, a certain space must be gone over; all the saints must be gathered in; and each saint must be matured. Not a grain must fall to the ground; not an ear of corn must lose its due rain and sunshine. All we pray is, that he would please to crowd all this into a short space of time; that he would "finish the work and cut it short in righteousness," and "make a short work upon the earth;" that he would accomplish, not curtail but fulfil, the circle of his saints, and hasten the age to come without disordering this. Indeed it cannot be otherwise. All God's works are in place and season; they are all complete. As in nature, the structure of its minutest portions is wrought out to perfection, and an insect is as wonderful as Leviathan; so when in his providence he seems to hurry, he still keeps time, and moves upon the deep harmonies of truth and love. When then we pray that he would come, we pray also that we may be ready; that all things may converge and meet in him; that he may draw us while he draws near us, and make us the holier the closer he comes. We pray that we may not fear that which at present we justly do fear; "that when he shall appear, we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming." He can condense into an hour a life of trial. He who frames the worlds in a moment, and creates generations by the breath of his mouth, and melts, and hardens, and deluges, and dries up the solid rocks in a day, and makes bones to live, grow, and die, and buries them in the earth, and changes them into stone, apart from time and at his mere will, more wondrously can he deal with the world of spirits, who are never subject to the accidents of matter. He can by one keen pang of agony punish the earthly soul, or by one temptation justify it, or by one vision glorify it. Adam fell in a moment; Abraham was justified upon his seizing the knife; Moses lost Canaan for a word; David said, "I have sinned," and was forgiven; Solomon gained wisdom in a dream; Peter made one confession and received the keys; our Lord baffled Satan in three sentences; he redeemed us in the course of a day; he regenerates us by a form of words. We know not how "fearfully and wonderfully" our souls "are made." To men in sleep, in drowning, or in excitement, moments are as years. They suddenly become other men, nature or grace dispensing with time.

3. But again, you say, How can I pray to see Christ, who am so unclean? You say well that you are unclean. But in what time do you propose to become otherwise? Do you expect in this life ever to be clean? Yes, in one sense, by the presence of the Holy Ghost within you; but that presence we trust you have now. But if by "clean," you mean free from that infection of nature, the least drop of which is sufficient to dishonor all your services, clean you never will be till you have paid the debt of sin, and lose that body which Adam has begotten. Be sure that the longer you live, and the holier you become, you will only perceive that misery more clearly. The less of it you have, the more it will oppress you; its full draught does but confuse and stupefy you; as you come to yourself, your misery begins. The more your soul becomes one with him who deigns to dwell within it, the more it sees with his eyes. You dare not pray for his presence now; would you pray for it had you lived Methuselah's years? I trow not. You will never be good enough to desire it; no one in the whole church prays for it except on conditions implied. To the end of the longest life you are still a beginner. What Christ asks of you is not sinlessness, but diligence. Had you lived ten times your present age, ten times more service would be required of you. Every day you live longer more will be required. If he were to come to-day, you would be judged up to to-day. Did he come to-morrow, you would be judged up to to-morrow. Were the time put off a year, you would have a year more to answer for. You cannot elude your destiny, you cannot get rid of your talent; you are to answer for your opportunities, whatever they may be, not more or less. You cannot be profitable to him, even with the longest life; you can show faith and love in an hour. True it is, if you have turned from him, and served sin, and in proportion as you have done this, you have a great work before you—to undo what you have done. If you have given years to Satan, you have a double duty, to repent as well as to work; but even then you may pray without dread, for in praying for his presence you still are praying, as I have said, to be ready for it.

4. But once more. You ask, how you can make up your mind to stand before your Lord and God? I ask, in turn, how do you bring yourself to come before him now day by day? for what is this but meeting him? Consider what it is you mean by praying, and you will see that, at that very time that you are asking for the coming of his kingdom you are anticipating that coming, and accomplishing the thing you fear. When you pray, you come into his presence. Now reflect on yourself, what your feelings are in coming. They are these: you seem to say—I am in myself nothing but a sinner, a man of unclean lips and earthly heart. I am not worthy to enter into his presence. I am not worthy of the least of all his mercies. I know he is all-holy, yet I come before him; I place myself under his pure and piercing eyes, which look me through and through, and discern every trace and every motion of evil within me. Why do I do so? First of all, for this reason. To whom should I go? What can I do better? Who is there in the whole world that can help me? Who that will care for me, or pity me, or have any kind thought of me, if I cannot obtain it of him? I know he is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; but I know again that he is all-merciful, and that he so sincerely desires my salvation that he has died for me. Therefore, though I am in a great strait, I will rather fall into his hands, than into those of any creature. True it is, I could find creatures more like myself, imperfect or sinful; it might seem better to betake myself to some of these who have power with God, and to beseech them to interest themselves for me. But no; somehow I cannot content myself with this: no, terrible as it is, I had rather go to God alone. I have an instinct within me which leads me to rise and go to my Father, to name the Name of his well-beloved Son, and having named it, to place myself unreservedly in his hands, saying, "If thou, Lord, wilt be extreme to mark what is done amiss, O Lord, who may abide it? But there is forgiveness with thee." This is the feeling in which we come to confess our sins, and to pray to God for pardon and grace day by day; and observe, it is the very feeling in which we must prepare to meet him when he comes visibly. Why, even children of this world can meet a judicial process and a violent death with firmness. I do not say that we must have ought of their pride or their self-trusting tranquillity. And yet there is a certain composure and dignity which become us who are born of immortal seed, when we come before our Father. If indeed we have habitually lived to the world, then truly it is natural we should attempt to fly from him whom we have pierced. Then may we well call on the mountains to fall on us, and on the hills to cover us. But if we have lived, however imperfectly, yet habitually, in his fear, if we trust that his Spirit is in us, then we need not be ashamed before him. We shall then come before him, as now we come to pray—with profound abasement, with awe, with self-renunciation, still as relying upon the Spirit which he has given us, with our faculties about us, with a collected and determined mind, and with hope. He who cannot pray for Christ's coming, ought not, in consistency, to pray at all.

I have spoken of coming to God in prayer generally; but if this is awful, much more is coming to him in the sacrament of holy communion; for this is in very form an anticipation of his coming, a near presence of him in earnest of it. And a number of men feel it to be so; for, for one reason or another, they never come before him in that most holy ordinance, and so deprive themselves of the highest of blessings here below. Thus their feeling is much the same as theirs would be, who from fear of his coming did not dare look out for it. They indeed who are in the religious practice of communicating, understand well enough how it is possible to feel afraid and yet to come. Surely it is possible, and the case is the same as regards the future day of Christ. You must tremble, and yet pray for it. We have all of us experienced enough even of this life to know that the same seasons are often most joyful and also most painful. Instances of this must suggest themselves to all men. Consider the loss of friends, and say whether joy and grief, triumph and humiliation, are not strangely mingled, yet both really preserved. The joy does not change the grief, nor the grief the joy, into some third feeling; they are incommunicable with each other, both remain, both affect us. Or consider the mingled feelings with which a son obtains forgiveness of a father—the soothing thought that all displeasure is at an end, the veneration, the love, and all the indescribable emotions most pleasurable, which cannot be put into words, yet his bitterness against himself. Such is the temper in which we desire to come to the Lord's table; such in which we must pray for his coming; such in which his elect will stand before him when he comes.

5. Lastly, let me say more distinctly what I already alluded to, that in that solemn hour we shall have, if we be his, the inward support of his Spirit, too, carrying us on toward him and "witnessing with our spirits that we are the children of God." That Spirit is vouchsafed to us here; and if we yield ourselves to his gracious influences, so that he draws up our thoughts and wills to heavenly things, and becomes one with us, he will assuredly be still in us and give us confidence at the day of judgment. He will be with us, and strengthen us; and how great his strength is, what mind of man can conceive? Gifted with that supernatural strength we may be able to lift up our eyes to our Judge when he looks on us, and look on him in turn, though with deep awe, yet without confusion of face, as if in the consciousness of innocence.

The hour must come at length upon every one of us. When it comes, may the countenance of the most Holy quicken, not consume us; may the flame of judgment be to us only what it was to the three holy children, over whom the fire had no power.—Selected.

THE CHRISTIAN PASSOVER.

WE were not a little pleased and gratified, recently, to find the following article on the above subject in "The Advance," the Congregational paper at Chicago. Truth may make its way slow; but in these days of investigation it will come to light, and the corruptions of the dark ages of superstition and will-worship must be purged out by the light of truth. The subject in "The Advance" is presented by questions, but none the less forcible on that account. Read and ponder well.

QUERIES ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF THE CRUCIFIXION.

BY REV. J. A. HALLOCK.

1. Have not mankind so uniformly resorted to annual observances of their birthday events, whether as nations, churches, companies, boards or individuals, as to evince a want, to this effect, inherent in our very being?

2. Did not the Divine Lawgiver of the ancient Jews recognize this want, in the anniversary character given to nearly all the rites, whether commemorative or suggestive, of that foreshadowing dispensation?

3. Has Christianity, as now practised, any annual observance calculated to awaken the inquiry—"What mean ye by this sacrifice?"—thus inviting attention to the foundations of the Christian church?

4. Must we, therefore, confess to a deficiency of gospel ways and means for its success? Should we not rather suspect, that we may misapprehend the provision in this case?

5. What did our Lord mean, in that last act of his personal freedom?—"With desire I have desired to eat this passover with you, before I suffer; for I say unto you, that I will not eat any more thereof until it (the Passover) be fulfilled (or renewed) in the kingdom of God (the Christian dispensation.)" Thus, the old Mosaic type had His last approving presence. But as they closed their Paschal supper, He took bread, and gave thanks, and broke off a piece, and said,—"THIS is my body," (that victim lamb has been my body; but henceforth) "This is my body; take, eat; it is broken for you. This do to the memory of me" (no longer to achievements in Egypt, but to the memory of my broken body) "as often (that is, as repeatedly, to unnumbered years) as ye eat this bread and drink this cup ye do show (celebrate) the Lord's death till He come." Then, taking the cup, and as if saying—"the blood of that Paschal lamb has been my blood of the old covenant," "This cup is my blood of the new covenant, drink, all ye, of it." I repeat, what did He mean, in thus changing three items, only, of that service—bread, and not flesh—a fragment, and not a full meal—to the memory of "the Lord's death," and not at the Passover of Egypt, and leaving all else in full force? Why did not the disciples ask—When, Lord, shall we do this? Did they not know this, without asking? And had they put that question, may we not know, that His answer would have been—"If I had intended any change of time, I would have told you?"

6. Do not the combined statements of Pliny, the Roman governor, at about the time of St. John's death, that Christians were accustomed "to partake of a common and innocent meal on the evening of the first day of the week"—the same is fully ascribed by Tertullian, a little later, also by Jude, as "a feast of charity—a love feast"—and by Peter—"sporting themselves, in the love feast, while they feast with you," (according to a corrected reading)—do not these statements go to show, that other than the Eucharist must, or at least may be the breaking of bread intended in some of the proof texts adduced in support of the alleged apostolic practice of frequent communion?

8. How can we understand Paul's anxiety to "keep the approaching feast, in Jerusalem," some twenty-seven years after the crucifixion, if Christianity had no solemn anniversary?

9. Why does Paul, writing just at or before the Paschal anniversary, urge—"Therefore let us keep the feast, with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth; for Christ, our Passover, (Paschal lamb) is sacrificed for us?"

10. Is it not true that Christians, to avoid conformity with the Jews in this matter, removed their Easter—then called Christian Passover—from the Paschal anniversary to the Sunday following, and in case the Passover came on Sunday, to the next Sunday?

11. Is it not strange that we should think we celebrate the death of Christ, by services on the day which we claim is anniversary of his resurrection? Or that, by emblems of His death exhibited on that day, we are celebrating His resurrection?

12. Is it not possible, admitting the uncertainty of chronological records, by the lunar periods, to reach, with certainty, the day of the crucifixion? and does not such calculation accord with the best supported chronology, fixing the anniversary of that most important of all historical events on the third day of April?

Why is it not of transcendent importance to reach all possible certainty and unanimity in the case, and by suitable appointment and general assemblage on that day, hold in anniversary the three mortal hours upon the cross, with due presentation of the facts and truths, and then, as the hour of Paschal sacrifice—"between the evenings"—when "He cried aloud and gave up the Spirit," approaches, with full consciousness, that it is—this year—1840 years since that painful, fearful, hopeful scene transpired, "eat the Lord's supper," in communion with Him and with each other?

13. Is it necessary to conclude, because this service is adapted and appointed to "show the Lord's death," in anniversary, that it is vitiated by being observed out of that time, at the call of important occasions, like the reception of members to the church?

14. Did not the Jewish child of God in his Passover "discern the Lord's body" by inspired promise, just as the Christian child of God, in his Passover, does by inspired history? Why, then, was frequency of type, in his age of types, denied to the Jew, while we claim that the Christian, in his spiritual age, must have his faith in type "often?"

ALEH KEREACH.

"A Good man—no doubt, but— . . . 'weak' in some points—given to visionary notions: his usefulness is impaired:—damages his position, and spoils his prospects." Q. E. D. "Aleh, kereach!"

"A weak-minded man; a fanatic—impractical and foolish! just as if the age of miracles was not yet past. He ought to know that Millerism and resurrection robes are played out." Q. E. D. "Aleh kereach!"

"Crazy notions; crack-brained enthusiasts; shallow pates; religiously mad!" Q. E. D. "Aleh kereach!" Positive, comparative, superlative.

THERE is one thing in which these three classes, though widely differing otherwise (for the first are good, the second doubtful, the third infidel), are agreed—that is, on the absurdity of a translation of living men and women from the midst of this bustling age. The idea! Preposterous! "Aleh, kereach."

To those, however, who have a better knowledge, these words make ominous suggestions of two she-bears that came out of the wood, symbolizing (possibly) the Antichrist and the false prophet. For, what is contained in this cabalistic-looking Hebrew phrase? Put into English, we recognize a familiar saying—none other than: "Go up, thou bald head!" "Kereach," i. e., bald on top; weak in the brain; soft on religious matters.

Now we may not resort to the tu quoque, and retort "Gibeach," i. e., bald in front; lacking in discernment; imbecile in discerning and sifting facts; weak in the perceptives. But we wish to point out, in the prevalence at this time of the spirit of scoffing that dictated the shouts that rose between Jericho and Bethel, an additional striking proof of the predicted state of the world just preceding the Lord's coming. "Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, 'Where is the promise of his coming? For since the fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.'" (2 Pet iii., 3, 4). "Aleh kereach!"

A few comparisons suggest themselves. Should they be thought a little fanciful, we we plead Kirwan's apology respecting Popery, to wit, that he had long since perceived that the thick hide of the beast is impervious to anything except to shafts tipped with a little ridicule. Amid so much to depress us, a little harmless cheerfulness will help to raise our spirits.

"Aleh kereach!" Who shouted it? Little children. They caught it from the spirit of the age. Why even the good men of those days, the children of the prophets, received Elisha's honest testimony with incredulity, though just before they professed to have had a divine intimation of it. But, now that this intimation had become a fact, they "urged him till he was ashamed." Then the idolators caught up the cry: "There goes the ascension man!'" And then? Why then, as our German friends in their homely proverb say: "Wie die alten sungen, so zwitscherten die yungen." The young birds chirped what the old ones sung.

"Aleh, kereach!" Well (they argued), and what if he has seen Elijah go—what if a rapture has really taken place? To talk of it (you see), is exceedingly ill judged and untimely. "Yes, indeed," responds another, "precisely so; very imprudent—not at all in harmony with public sentiment."

And as for Jezebel's highly cultivated and refined contemporaries, they could not but perceive at once how utterly opposed such a ridiculous statement was to their æsthetic tastes; in a word, to "the enlightened spirit of the age." Consequently, by a natural inference, this Elisha was legitimate game. It was less than he deserved to be made a butt for ridicule. And so the children, with peals of laughter on every side, shouted as the ridiculous idea occurred again and again—shouted: "Aleh, kereach!" And the sport would have lasted longer, but for an intervention from an unexpected quarter.

To send two raging she-bears, that tare forty and two of them limb from limb, to death, with blood, and groans, and tears, seems an extreme measure of retaliation. But that is just what God Almighty did. For some reason He seems to have been more than commonly displeased. Quite unexpectly He took a hand in the matter. Let us not think that milder measures would have been better, lest we might be found in bad company.—TOM PAINE.

Now who are these scoffers? Among them, alas, some few true but deluded disciples—little children in Christ, at best. And among the worldlings what? Little children in knowledge of some of the simplest truths of the Bible, and living evidences of the truth of the statement made in that book, to the effect that: "Professing themselves to be wise they became fools." (Ros. i., 22.)

A friend makes a suggestion: Have you ever, beloved reader, tried to reckon up the sum of the divisions and subdivisions of "our Zion?" Possibly they might amount to just forty-two. "Aleh, kereach! Aleh, kereach!"

"The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done; and there is no new thing under the sun." (Ec. i., 9.)

But amid all this quiet pity or sarcastic din, could warning reach such ears, we would say to them: Pause, examine evidence dispassionately. Granting that some have been fanatics on the advent question, and that "some have ridden this hobby to death," might it not still contain most important truth? Is the sublime second coming of the Lord of life and glory, the only truth that has been injudiciously handled by friends, or travestied and ridiculed by foes? Then whence the bitterness and prejudice against this particular truth, and whence the reluctance honestly and patiently to examine it? Have not some of the greatest minds in the annals of human science, and some of the greatest benefactors of our race had to endure reproach, because of a misapprehension or an ignorance instantly recognized by the succeeding generation?

We affectionately entreat those, at least, who hold with us like precious faith and love in and for our Lord, not thoughtlessly to bear a part in a senseless hue and cry, raised by the "false accusers, incontinent, fierce, and despisers of those that are good," and unworthy of sober, Christian men. Why not, like the Virgin, keep all these things, and ponder them in the heart? What if there seemed to her to be palpable contradictions and unfathomable mysteries? She knew she had received a communication direct from God, and she held fast to it. Why not, like Anna and her friends, be looking for redemption? (Eph. i, 14; Eph. iv., 30; Ros. viii., 23; Luke xxi., 28.)

Let not our Jehoshaphats, who honor Micaiah, fellowship with Ahab in anything, lest, even if that should not come upon them which is written, "Behold, ye despisers, and wonder, and perish! For I work a work in your days; a work which ye shrll in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you," they should be compelled in turn, to long for that which they now smile at and reject, and have to hear and bear, in their turn, the derisive cry: "Alch, kereach!" E. —Prophetic Times.

Westfield, Mass., May, 1869.

Br. Storrs: How glad I am that Jesus ever sought after me, and made me one of his servants. Yet I am sorrowful when I think how poor and unfaithful my service has been.

How sweet to me is the "communion of saints." How cheering to read the warm words from the lonely ones who are suffering for Christ and his truth. The Herald seems better and better to me, and the great principle of Life shines brighter and brighter.

I believe the most direct way to arouse men and women is to preach the gospel to them. The only safe way to persuade them to seek for life is to prove to them that they have no life. Let faint-hearted ones forsake, or "go back," let those who would be "lords over God's heritage" rage and foam, abuse, insult, misrepresent and disfellowship. He that is for us is more than all them that are against us.

Comparing the so-called "Advent papers" of to-day with what they were a few years ago, I can but think how sadly they have changed. Editors and readers then sought for the sympathy and warm words of the humble, sincere Christians. Now an article that shows learning is published, while at the same time words dictated by the Holy Ghost are laid aside. The Gospel, God and Christ used to be most prominent in our papers; and his wonderful works were praised. Now there is so much "man worship"—so much personal complimenting; so much said about this one and that one, and so many little preachers publishing their wonderful success to the world, which, together with the endless amount of brow-beating, one-sided shooting and smiting, that to me most of the papers are really disgusting.

In our Herald who is made mention of most? Let any impartial reader say what name is above all in the minds of those who write for the Herald of Life. It isn't "Bro. Storrs," nor "Bro. Grim," nor "Bro. Wendell," nor "Bro. Burbank." It is the name of Christ, the Life-giver that adorns our pages, and his mighty acts are the themes of every pen that writes for our family paper." So it seems to me.

O may we all be humble and remember how frail the mightiest of mortals is. How weak and faithless the most devoted are, unless Jesus be their constant guide and support. And the weakest and simplest ones may have his help. Blessed be his name forever.

From Samuel Brown.

Milwaukee, Wis., May 13, 1869.

Br. Storrs: Truth is gaining ground here. People are more willing to examine for themselves. Some ministers admit that Orthodoxy must be remodelled. One of them in conversation with me, the other day, said that "Ministers and churches had left the doctrine of the resurrection, which the apostles held to so clearly, in the back ground, or almost entirely ignored it; to which cause," said he, "I believe we may attribute the comparative want of life in the churches at the present day." I had a very pleasant conversation with him. He listened to what I said, and seemed to be somewhat interested. He did not profess to accept our views, but admitted that orthodoxy was not altogether correct. I gave him some of our Campaign Documents. There are evident signs of the fall of old creeds. He brought up all the old arguments, such as "Paul's desire to depart and be with Christ." I asked him when Paul expected to be with Christ? and I presented Paul's own testimony, showing it would be "at Christ's appearing and kingdom." He said, "According to your views, Paul would be with Christ the next moment after his death: to him there would be no visible time between his death and resurrection: his falling asleep and awaking would be to him the same moment." He did not say that he believed that view, but he volunteered to argue my side of the question. He brought up the case of the Rich man and Lazarus. I gave him our explanation of the parable, that Christ was not stating what the intermediate state was, but framed this parable on their false notions of that state, to show them their unbelief: that they would not believe on Him though one rose from the dead; and that He did raise Lazarus, and that Christ was raised from the dead, and they knew it was so; for they hired the soldiers to tell a lie to try to cover up the fact, which they could not in truth deny. My friend said, "That is a very ingenious interpretation of the parable," and smiled, but made no further remark. I believe truth is working on his mind.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, MAY 19, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Zion's Herald Once More.

The above-named paper has latterly become reticent on the Life question, so far as editorial is concerned. We cannot blame it, nor do we complain on that account. It lasts manifestation is by a selection, which is credited to the "N. H. Christian Advocate." What the initials "N. H." stand for we do not know. If there is such a paper in New Hampshire, we have never heard of it. It matters not, however, where it is published, or what denomination it represents, if any.

As "Zion's Herald" has transferred an article from it to its columns on "Soul Existence," some one connected with the "Herald" must have thought the article worth reproducing. We do not believe it was our worthy Br. Haven, the editor; so that we shall not feel that we are dealing with him, personally, in our remarks on the article. We give it entire, appending notes.

SOUL EXISTENCE.

What a fearfully dangerous doctrine is that which is vehemently urged by the so-called annihilationists of the present day, who deny the positive and separate existence of the human soul! (1.) It is not wonderful that it obtains the assent of so few persons who give any evidence of genuine religious experience. (2.) It is the worst part of ancient Sadduceeism, which denied both spiritual existence and a resurrection. (3. It joins hands with the grossest materialism, and denies that there can be thought without a brain. (4.) Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, of whom God declares that he is their God, are not living, and therefore God is the God of the dead, the words of Christ to the contrary, notwithstanding. They have no existence now any more than before they were created! They existed in the thought of God before, and only so now! (5.) The penitent thief, who was to be "this day" with Jesus "in Paradise," is not there yet! The Saviour has been there many centuries, but the penitent is as though he had never been! He awaits a new creation! Indeed, Jesus himself was not—in the interval between his crucifixion and resurrection! Resurrection is an unfortunate word—it should be second creation! (6.)

Can it be that any who base their faith on the Bible, entertain such a dogma? How can a man "rise again" unless he exists when in the act of rising? (7).

There is no danger that this notion will ever be held by many intelligent Christians. (8.) Occasionally a single Christian may be found who, having obtained his religious experience and character under better teachings, can imbibe this error and yet maintain his integrity, perhaps; but by far the larger part of those who adopt it will lose thereby their expectation of eternal life, and find themselves an easy prey to gross materialism and infidelity. (9.)

Profound faith in God is the heart of religion, but God is a spirit, and the essential nature of man is spirit. (10) Whoever believes in God will find no difficulty in recognizing the spirituality of man. (11) That long line of worthies mentioned in the eleventh chapter of the Hebrews is not a dry catalogue of names, to be given again to recreated men. They have already entered upon their reward, and the names even now mean men. (12.)

"Why, then, look for a resurrection?" Why, indeed! Because God has promised it. Because it is the blessed will of the Infinite One that progress and improvement shall characterize all his works. The existence of departed human spirits now is an advance beyond their earthly life; their existence after the resurrection by which they shall be "clothed upon" with "spiritual bodies," shall be an advance upon their present life. So far only has the vista of immortality been prophetically opened; but who shall deny that there may be still other advancements in glory? who now can comprehend the developments of eternity? (13.)

Nearly all error among honest Christians arises from an incapability of entertaining views that do not seem at first to be in perfect harmony with each other. (14.) Some little segment of truth is seized upon, and magnified, and allowed to fill the whole vision, and everything else is overlooked or denied. (15.) We must learn to embrace separate truths, though we cannot understand all their connections and relations. The immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the body are both revealed facts, and neither of them should be undervalued. (16.) God hath created both matter and finite spirits. Who can say which first came into being? Either may exist alone, but each seems made for the other, and in man are both eternally to be united.

Notes by Editor of Herald of Life.

(1.) What is "the human soul?" Is it a Bible soul? or a fancy one, such as self-styled orthodoxy contends for? If the latter, prove that it ever had an "existence;" the Bible knows nothing of such a creation. If "the human soul" is a Bible one—as we believe—it most assuredly has a "positive and separate existence:" i. e., it has its own proper personality, and exists "separate" from all other existences.

(2.) Their "religious experience" is not that of making long prayers, or seeking chief seats in the synagogues, or of being called of men Rabbi, nor yet of allowing "human souls" to dictate to them what construction they shall put on the words of God. As to the genuineness of our religious experience: "It is a very small thing to be judged of man's judgment." 1 Corth. iv., 3. In the estimation of the Pharisees, all genuine religion dwelt with them, and they "despised others," even the poor, fisherman that followed the meek and lowly Jesus. "If they have called the Master of the house Beelzebub, how much more they of his household?" Matth. x., 25.

(4.) Perhaps the author of this statement has demonstrated there can be "thought without a brain," for he really seems to have none. He may next demonstrate that there "can be thought without a" thinker, or without existence. Let it be remembered that all created beings are organized, and hence must have some organ of thought. That organ in man is a brain: God has ordained it so. How other beings beside man exercise thought we are not called upon to determine. We just, therefore, give a simple denial to this writer's statements.

(5.) These statements show an entire ignorance of the subject of which the writer undertakes to speak. He neither understands our Lord or those he opposes. There are two senses in which a man may be dead. 1. He may be dead never to live again. 2. He may be dead, and yet be certain to be revived from death. Our Lord's controversy was with the "Sadducees, which deny that there is any resurrection." Luke xx., 27; or, "say that there is no resurrection." Matth. xxii., 23. The question was not about the state of the dead; for between our Lord and the Sadducees there was no dispute on that point. It was the resurrection of the dead, and that only. To affirm that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were at that time actually alive, is to nullify our Lord's argument; for the resurrection of a living man is an impossibility and an absurd idea. Our Lord demonstrated that though these men were now dead, God was pledged to make them alive again, for he calls himself their God, which he would not be if they were dead, never to have a resurrection, as the Sadducees maintained. God is not the God of such dead; but he is the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; therefore they will live again by a resurrection—they all live to him, because their life is certain to be restored—"God calling things that be not as though they were," as when he said to Abraham, "I have made thee the father of many nations" (Rom. iv., 17), when, as yet, those nations were unborn. So our Lord tells the Sadducees that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob shall have a revival into life, because God is their God; which he would not be if there is "no resurrection;" for he is not the God of any who are to have no resurrection.

(6.) Here are a plenty of marks of surprise "!" We do not wonder at it: ignorance is generally surprised at the plainest truths. The writer doubtless supposes paradise is the same as heaven; and he is ignorant of the fact that Jesus himself said, three days after the crucifixion, "I am not yet ascended to my Father;" John xx., 17; so that if the thief went there previous to that time he did not find Jesus, and so this wise theologian shows his ignorance of the Saviour's promise, which was an answer to the thief's prayer, "Remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." Says Archbishop Whately, "Into is a mistranslation: it should be in thy kingdom; the meaning is—at thy second coming in triumphant glory."—Whately's Future States," p. 324.

Such being the fact, "this day" is still future, and the promise will be made good at the time spoken of—"When thou comest in Thy kingdom." Thus all our wise reproacher's amazement vanishes in the smoke of his fancied wisdom. "Resurrection is," truly, "an unfortunate word" for him; for it implies death reversed, when used of reliving from the dead. But death is never reversed, according to "orthodoxy," because the person never was dead, and the resurrection of such is impossible. Which is the greater absurdity, to call a revival from a state of death a "second creation," or to call it a "reunion of soul and body?" The latter has not one word of authority in the Bible; while for the former it has the declaration of Jesus, "The dead are raised;" and God saith, "Behold, I make all things new." See Luke xx., 37, and Rev. xxi., 5.

(7.) "How can a man" come into life "again" if he was never out of life? Orthodoxy maintains the thinker never did die, but was always alive. This thinker (which they call the soul), cannot be said to have a resurrection, for it was never anything else but a living personality, according to their theory. Thus they set aside the resurrection of the person and make it only a resurrection of the body. Their theory makes Jesus' words, "I am he that was dead and am alive again," to mean "my body was dead, but is alive again; and this "the word of Christ to the contrary, notwithstanding!" thus rejecting the testimony of Christ "to establish their own traditions."

(8.) Truly, "strait is the gate, and narrow is the way that leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it." The "many" do not walk this road. "Have any of the rulers or Pharisees believed on him?" "Not many wise . . . are called." It is the babes that learn the truth. "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight."

(9.) All this is very charitable, no doubt, but, "man, who made you judge" in the matter? There is another that judgeth; and he has said, "Judge not, that ye be not judged; and condemn not that ye be not condemned." Do you know who will "lose their expectation of eternal life?" Are those more likely to do it whose only hope of that life is as a "gift of God through Jesus Christ," than such as exalt themselves into gods by claiming they are inherently immortal, and "will live as long as God lives," Christ or no Christ? "Take heed that you despise not one of these little ones that believe in" Jesus. Matth. xviii., 6, 10.

(10.) A mere assumption. Jesus saith, "Ye must be born again." Why? Because "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." It takes a new birth to make a spiritual man. To affirm that "the essential nature of man is spirit," is to deny the testimony of Jesus. A spiritual nature for man is only by regeneration, orthodoxy "to the contrary, notwithstanding."

(11.) We "believe in God," but we do not "recognize the spirituality of man," because, we believe God and our Lord Jesus Christ, rather than the "traditions of men," who "seek to be as God," while they are "of the earth, earthy," and without a re-creation never will be spiritual.

(12.) More assumptions and tradition, by which the "counsel of God is turned into foolishness." Jesus saith, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Luke xiv., 14. Again, he saith, "the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels, and then he shall reward every man according to his works." Matth. xvi., 27. And Paul saith of this same "catalogue of names" [Heb. xi.,] "These all died in faith, not having received the promises" [verse 13], and winds up the chapter by adding, "These all, having obtained a good report through faith received not the promise," etc. [verse 39]. To these testimonies a multitude more might be added, but these are sufficient to disprove the bald assertion that "they have already entered upon their reward."

(13.) We are glad that you felt obliged to notice the resurrection, which is very seldom mentioned in these days of "going to heaven at death." But you feel evidently not very much at home in this, to you, new field. The resurrection is the great theme of the New Testament, and was the hope of all Bible Christians. Paul, when accused, said, "Of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question." Acts xxiii., 6. When the "intelligent" Athenians—the "philosophers" of those days, "encountered" Paul, "Some said, What will this babbler say? other some, He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods, because he preached unto them Jesus and the resurrection." Acts xvii., 18. To preach "Jesus and the resurrection" as the hope, is, in these days, "babbling," in the eyes of those calling themselves "intelligent Christians." But "the wisdom of this age" may yet be found "foolish" before God's truth; and we have a striking example of it in the paragraph on which we are now remarking. The author is compelled to admit "a resurrection." That he could not avoid. But what a mixture of conjectures to get over the difficulty of reconciling it with his previous assertions. He says he looks for a resurrection "Because God has promised it." That is a good reason; so far we are agreed. Why has God promised it? He says, "Because it is the will of the Infinite One that progress and improvement shall characterize all his works." Is that a Bible reason for a resurrection? If so, where is it found in that Book?

Paul saith, "If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen; and if Christ be not risen, then is our preaching vain, and your faith is also vain." 1 Corth. xv., 13, 14. Again, Paul saith, "If Christ be not raised . . . ye are yet in your sins. Then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished:" verses 17, 18. Once more, saith Paul, "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" verse 32. Who does not see a grandeur in Paul's reasons for a resurrection that has no relationship with the human invention of a "Christian Advocate?" That's for "progress and improvement!" Paul's for life, and as the only hope of life in the future; without which even those "fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Paul's reasons for a resurrection are grand, glorious, God-like, inspired. The "Advocate's" are of human invention, manifesting a desperate effort to bolster up an anti scriptural theory of "going to heaven at death." The hope of the gospel is ignored, and left to be kept before the world by Life believers, who maintain that a future life, or life subsequent to death, is only by a resurrection from the dead, through Christ, "the resurrection and the life," and is a "gift of God," and not an inherent principle in man. "The dead know not anything:" "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in sheol, whither thou goest." Eccl. ix., 5, 10. "The dead praise not the Lord." Psa. cxv., 17. "If the dead rise not, then they who have fallen asleep in Christ are perished;" all of which declarations show that life, consciousness after death, is only to be had by a resurrection from the dead.

To talk of "human spirits" being "now," after death," in "advance beyond their earthly life," as the above writer has, is to manifest a lack of knowledge of what the Bible teaches to be the state of the dead, which is inexcusable in an "intelligent Christian."

The "Advocate's" reference to Paul's language, "clothed upon," which it admits is "after the resurrection," is an "unfortunate" quotation; for Paul explicitly denies that he had any desire for an unclothed state. He says, "Not for that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." He did not desire that state which the "Advocate" says "is an advance beyond this present life." "No, no," saith Paul; "I would not have that unclothed condition." Manifestly he had no such view of a death state as the "Advocate" speaks of. But he did "groan" with desire to be "clothed upon," which even this "Christian Advocate" admits is the resurrection state. Then, and not till then, would "mortality be swallowed up of life." 2 Corth. v., 4. So mightily does Paul differ from the "intelligent Christian Advocate."

"But did not Paul say, 'We are . . . willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord?'" Yes, but what body was it he spoke of? He tells you it was the body of "mortality," not by being "unclothed," but "clothed upon with our house which is from heaven . . . that mortality might be swallowed up of life." Turn which way he will, our "intelligent Christian" brother meets the flaming sword of truth, which turns every way to keep the way of the tree of life till the Life-giver, Jesus Christ, shall return "from heaven. . . Who shall [then] change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body." Phil. iii., 20, 21. Then, and not till then, will Paul, or any other saint, be absent from this "mortality," and be "swallowed up of life." "We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." 1 John iii., 2. All this talk about "departed human spirits now" being in a conscious life in "advance beyond their earthly life," is "adding to the things of the Book" of God, which nothing but unavoidable ignorance can excuse. May God cause that "blindness" soon to be removed.

(14.) In this remark there is considerable truth, but it is not the whole truth. Human traditions, which originated in false philosophy, have so corrupted the theological atmosphere of Christendom, and have been forced on youthful minds, filling them with the fear of being "cast out of the synagogne," so that even "honest Christians" are much like the "woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself." Luke xiii., 11. She was indeed "a daughter of Abraham." But till Jesus made her free she goes dragging herself along at a slow and painful rate. So it is with many "honest Christians." They have tried in vain to find a "harmony" in God's word by looking for it through human traditions; but they can "in no wise lift up" themselves to look Jesus full in the face—He who is "the way, the truth, and the life." The bright radiance of his heavenly and loving countenance so eclipses the human traditions which have "bowed" them "together" from their youth up, that they fear he is "Beelzebub," instead of the "Light of the world." They have been taught that "the common people" must not trust in any teacher other than "authorized expounders of the word," which the so-called "ministers of the gospel" claim to be, and forget that "Thus saith the Lord: Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord." Jer. xvii., 5. "Come unto me," saith Jesus. "Go to the priest," saith tradition. "If you undertake to understand the teachings of the Bible without us," say the traditionists, "you will find yourselves an easy prey to gross materialism and infidelity." So the "honest Christian" is often frightened, by well-meaning teachers, it may be, but who are themselves the victims of a similar training by others who have gone before them. "The Bible! the Bible! that is a dreadful Book for common people to read, thinking to understand without our traditionary rule," cry the traditionists. That ends all controversy—"Don't the minister know?"

(15.) Yes; and a monstrous falsehood, first started in Eden—"Thou shalt not surely die,"—"is seized upon, and magnified" into an "immortal soul," which is "allowed to fill the whole vision, and everything else is overlooked or denied"—even the testimony of God that "The soul that sinneth it shall die;" Ezk. xviii., 4, 20: and, "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi., 23. Such inspired testimony is dissipated, dissolved into thin air, by the miasmatic operations of the inherent immortality theory. That poisons even the truths held by its advocates, and changes their true character to make them correspond to the perversion which that theory compels its votaries to adopt.

(16.) "The immortality of the soul is" not "a revealed fact," unless "the serpent" revealed it in Eden; for not once is "the soul" said to be "immortal" or "deathless" in any utterance of God, Jesus Christ, the Prophets, or Apostles. It is a bald assertion, without one divine testimony to sustain it. How long would the doctrine of the resurrection stand if as naked of proof as the notion of an "immortal soul?" It would soon perish from off the earth if it was not spoken of and urged, by Christ and his Apostles, over and over again. And as it is, the immortal soul theory has well nigh banished the resurrection from all the self-styled "orthodox" pulpits in the land. We ask the "N. H. Christian Advocate" and its copyist, "Zion's Herald," to ponder well the remark of the great Methodist Commentator, Dr. Adam Clarke, at the close of his observations on 1 Corth. xv. He says:

One remark I cannot help making; the doctrine of the resurrection appears to have been thought of much more consequence among the primitive Christians than it is now! How is this? The apostles were continually insisting on it, and exciting the followers of God to diligence, obedience, and cheerfulness, through it. And their successors in the present day seldom mention it! So apostles preached; and so primitive Christians believed: so we preach, and so our hearers believe. There is not a doctrine in the gospel on which more stress is laid: and there is not a doctrine in the present system of preaching which is treated with more neglect."

These facts were unexplainable to Dr. Clarke; and he asks, "How is this?" but attempts no answer. He is dumb on that point. Why was he? Because he was a believer in the inherent immortality of the soul, and going to heaven or hell at death. Had he been free from these human traditions he would readily have seen why ministers of "the present day" have left off giving the resurrection the prominence that "primitive Christians" did. Those Christians were not corrupted with this heathen-born speculation of an immortal soul; and the resurrection from the dead was their only hope of a future life. But, alas! as time rolled on, primitive Christianity was corrupted by the heathen speculation; the fruit of which was to spawn into the church Popery, with all its abominations; and Protestants have brought out of the house of that old "Mother of harlots" the filthy and corrupting garment of inherent immortality; and the resurrection has been well nigh suffocated by the miasma of the harlot's robe.

This corruption of Christianity commenced early in the second century, perhaps sooner. Even then men sprang up in the Church who denied the resurrection, and believed in going to heaven at death. Justin Martyr, converted to Christianity, A. D. 132–133, and flourished as a writer A. D. 140–160, in his remarks to Trypho, who had questioned him in regard to his faith, among other things, said,

"If therefore you fall in with certain who are called Christians, who . . . dare to blaspheme the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in that they say there is no resurrection of the dead, but that immediately when they die, their souls are received up into heaven—avoid them, and esteem them not Christians,' etc.

But primitive Christianity has long since passed away; and its place is now occupied by the inventions of men, such as "immortal souls, going to heaven at death; eternal torments, always dying and never dead; reunion of soul and body," (instead of the resurrection of the dead), and all manner of fancies of human invention. Truly did the Apostle speak as follows: "The time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine; but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears; and they [these teachers] shall turn away their ears from the truth, [the word of God], and shall be turned unto fables." 2 Timo. iv., 3, 4. And as Jesus said to the Pharisees, "Full well ye reject the commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition" . . . . "Making the word of God of none effect through your tradition, which ye have delivered," Mark vii., 9, 13.

What is that tradition which has corrupted Christianity, and deprived it of its primitive simplicity and power? It is the theological notion that man has a spiritual entity, called "the soul," and that this is immortal and cannot literally die; for which there is not one testimony in the word of God. This ingredient, thrust into theology, has taken the Life gift away from Christ and made it inherent in man, and made the resurrection of the dead as useless as it is impossible; for if "the essential nature of man" never dies, man can never have a resurrection; for the resurrection necessitates first the death. So Christ's saying of those who believe on Him—"I will raise him [the believer] up at the last day," is set at naught through this tradition of inherent immortality. And it corrupts nearly every other truth of the Bible

Though we have not said quite "a hundred words to one" of "Zion's Herald's" copied article on "Soul Existence," we take our leave of it, for the present. May we all be content to sit at Jesus' feet and learn of Him; concerning whom it was said, "Never man spake like this man;" and yet He never spake of an immortal soul, or going to heaven at death; but of resurrection from the dead.

WE ARE AGREED.

WE are happy to agree perfectly with Br. Grant, of the "World's Crisis," in the following statement and sentiments. Let us labor on with patience till the grand and glorious consummnation.

THE PROSPECT.

We think there has been no time in twenty years, when the people in the different churches, who love the Bible, have been so willing and anxious to hear about the coming of Jesus, the sleep of the dead, and the destruction of the wicked, as at the present time. The truth is, that those who really love the Lord are starving for the want of the very truths on which we are feasting; and many are so hungry, they are willing to break loose from all sectarian fetters and follow Jesus through evil as well as good report. When people love the truth more than friends and reputation, they have but little difficulty in finding and embracing it.

The prospect is now very encouraging. We have only to present the truth in love and kindness, and we shall see happy results. All harshness toward those who do not see as we do will only tend to destroy our usefulness. So long as the Lord bears with them, we should manifest a gentle spirit toward them. If he, in his holiness, can endure their unbelief, certainly, we in our low condition ought to be as forbearing. Only think how much the Lord has had to overlook in us; let us show the same spirit to others.

The truth has suffered much by the heat of its defenders; and their severe expressions against those who differ from them in doctrinal opinions. Be firm, but kind. Defend the truth; but do it in love, and we shall soon have many more to help in the good work.

GENUINE "ORTHODOXY."

IN the "Advent Herald," of May 11, is an "Obituary," with an introductory notice by the Editor, as follows:

"The following letter will be read by many with deep but sad interest. I have only to add that about twelve years ago, when the Advent church at Derby Line, Vt., was organized, sister A. Blake united with it; and after her marriage to Mr. Harvey, and removal to Granby, she became connected with the church in Shefford—of which I was then pastor. She was numbered among our intimate friends, and though she has disappeared from our view we count her not lost We sympathize with the sorrowing now, and trust to share with them in the gladness of the glorified in the resurrection morning, when our departed sister will come from the land of the enemy. May the affliction be sanctified. J. M. ORROCK."

Most heartily do we agree with Br. Orrock that it is "from the land of the enemy" this "departed sister will come, in the resurrection morning." Such sentiments are both scriptural and genuinely orthodox; and they contrast wonderfully with the language of H. W. Beecher and the "Ch. Advocate," on which we commented last week, under the head of "More 'Translations.'" Still, we would like our "orthodox" Br. of the "Advent Herald" to tell us how Sister Harvey can "come from the land of the enemy," if she has gone to be consciously with Christ in paradise, as we understand him to believe and teach? Our love of truth and consistency makes us thus inquisitive. Br. Orrock believes the saints are conscious when dead, or "between death and resurrection," as his remarks we commented on last week, under the head "A Man of Straw," show. If so, and sister Harvey is in conscious bliss with Christ, how can he call that state "the land of the enemy?"

We believe his language in the above introductory remarks are correct; and therefore we reject the idea held by him and other "orthodoxists" that the sleeping saints have gone to a state of conscious bliss in heaven or paradise. Death, the "last enemy" holds its dominion over them till "the resurrection morning" at Christ's triumphantly appearing in glory; when His sleeping saints "shall see Him as He is, and be like Him:" then shall "death have no more dominion over them."

The "letter" to which Br. Orrock calls attention by his introductory remarks is one of painful interest; and although all the parties concerned were entire strangers to us, we cannot help sympathising with the surviving friends and we give to our readers the letter itself, as follows:

Dear Brother: It is my painful duty to inform you of the death of my dear sister, Mrs. Z. Harvey, of Granby, P. Q., Canada. Last Wednesday, April 21, she, with others, was invited to take tea with her near neighbor, Mrs. H. Miner; and after tea the company went about ten rods, down on the bridge, to view the flood of water and ice that was rushing down over the dam. While there the abutment of the bridge gave way, and in an instant the bridge fell some twenty-four feet, carrying with it eleven precious souls: Mrs. H. Miner, her little daughter Cora, and her mother; Mrs. J. Bradford, her two only children, and her sister, Miss Sarah Harvey of Waterloo; Mr. Gilmore and his little son; Mr. P. Hackett, and my dear sister. It seems very strange that so many good, pious souls should be together to pass into eternity. A few moments before there were about fifty persons on the bridge. There have been eight bodies recovered up to this date. Last Saturday and Sunday they were interred: four on Saturday and four on Sunday. Mr. Howell, the Congregational minister of the place, delivered a very good discourse from the words: "They shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy." Rev. iii., 4. I never witnessed such a scene before and trust I may never again.

Amanda was very anxious to see you and Mrs. Orrock, and thought a great deal of going to Magog, if the conference should be held there in June. Mr. Harvey is very lonely, and the whole village is in moruning. Those lost were among the most prominent and useful persons in the place. No tongue can tell or pen describe our deep sorrow. Amanda was thirty-five years old March 21, and had been married about six years, and I think I never saw a couple more happy.

Amanda's health for some time was quite poor, but for the past three months she was on the gain, and was feeling quite well. . . . Wishing you good-by, and that we may all be received by our heavenly Father with the welcome words, "Well done," I remain your brother in Christ, ISRAEL BLAKE.

GARRETS AND CELLARS.

IN a few weeks I expect to be at my favorite employment in the highways and hedges of Philadelphia. I have not lelt it my duty to engage in any other work than this. The Lord has adapted me to such kind of labor, and as few care to engage in it, I consider it my duty as well as privilege to labor for my Master in such a sphere. My calling is no higher than a garret or lower than a cellar. The same Lord who has supported me hitherto will supply my future needs.

Last week I visited my mission field, and my heart rejoiced greatly in seeing so much good fruit remaining, the blessing of the Lord upon the labors of Srs. Helginson, Reeves, and myself. It is a sad field, full of trials and perplexities, but I go trusting in him who has said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee."

My stay with Br. Storrs has been exceedingly pleasant, and I have been benefitted by his kind counsel. The brethren also have been very kind to me. The Lord has dealt wondrously with me in this direction, for as yet I have not even received an unkind word from our brethren who do not agree with us on the resurrection question. In fact some of the strongest opposers of the view are, among my warmest friends. I cannot see why those who truly love God should do otherwise than to love one another with pure hearts fervently, even though our views on some points may be widely different. It has been my aim to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

Br. Storrs will need some one to assist him in the duties of the office, and I pray that the Lord may raise up some one upon whom he can depend for a faithful discharge of those duties.

In conclusion I ask the brethren and sisters to pray for me, that I may have the blessing of the Lord as I go once more into the garrets and cellars to feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to visit the sick and the dying, to strengthen the weak saint, to reclaim the wandering, and to win the outcasts to Christ. "The harvest is great, but the laborers are few." Yours affectionately,

F. H. BURBANK.

HERALD OF LIFE Office, Box 4,658, N. Y. City.

FROM DR. JAMES F. LEE.

MONROE, N. C., May 17, 1869.

"THE love of Christ constraineth us." Love is the bond of perfection. Love is union. It transports. It pervades and possesses our whole being. Oh, the transports, the ecstacies of love. "My heart and my flesh cry out for the living God. God is love. As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God! My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God! Many waters cannot quench love, neither can the floods drown it. The love of Christ constraineth us." It constrains me to write a few lines to George Storrs, and tell him that, in 1848—twenty-one years ago—when I first sent him an epistle, I did not know quite as much as I do at this moment; and that, instead of standing still, I was constrained to go forward. O sir, I have progressed so far that I have made more than a welcome discovery—a discovery far surpassing in magnitude any development of a secret spring of love, hitherto undiscovered, in the heart of man, which, though it is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked, may be touched by divine impulse, and made to throb with the pulsations of sacred truth and love, although for years it had resisted, through mistaken views of Omniscience and Omnipresence, prescience and irrevocable decree, one saving truth, i. e., 'God is love'—and had maintained the notion that the wicked would exist forever in unquenchable fire, and suffer eternally unutterable torments. Now, in this pithy and concise exordium, which is so admirably calculated to awaken your curiosity! do you not anticipate something like a grand discovery? Your anticipation shall be speedily gratified, for I will not keep you much longer in suspense. But before I make the revelation, let me entreat you not to say, "I never was so sadly disappointed in all my days as I was in reading your boasted discovery. It was, if possible, more forcibly feeble than Lord's Review of Dobney!"

The great, grand discovery of something in the heart of Christians! I, a sinner saved by grace, have been constrained to circulate a few tracts at different times for twenty-one years; which have been read by Methodists, Baptists, etc., men professing to be Christians. Many have embraced the Life Views unfolded in these tracts. Some, however, have resisted the truth, and adhered to eternal woe and misery for the wicked against the effulgency of divine light, revealed truth, on the fate of the lost. It seems, however, that a simple and, to some, a silly question or two did cast out of several a legion of devils, and knocked all their Calvinism and Arminianism out of their noddles—I mean their heads—if not their hearts; yes, vain fancies of foreknowledge and decrees have vanished by asking the following questions: If you knew clearly that, were you to marry, your wife and fifteen children would be plunged in a lake of fire and brimstone, and one of the children saved—the sixteenth child—would you marry? Could you marry a girl you fondly, dearly loved, if you knew beforehand that such would be her doom? What was the answer of every professed Christian to whom I proposed the questions? It was the emphatic "No, no, no; I never would have married if I knew such would be the doom of my wife and children!" Well, well. Now, allow me to ask another question: You believe "God is love"—and think you that he would have formed a lake of fire and brimstone from all eternity, and afterward ushered into being unnumbered millions of human beings, frail, ignorant creatures, knowing or decreeing them to such inconceivable torture? No; I cannot, I will not believe it. Such were the answers, invariably, of all. They seemed amazed, astonished, and confounded to think that they had ever believed, or said they believed, such horrible doctrine. Such is the grand discovery I have made. Does it not seem grand? Does it not contain reason and revelation? May it not be unfolded, amplified? I circulated the tracts you sent me.

If my grand discovery is welcome, if it is a welcome discovery, clothe it in your own language, or let it pass in its homespun attire. It has wrought miracles already! It is a positive fact. It has led every man, to whom it was proposed, to reject the idea that "God, who is love," delights in giving to sinners, unconverted, Eternal Life; to inflict on them eternally unutterable tortures.

The tract on "Devil, Satan, Demons," will work miracles. Why? It is truth, the compulsive power of which casts out devils, transforms devils into humble, penitent creatures, clothed in their right minds. For one, I have believed for nearly thirty-three years, that the days of miracles have not ceased; that demoniacs are yet converted; that devils are cast out, and that all these miracles are wrought by the compulsive power of truth. Truth sanctifies. And such should be the effects; such has been the effects of pamphlets I distributed as early as 1848. Let all believers in the Life views give the glory and praise to God through Jesus Christ, who is "The Way, the Truth, and the Life," and let George Storrs say, Amen.

I commission this letter to tell the latter, I shall ever esteem him as an adopted son of God—as my beloved brother, and his servant for Christ's sake.

THE ELEPHANT.

BR. STORRS: We have all heard of the elephant the unfortunate man got at a raffle; he would not work; he could not keep him; would not sell him; could not give him away, and proved to be more plague than profit. Just such an elephant is the immortal soul to the orthodox; they have got him, and know not what to do with him. He is a great pet, but awfully troublesome to find the right place for him. Wise and great men have puzzled their brains to little purpose, for centuries, to solve the mystery, and we are still as wide of the mark as ever. One of the Beechers tried his hand at it, and made out, to his own satisfaction, at least, that men suffered in this life, and might be tormented in the next, for sins committed in a former state of trial (of which they remember nothing) some millions of ages in the past. "Who sinned, this man or his parent that he was born blind?"

As you ought to be posted in all the improvements of the age, I send you another effort in the same direction, from England. "The Unpreached Gospel." If I understand the theory of this modern invention, it is this: All men, of course, are immortal: the elect church only, who receive and obey the gospel, will be saved in this dispensation; those who wilfully reject it, suffer endless punishment. All others, who have heard or rejected the gospel, have a sort of probation in the intermediate state; and are, at the general resurrection, all raised from the dead in mortal bodies; and, under the ministry of the saints, have this "unpreached gospel" proclaimed to them for their acceptance. The great mass of our race, who have ever lived, will then be converted and saved. How many more gospels are to be preached, we are not informed; but to vindicate the "righteousness of God," it is probable that the end will be final and total restoration.

The writer seems to think, that the impartial justice of God demands this at his hands, so as to give all men equal opportunity to know and embrace the gospel. Such are the efforts men make to bolster up their immortal soul system; and it still calls for more.

Query: Is God under any obligation to give any of his creatures eternal life, except by his own free grace and promise?

Have not the horse and the dog, etc., as good a claim on their Maker for a future life as those more responsible animals, who have, (more than they) rendered themselves unworthy of the gift? What injury does God inflict on any mortal being when he takes back only what he gave for a purpose? Is not life and being, as long as it lasts, acknowleged to be a blessing by all living beings? If not, why so anxious to preserve it?

All the trouble is, this pet "elephant," (the immortal soul) and its necessary adjunct, eternal torture, put all the complicated machinery of our existence out of kilter.

This "unpreached gospel" may get hold of some of our mortal resurrection brethren, as next of kin. Will not Bro. Storrs help to put a clog in their wheels?

Yours for the gospel of the kingdom, "Life only in Christ." J. PARRY.

FROM A. C. NEEDHAM.

BOYLAN'S GROVE, IOWA, May 9, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I feel to thank God for making as good a man of you as you are; and I thank you for your kindness in sending me the HERALD OF LIFE so long without pay. The only reason why I have not sent the money before is for want of means, having had sickness in my family. My son, H. H. Needham, that I lived with, was sick with consumption about eighteen months, and finally died the 15th of March last. We sent a notice of his death to the "Voice of the West," with a request for the HERALD OF LIFE to copy; but as yet I have seen nothing of it in the HERALD.

Inclosed you will find $5, of which $2 is to pay for my paper, and $2 for a new subscriber, and $1 for the "Campaign Documents;" also, please send the Six Sermons and the tract on the Devil, Satan, Demons. I do not know as there have ever been any of these tracts within a hundred miles of here, and I should like to read them myself and have others read them.

I am an old, broken down man, 67 years old; and I have to get some one to write for me, or I would write more.

Yours, hoping for a resurrection out from among the dead.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We never saw the notice of your son's death, that you speak of. May God help you so to live by faith on His Son that you may always rejoice in hope of that day when His voice shall wake our sleeping children, who have fallen asleep in Jesus. Let there be "glory to God and the Lamb" going up from our hearts daily for all that rich grace bestowed on us in and through our LIFEGIVER, who will soon make good His blessed words of promise, "I will raise him up at the last day." Till then we wait, rejoicing in hope, "the blessed hope of the glorious appearing of the great God and our LIFEGIVER, Jesus Christ.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, May 7, 1869.

BR. STORRS: My heart rejoices to-day that God's truth of "No Life out of Christ," is running through the land, with lightning speed, penetrating the dark corners of superstition and tradition; and the word of God is judging men now; as Jesus said, "The words that I speak unto you, the same shall judge you in the last days." Men are now coming forth to the judgment; yes, to the pure truth of the resurrection of life, and many to the resurrection of condemnation; for, the final rejectors of God's truth are condemned already, and sealed to the day of execution. O, bless God, the leaven of truth is working. God is doing a quick work in the earth; we are living in a great and awful time; men are forming characters fast, I feel that it is a sealing time.

I was reading to-day the "Address of L. C. Collins," to the members of the M. E. Church. Speaking of the destruction of the wicked, and the doctrine of endless misery, he asks if it is not wise to endeavor to harmonize the few texts with the many? especially when the many teach a doctrine that honors God, and so commends itself to a man's conscience and reason, that he can look it steadily in the face? On page 24, he says, "How is it with doctrine of election and free grace? Are there no texts looking strongly toward Calvinism? Indeed there are. But you set yourselves to harmonize them with what you feel to be a milder system, one more consistent with reason, more honoring to God, and more consonant with the common language of the Bible. Now take the same steps in reference to the doctrine of endless misery, and you will find God, reason and the Bible all to sustain and help you. You have looked at this question always from one stand-point, till you see nothing else. You assume man's immortality as a thing inherent in his own nature, and then cry out, How can an immortal soul be destroyed, or perish, or die? But as often as you use this term, 'immortal soul,' and as God-like as it sounds in your ears, not an inspired penman has ever used the word in any of its forms, between the lids of the Bible. No not one!"

Br. Collins' defence is a noble defence of God's truth; but on one point he sees men as trees walking. I pray God to open his eye to his own argument. In speaking of the text, "The smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever," quoted by a Methodist Minister, in a letter to Br. Collins, he says, "The event here spoken of may be of a mere earthly character, referring to the judgments of God on the Papacy and its supporters. It is in a state where there is 'day and night.' And I did not suppose that you would allow any 'day' in your theological hell." Br. C. says "If I held a doctrine that depended for proof upon the highly-wrought dramatic language of this the most symbolic of all books, Revelation, and which no human ingenuity has as yet been able fully to unravel, I would feel it a relief to exchange it for one that finds its expression everywhere in the plain language of the Bible." Amen: so say I. May God give him a blessed relief from every error; and especially the error of two deaths as the penalty of the law.

I bless God that He has enabled so many able pens to fill up the HERALD OF LIFE with His living truth of "No Life out of Christ." And though I, like Br. Long, of Missouri, practise that unpopular custom of some, whose manner is to keep, in memorial, the creation of the world, by doing no work on the Sabbath of the Lord thy God, etc., yet I love the spirit of the writers of the HERALD, and feel that he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, for God is love. "O how true"—"God is love." O that that little tract "God is Love" was in every household in the world. If I was young, and could walk, I would carry thousands to the families that are dying for the lack of knowledge. O how it revived the love of God in my heart to read it. May God abundantly bless Br. S. Cooper, (yes, and all the brethren) for his article on Calamity or Penalty. O how it rejoiced my heart to read it; how plain, how plain. And I thank the Lord that He enabled Br. Storrs to write the article "The Temptations of Christ." No article that has been ever written on that subject, not even "The Theology of the Bible," has made it so plain to me that there is no personal intelligent being called the devil, as that article. O press on, Brethren; fight on the good fight of faith; and bless God that helpeth your hands to war, and your fingers to fight; and may the Lord make your tongue like the pen of a ready writer, and indite good matter.

O how can one stop their pen, or restrain the Spirit, when the "Excellent things that God has taught us out of His law, are struggling for vent? O how good it would be to stand in the great congregation, and like David, tell what the Lord has done for us, and what we see He is doing for the world.

I would say to all, especially the editors and the conductors of these winged messengers, that are flying through the land on errands of mercy, O, see that your freight is labelled with love, brotherly kindness; with long suffering, with gentleness, and with charity. O, when you write, let the spirit of Jesus, which is full of forgiveness, rule in your hearts. O, never, never, abuse the power that is vested in you, for it makes the righteous sad, whom the Lord has not made sad. I speak this from experience. I feel that it is hard to be misrepresented, and then to say, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do." I do not say this with reference to any of the readers or conductors of the HERALD. My prayer is, that I may in meekness suffer wrong rather than do wrong, and leave the event with God. I do desire that God would enable me, and all of His dear childred, to have the spirit of Jesus; that all the outgoings, outgushings, and outreachings of our heart might be like His, love to God and every creature. I feel that I am Christ's free child. I belong to no man-made orgrnization on the earth; but I trust that I belong to the suffering body of Christ; and I pray that I may be willing that what is behind of the sufferings of Christ, may be filled up in the body, which is the "Church of the living God, the pillar, and ground of the truth."

I am looking with much interest to Europe; especially to France and Italy. I am watching that harlot power that has been drinking of the cup of God's judgments till she is almost naked. I cannot tell what she may do in her death struggles, but eventually she must sink and be found no more at all; yes, and the beast that carrieth her must go into perdition. Then shall come that glorious Revelation, "Rejoice over her, thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets; for God hath avenged you on her." Again, "And after these things I heard a great voice of much people in heaven, saying, Alleluja; Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, unto the Lord our God; for true and righteous are his judgments; for he hath judged the great harlot, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand. And again they said, Alleluja, and her smoke rose up forever and ever." I cannot say all that I would, but long before the second coming of Christ was preached as nigh, I felt, and said, that I should with all the host of God's elect, say, "The Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Yes, "Alleluja, Amen." Let us all be ready, our lamps trimmed and burning; and we like unto men that look for their Lord. Grace, mercy, and truth be and abide with yon all. Amen.

FROM WM. R. WARNER.

NORTH CAMBRIDGE, MASS., May 17, 1869.

BR. STORRS: As the story of "Little Dene," published in the HERALD of April 21st, brought back to my mind thoughts of my early childhood, I will relate the facts.

My grandmother was then living with us at Uxbridge, in this state. I had all respect for her and loved her. She was a member of the Presbyterian church. By accident I burned my hand so that it gave me great pain. She seemed to realize my sufferings, called me to her, and told me that

"There was a dreadful fiery hell,
Where wicked ones must always dwell."

She said if I was wicked that I should certainly go there, and would be burned all over. It would be ten times as painful as my hand; yes, a hundred times; and it would last forever and ever. Then she tried to explain forever, and impressed it so firmly upon my mind that I was frightened at the thought; and, together with the pain of my burned hand, it made a deep and lasting impression upon me, so that it seems but yesterday. I certainly hated the tyrant that would bring me into the world and treat me so. This was my first lesson in theology; and not till I had prayed God to show me the truth, and began to search his word to find it, did I ever have any relief from that dread and fear of a revengeful and cruel God. Now, it is my opinion that many others are suffering from the same kind of teaching, which comes not from God or his word, but comes from "that old serpent called the devil and satan, which deceiveth the whole world," of whom Jesus says, "When he speaketh a lie he speaketh of his own; for he is a liar, and the father of it." 'And the serpent said unto the woman, ye shall not surely die." This same old lie is certainly the greatest cause for infidelity ever introduced into our world. God says by Ezekiel, "Ye have strengthened the hands of the wicked by promising him life." The doctrine of inherent immortality is denounced through the whole Bible, from Genises to Revelation, yet men will teach it still, and hate and separate from their company those who love and teach the truth. Be it so, we can claim the promise on this: Jesus said, "Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and separate you from their company. Rejoice ye, in that day, and leap for joy, for behold your reward is great in heaven."

Please add my name with Br. Hosford's, of New Britain, Conn., should you conclude to publish the article, "Little Dene," on a single leaf, for publication, for $5 toward its publication. Most truly yours.

NEGRO UTTERANCES.

EXPERIENCES among the Freedmen have brought to light many traits of character attractively simple, honest and odd. Their quaint way of "putting things" is not the least of their outworkings that interest, and in them will be found something more than amusement.

The following comes as the narration of Miss Anne S. Dudley, teacher among the freedmen at Charleston. One convert says:

"I have got safe by de go-back corner, and I will go all de journey home; and if you don't see me at de first of dem twelve gates, look to de next one, for I shall be dere!"

Another:

"When I left de rebel ranks and crossed over to de Lord's army, I tore up de bridge behind me. Now I'm fightin' with de captain dat's never lost a battle!"

Who will dispute the genuineness of the following conversion?

"I hasn't got quality 'ligion. I don't want de 'ligion of quality people! I've got de 'ligion of Jesus—I loves everybody!"

It is worth the roughness and toil of a teacher's experience to have poured out for one such a prayer as this:

O Lord, bless de teacher who comes so far to 'struct us in de way to heaven. Rock her in de cradle of love! Backen de word of power in her heart, dat she may have souls for her hire, and many stars in her crown in de great gittin-up mornin' when de' gineral roll is called. And when all the battles is over may she fall kivered with victory, be buried wid de honors of war, and rise to wear de long white robe in glory, and walk de shinin' streets in silver slippers, down by de golden sunrise, close to de great white throne; and dare may she strike glad hands wid all her dear scholars, and praise you, O Lord, forever and forever, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

"Always Rejoicing."

My life flows on in endless song;
I catch the sweet, though far-off hymn
That hails a new creation:
Through all the tumult and the strife
I hear that music ringing;
It finds an echo in my soul—
How can I keep from singing?

What though my joys and comforts die?
The Lord my Saviour liveth,
What though the darkness gather round?
Songs in the night He giveth;
No storm can shake my inmost calm
While to that refuge clinging—
Since Christ is Lord of heaven and earth
How can I keep from singing?

I lift my eyes; the cloud grows thin;
I see the blue above it;
And day by day this pathway smooths
Since first I learned to love it,
The peace of Christ makes fresh my heart,
A fountain ever springing;
All things are mine since I am His—
How can I keep from singing?

To the Little Folks.

FROM MARIA M. WEAVER.

Dear Young Friends: For a long time I have been wanting to whisper in your ears these words, "I love the little ones." As this is impossible perhaps our kind Editor will let me tell you through the columns of his paper.

What I have to say is for you: the full-grown readers may pass over this letter. And to begin with, let me tell you how interested I was in those articles written for you by Bro. Storrs. How pretty it looks to see such a man, full of years, full of experience, who has been "fighting the good fight of faith" many, many years, snuggling down in a corner among the little children, and talking so pleasantly, so simple and so lovingly. Do you know that I never discovered so much fatherly love in the writings of our aged Editor as I found in his little letters to you. He loves you. I hope all my little readers will pray for him that Jesus may abide with him and bring him to glory at last. Amen.

If possible, Br. Storrs permitting, it is my intention to write a few true stories for you by-and-by. Wish the little ones would send on their little letters. I like to read them. And then I have thought of asking you if you would send in some of your pennies to purchase tracts with. The "Campaign Documents" are cheap, and a few cents' worth of them may bless some soul. Would you not much rather spend some of your money to benefit perishing souls than to spend it all for candy, which will make you sickly? I mentioned this matter to my little Dwightie, and he says, "I will send my penny to Bro. Storrs;" and his "mamma" will send nine more. Now who follows? Send on your ones and twos, and all you feel disposed. Jesus will bless little children in denying themselves and sacrificing to him.

The Love of Truth.

Dear Children: I have just been reading a little story which has interested me very much, and I think will interest you also; so I will write it out for you. I hope you will always remember it, and feel, more than ever before, determined to speak the truth at all times and under all circumstances.

There are many people now-a-days who do not speak the truth, and it is very sad to think of it, and how many children are growing up with the same habit. There are some people who do not really intend to tell a lie, but they speak in such a way as to deceive others, and some will act a lie if they do not speak one. Such persons do not love the truth, I think, and in order to please the Lord we must love the truth in our hearts, and then we would rather suffer, than say that which is not true. But here is the story:

A few weeks ago, on board of an English steamer, a little ragged boy, aged nine years, was discovered on the fourth day of the outward voyage from Liverpool to New York, and carried before the first mate, whose duty it was to deal with such cases. When questioned as to the object of his being stowed away, and who had brought him on board, the boy, who had a beautiful, sunny face, and eyes that looked like the very mirrors of truth, replied that his step-father did it, because he could not afford to keep him, nor to pay his passage out to Halifax, where he had an aunt that was well off, and to whose house he was going. The mate did not believe the story, in spite of the winning face and truthful accents of the boy. He had seen too much of stow-aways to be easily deceived by them, he said; and it was his firm conviction that the boy had been brought on board and provided with food by the sailors. The little fellow was very roughly handled in consequence. Day by day he was questioned and re-questioned, but always with the same result. He did not know a sailor on board, and his father alone had secreted him and given him the food which he ate.

At last the mate, wearied by the boy's persistence in the same story, and perhaps a little anxious to inculcate the sailors, seized him one day by the collar, and dragging him to the fore, told him that unless he confessed the truth in ten minutes from that time, he would hang him on the yard-arm. He then made him sit down under it on the deck. All around him were the passengers and sailors of the mid-day watch, and in front of him stood the inexorable mate, with his chronometer in his hand, and the other officers of the ship by his side. It was the finest sight, says our informant, that he had ever beheld; to see the pale, proud, sorrowful face of that noble boy—his head erect, his beautiful eyes bright through the tears that suffused them. When eight minutes had fled, the mate told him he had but two minutes to live, and advised him to speak the truth and save his life; but he replied, with the utmost simplicity and sincerity, by asking the mate if he might pray. The mate said nothing, but nodded his head, and turned as pale as a ghost, and shook with trembling like a reed with the wind. And then, all eyes turned on him, this brave and noble little fellow, this poor waif whom society owned not, and whose own step-father could not care for him—there he knelt with clasped hands and eyes upraised to heaven, while he repeated audibly the Lord's Prayer, and prayed the dear Lord Jesus to take him to heaven. Our informant adds that there then occurred a scene as of Pentecost. Sobs broke forth from strong, hard hearts, as the mate sprang forward to the boy and clasped him to his bosom, and kissed him and blessed him, and told him how sincerely he now believed his story, and how glad he was that he had been brave enough to face death, and be willing to sacrifice his life for the truth of his own word.

Thoughts on Prophecy.

Several requests from brethren in the ministry induce me to put down some thoughts upon prophecy, rather in the hope of suggesting and educing some excursions from the beaten track and worn ruts of interpretation, than of securing acceptance for any system I have to offer. Indeed I almost believe any system of interpretation of unfulfilled prophecy, from the nature of the case, impossible, while our faith may rest firmly on certain great mountain summits of future facts rising above the waters.

1. The powers of the human mind are limited in the observation of facts, both in space and time. We cannot take in any existing panorama otherwise than by successive observations. We do not see the present: what we think we see at present is the part of the object from which light is reflected on us. The sun, for instance, we see eight minutes old, the fixed stars hundreds or thousands of years old. The celestial and terrestrial landscapes, mingled in our outlook at the present moment, are centuries apart in time, and we have no means of distinguishing past from present in our visions. No man can tell the actual or relative distances of distant stars. All calculations of that kind are mere guesses based upon assumptions of size and splendor, which may be true or erroneous. It is manifest, that while God gives us to see the lights of heaven in the present, he does not mean us to know much about their positions, or relative distance back from us. Now this question of distance has much to do with apparent position. You look along the street, and the distant lights seem to converge, to touch one another; but comparison with similar lights near, shows you that they are spread over a great distance.

May not our outlook in time resemble our outlook in space in its necessary imperfection? May not future events, crowded into a verse, occupy centuries in their evolution? May not stars of prophecy, phenomenally in one place, be really distributed centuries apart in the future? Has not the Lord assured us that "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power?" in which case a system of the prophetic future must be as erroneous as any map of the heavens. Is not this the radical error of all systems of interpretation of prophecy?

2. It is certain that the church in the past erred in its interpretation of the prophecies of Messiah's first coming. Not indeed in regard to the great fact, nor yet in a general way in its expectation of the time and place, but in the quite important feature of the design of his coming, and of the manner of his work. They expected, what indeed we in their places would have expected, no such interruption of his work, by an absence of centuries, as the fact has proved. I can find no prediction of the Old Testament capable of impressing them with the belief of a second coming, any more than we can find any passage of the New Testament teaching us to expect a third coming. Nor do I see any reason to believe that our expectations of the nature and extent of Christ's judgment at his second coming may not be as erroneous as the views his apostles indulged of the design of his first coming. This is an experience which we need to ponder, if we would read Scripture aright. Our views of the future coming and kingdom of Christ may not be more correct than those of the apostles, before the fulfilment of the predictions corrected them.

3. The failure of so many successive systems of chronological interpretation of prophecy is also instructive. The commentators, with wonderful unanimity, fixed on 1866 as the year of the overthrow of Antichrist, the beginning of the millennium, etc.; instead of which, we behold a new uprising of Ritualism and Rationalism in Europe, and such an increase in numbers and influence of Papists in America, and such a prevalence of atheism, drunkenness, profanity, and all uncleanness, in all our large cities, as fills all Christians with dismay. Instead of the universal peace, we behold twice as many armed men as in the greatest wars of France and Rome, awaiting the word of battle of such battles as Magenta, and the Wilderness, and Sadowa. Then the defeat and retreat of the church in France and Germany; and even in London and New York, before the increasing thousands of an avowedly ungodly population, does not bespeak millennial advance. The lukewarmness of the church, in such a state of affairs, is also quite inconsistent with millennial awakening. A single heathen temple in India receives annually more money than all the missionary societies in the world. All the churches in the United States, if six times sold, would not equal the sum this Christian nation pays for liquor. The progress of our railroad civilization is the progress of saloons, gambling houses, and Sabbath-breaking, and Christians are the owners of these institutions!

4. The ministers of my acquaintance who study the world exegetically, desiring to ascertain the correct text, and the true principles of interpretation, without regard to systems thus demonstrated erroneous, are agreed that we must adopt either the Rationalistic or the Realistic system of exegesis. The former would accept prophecy as subjective: an embodiment of the religious language of the church, and therefore in the main features inspired by a divine instinct, while expressed in the drapery of Hebrew ideas. Thus, we would not expect anything like a literal resurrection, either first or second; but only rising of humanity to a new life, through the power of religious civilization, etc.

The latter would accept the prophecy as a real prediction of objective realities, to be accomplished by the power of God, often without reference to the longings of the church, or even contrary to them; and in all cases far above her own ability to accomplish. Both the prediction and the facts predicted would thus belong to the supernatural operations of God in the world. No objection could therefore arise against the actual personal return of the Lord, the actual resurrection and reign of the saints, or of any other event predicted in prophecy, on the score of its incongruity with the laws of nature or with our notions of its propriety; since it is not to be accomplished by the laws of nature, and we are no judges of supernatural propriety.

Either of these courses gives a self-consistent exegesis; but it is impossible to unite them, to apply the Realistic mode to the past and the Rationalistic to the future, or to literalize one part of a prophecy, and spiritualize the other, after the fashion of Whitby, Scott, and the commentators of the past generation, with any consistency. It is purely arbitrary to interpret one part of Christ's prediction of the siege and fall of Jerusalem, and of the latter days typified by it, literally: as, for instance, the wall, the abomination of desolation, etc., and then to make the earthquakes, darkening of the sun, etc., symbolical of political revolutions: or, to make the first resurrection spiritual, and the second fleshly. We must adhere to some one principle.

5. The current of authority seems to set strongly in favor of the Realistic interpretation. Those inclined to Rationalistic views perceive that they must, to be consistent in their denial of the supernatural, deny prediction altogether: so that the interpretation of prophecy does not much concern them; save as one might feel some interest in expounding Paradise Lost, or any other poem. Those who believe they see in the aspects of the times the fullfiling of the predictions of the last great apostacy, on the other hand, feel that the dreamings of the chronological and spiritualizing interpreters have done the faith of God's elect an immense mischief, by weakening men's confidence in the predictions they pretended to expound, while in reality they filled them with their own fancies. Englishmen making the Pope, or Napoleon, the Antichrist, the missionary societies the millennium, etc. They are beginning to speak out with emphasis accordingly. Renouncing the heterogeneous incongruities of the pre-millennarian systems, they fix on certain great heads of prophecy, which, however, they are unable to convert into a system: such as the rapid advance of atheism, the continued existence of Popery down to the advent, the revival of the Fourth Empire, and the appearance of a personal Antichrist in the latter days, an apostacy in the visible church, a fanaticism of the ungodly, persecution of the people of Christ, and the slaying of the witnesses, the personal advent of the Lord with his risen saints, a fierce warfare against him and them by the hosts of Antichrist, his victory and reign over the earth. To such an exegesis the leading modern commentators give their sanction. The names of French, Ellicott, Tregelles, the Bishop of Oxford, the Bishop of London, Alford, Lange, and Tischendorf, are sufficient to indicate this class of scholars and divines. No modern commentator of any eminence, so far as I know, save Dr. Brown, adheres to the post-millennarian exegesis.

6. Such being the logical, providential and exegetical state of this great question, it assumes quite a practical aspect to ministers of the word; especially to the younger men, who, if the Realistic exegesis be correct, and the Bible contains actual predictions of coming facts, cannot expect to escape the great conflict. The fathers may perhaps fall asleep in the comfortable dream of an entrance into the kingdom of heaven without tribulation; but stern facts are upon us, and we must awake to them for our own sakes and for our people's sakes. It is time therefore to throw aside the lumber of traditional interpretations, and to betake ourselves to our Bibles and lexicons, and to our God, by prayer for his Holy Spirit to open our eyes, that we may learn the things coming on the earth, so far as needful for the salvation of our own souls, and the souls of our people. It is worse than folly to trouble our minds with comments falsified by patent and unanswerable facts. Nothing but bitter disappointment and infidelity can come of expectations of a Christless millennium to a Laodicean church. Let every minister of the word examine this question in such a way as to be able to answer for himself, and to give a reason of the hope that is in him, with meekness and fear. The question now forced on us is, "Believest thou the prophets?"

7. Should we find reason to accept the Realistic interpretation of the prophecies, and to own signs of the times, as denoting the imminence of the great crisis, it will manifestly give a different tone to our lives and ministry, than if we continued to hold the traditional, spiritualizing system. The Bible will become a real book of record for the future, as well as a real history. Indefinite visions of a judgment 365,000 years distant, must vanish before the sharp thunders of the great earthquake. The opinions of fathers and synods must be feeble authority to the man who expects ere he dies to behold the Lord standing on the earth. And the shortness of the time will inspire a diligence and earnestness in winning souls, incomprehensible to the man who believes that the Lord delayeth his coming; who never prayed, "Lord Jesus, come quickly."—Robert Patterson, D. D., in the Evangelical Repository.

Church Names.

Does an unscriptural name tend to divide God's flock? We answer, Yes, as well as an unscriptural position, in regard to any point, tends to distract, mystify and bewilder the mind. The church of God is one, and so are her interests. Says Jesus, "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee; that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." One reason why the church of God has lost her power over the world, is because it is so divided.

But I commenced to say a few words in reference to the name, as one cause for divisions and sectarian parties. To illustrate: Suppose we ask one who by his godly walk and holy conversation we believe to be a disciple of Jesus, Are you a Methodist, or a Baptist, or a Presbyterian, or an Adventist, or an Episcopalian, or any other man-made name? he might in all good conscience answer, No. But ask him, Are you a Christian? "I trust I am." Are you a disciple of Christ? "I am trying to live so as to be a true disciple of Jesus." Do you belong to the Church of God? "I trust I do, and that my name is in the book of life." And thus would be the answer of all true Christians the world over. Then why take any other than a Bible name to designate a child of God? "The Church of God" is the most prominent Bible name, and the most appropriate. Paul addresses his letter (1 Cor. i., 1, 2), "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth;" which you will see, by reading the connection, embraced not only all Christians at Corinth, but all everywhere. Again, 1 Cor. x., 32, we read, "Give none offence, neither to the Jews, nor to the Gentiles, nor to the Church of God." "Or despise ye the Church of God." 1 Cor. xi., 22. "Because I persecuted the Church of God."—1 Cor. xv., 9. "Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God, and Timothy our brother, unto the Church of God which is at Corinth."—2 Cor. i., 1. How that beyond measure I persecuted the Church of God."—Gal. i., 13. "But if I tarry long, that thou mayest know how thou oughtest to behave thyself in the house of God, which is the Church of the living God, the pillar and ground of the truth."—1 Tim. iii., 15. "How shall he take care of the Church of God?"—1 Tim. iii., 5. "Feed the Church of God."—Acts xx., 28.

We have now referred to nine passages of Scripture, where the body of believers is called the "Church of God;" and I ask, Where can any one get a more appropriate name for God's people? Though we search the universe through, it cannot be found. It is in God we live, move, and have our being. "For ye are the temple of the living God; as God hath said, I will dwell in them, and I will be their God, and they shall be my people; wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing; and I will receive you, and I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty." God the Father has undertaken through Jesus Christ His Son, in accordance with the blessed gospel, to gather out of the fallen sons and daughters of Adam a people to praise him through all eternity; and when the work is all done, Jesus, as the head of the church, will say, Here, Father, are those whom thou hast given me; and God will be all in all throughout eternity.

I will not lengthen these remarks at present, only say that, we profess to be a Bible people, and we feel to rejoice in view of what we have gained by contending earnestly for the word; but in taking the name of "Advent church," or any other, beside the true and most prominent Bible name, are we not so far departing from the "old paths," and taking the first step to cause divisions among that people for whom Jesus prayed, that they might be one? From your Br. in Christ, trying to grow in grace, and in the knowledge of Jesus.

The Mourning of the King's Children.

It has often been to my mind a source of deep regret that the witness which Christians bear in regard to their state before God is unsatisfactory. Step into our prayer meetings, how often the evidence given by those present as to their acceptance in Christ, and as to their faith in him, leaves the impression on the mind that there are clouds of uncertainty hanging over the whole Christian church, that there is nothing settled or determined in relation to present assurance of salvation, that those who profess to have passed from death unto life cannot possibly tell in which condition they are.

I can scarcely conceive of anything that has a more damaging effect upon the efficiency of the church than this failing. Its influence upon the minds of believers themselves must be to cool their zeal and to cripple their energies. To those who are seeking to flee from the wrath to come, and to those who have just entered upon the way of life, it must be very discouraging. Alas, it is but an uncertain sound that we pour into the eagerly listening ears of these earnest souls. In meditating on this theme, I am half disposed to cease wondering why the world is so indifferent to religion. The wonder is that knowing the harassing doubts, darkness and distrusts which beset the path of the modern Christian, any one is inclined to leave the ranks of the world, to plunge into this sea of difficulties, to drift about at the mercy of every wind of circumstance that blows.

Thomas aKempis, in his Imitation of Christ, says, "It would be but reasonable to expect that the fervor of our affections and our progress in holiness should have advanced higher and higher every day; but it is now thought to be a foundation of comfort, and even of boast, if a man at the close of this mortal life is able to retain some degree of his first ardor." Are not these remarks as applicable now as they were in the days when they were written?

But why, after a mature Christian experience of five, ten, or twenty years, should we listen to such language as this, spoken with faltering lips from a trembling heart, "I hope I am a Christian, I trust I am a child of God?" Is it in the nature of things that the passing years dim the eye of faith, and that the nearer we approach the Eternal City, the more desperate the prospect becomes of our ultimately reaching it?

Much of this language is doubtless owing to a sense of our utter unworthiness, to a feeling that, after we have done all, we are but unprofitable servants, and that therefore it is presumption to employ the language of confidence in speaking of our position before God. But by this conduct we dishonor him who has called us and who has appointed us "heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ." We acknowledge that it is a sin in the impenitent not to exercise faith in God. Why then do we try to excuse ourselves for the want of that very grace?

There is also a feeling of genuine doubt and distrust in many Christians, arising from a false conception of what is absolute growth in piety. We are apt to estimate our advance in spiritual life by seasons of special enjoyment in communing with God, by ecstatic visions of the love of Christ and the beauty of holiness. But we must remember that these green pastures and still waters are found only here and there as we journey toward the Celestial City, that it is rare to meet with a cloudless sky, that we cannot be ever lingering at the Interpreter's House, nor straining our vision from the top of the Delectable Mountains, to catch a glimpse of the New Jerusalem. It is true we may not have had many pleasant days in our travel thus far. But is our march still onward? Have we advanced from where we stood a year ago? Does sin grew more hateful to us? Do we yet maintain an uncompromising warfare with our evil hearts? Is the sin that once so easily beset us gradually being trampled under our feet? Does our yearning to be forever delivered from it ascend to God with an increasingly bitter cry? Is the desire to be more Christ-like growing upon us? If so, it is well with us. We have sometimes groped our way in the midst of dark experiences, the Sun of Righteousness has failed to shine, the whisperings of the enemy have impugned the faithfulness of God. But have we ever failed to find that God was with us all the time we were passing through these dark scenes? We toil up the Hill Difficulty, we go down into the Valley of the Shadow of Death, we pass through Vanity Fair, but every step takes us nearer to our heavenly home. Then

Knowing the Shepherd's Voice.

The Eastern flocks still exhibit the beautiful traits from which our Lord drew one of his most touching illustrations of true discipleship. Mr. Hartley, a missionary in Greece, gives a curious illustration of the truthfulness of one of the touching images of our Saviour; "My attention was called," said he, "to the words, 'The sheep hear his voice, and he calleth his own sheep by their names.' I asked my guide if it was a custom in Greece to give names to sheep. He replied affirmatively, and assured me that the sheep would come when the shepherd pronounced their name. The next day I verified the truth of this statement. Passing near a flock, I asked the same question of the shepherd. He replied, 'Yes.' I asked him to call one of his sheep by name. He did so, and at the moment he pronounced the name, a sheep left his pasture and companions, and came skipping along to the hand of his master, with marks of obedience and gladness which I have never seen in other animals. It is also true, here, that the sheep will not follow a stranger, for they know not the voice of strangers. The shepherd told me that some of his flock were yet savages, and knew not their names, but that, in the end, they would all learn them. Those which had learned their names, he called sociable, or tame."—World's Crisis.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity," as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE GOSPEL OF OUR SALVATION.

SALVATION! What holy, sublime and glorious thoughts are generated by a consideration of this word, filling the heart with emotions of a heavenly nature, which draw us nearer to him who has "entered within the veil" and become the author of eternal salvation!

Salvation is one of the gratifying terms of the gospel; hence it is said to be the gospel of our salvation. Paul, in speaking of the great plan and purposes of God, which "he purposed in Christ," says: "In whom ye also trusted after ye heard the words of truth; the gospel of your salvation; in whom also, after ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possessions." Many things are included by Paul in "the words of truth," which they heard through the preaching of the apostles, not the least of which was the great fact that this earth, now groaning under the effects of the curse, was also to be a subject of redemption—to be made, according to the grand plan of God, the future eternal and glorious abode of the saints of the Most High.

"Gospel" signifies "glad tidings or good news" of things to come—gracious bestowments, or events to transpire that are yet veiled by the impenetrable clouds of the future; and only by faith in the good news from our Heavenly Father can we draw sweet consolation from the contemplation of the future. We live in a gospel age. It is ours to hear the good news—the gospel message—wafted over the land; it is ours to place implicit faith in the glad tidings and make all due preparations for the glorious destiny awaiting those who shall overcome. None will wear the royal robes of glory, or be crowned with the ruby wealth of immortality to swell the grand song of deliverance, who now reject a life of a despised follower of Jesus. None can expect to reign with the rightful heir to David's throne, who will not now prove a loyal subject. Oh, the rich provisions of redeeming grace made available to mortal man. Salvation—eternal salvation—is graciously held forth to dying mankind, and the ceaseless voice of Divinity pleads with them to accept Jesus that they may live forever.

There is but one gospel; but it is the good news of many things to come, not one of which is realized during the gospel age, as we understand the plan of redemption. We believe no one can fail to see that as soon as a thing or an event ceases to be future, that the gospel, or good news pertaining thereto cannot exist. As an illustration—there can be no "gospel of the kingdom" if there is no kingdom in the future; for when we come in possession of the kingdom the gospel relating thereto must come to an end.

But how differently from this, however, we have been taught! The good news of the thing has been confounded with the thing itself by the doctrine that the kingdom of God is already set up, and comes into the heart at conversion, instead of the subjects going into the kingdom at the Second Coming of Christ, as the Scriptures declare. The church has also been robbed of her glorious hope by spiritualizing away those grand events of the future, by making them applicable to the church in her present imperfect, mortal state—those things which the gospel holds forth as events to be accomplished in the future, when it will cease to be a hope; for we cannot hope for a thing that is already in our possession. Has not, therefore, "another gospel" been substituted, and falsely named the gospel of Christ? If so, how will they escape the fearful anathema of Paul addressed to a similar class in his day? "I marvel," says he, "that ye are so soon removed from Him that hath called you into the grace of Christ, unto another gospel, which is not another." (It is really no gospel at all, but a worthless substitute.) "But there are some that trouble you and would pervert the gospel of Christ. But though we or an angel from heaven preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Gal. i., 6–8.

Again, look at the Scriptural doctrine of divine redemption as contrasted with the popular belief. Modern theology, by its system of spiritual interpretation, has completely obscured the glory of this subject, as it is presented in pages of inspiration. This sublime doctrine is explained to be experimental, and to consist in merely a change of feelings—and when their feelings pass a certain indescribable point, they are said to have "full salvation." For one, we believe the full import of this expression, but when obtained, and the nature of it, we prefer the words of truth to the many theories of men. But if this is salvation, pray tell us from what they are saved? Are they saved from a sickly dying nature, or the fear of death? Alas, no! Though they may ever so firmly believe that "death is the gate to endless joy," yet when the dread monster approaches they immediately fly for the best medical aid within their reach. Are they saved from temptation of any kind? Are they not still groaning under the curse of sin, and liable to fall at every step by disease and the common casualties of life? Is not a Christian's life a constant warfare to obtain the victory over the world? But when we are saved—fully saved—we shall have the victory over all these. When we obtain "full salvation" we shall be saved by the power of an endless life, and "mortality shall be swallowed up of life."

We wish none to infer that we are not a believer in experimental religion. We believe that when we fully submit to the law of God, by offering ourselves "a living sacrifice," and our offering is accepted, we shall receive the "witness of the Spirit" into our hearts, which will produce a change of feelings; but that is not redemption in the Bible sense. We are only "sealed until the day of redemption." The "witness of the Spirit" is the earnest of our inheritance. When we receive this evidence of our acceptance by God, we are placed upon probationary ground; and if by "patient continuance in well doing," we finally "overcome all things," we shall be saved even from the power of death, when the Lord comes to gather his elect.

Salvation implies a deliverance from a condition from which we are unable to deliver ourselves; and such will be the deliverance of God's people effected at the resurrection. Millions of saints have gone down into the land of darkness, and are held in peaceful sleep, by the ruthless hand of death, awaiting the awakening notes of the resurrection trumpet. They are in a condition from which they are unable to deliver themselves. But He, who numbers the hairs of our head, has appointed a "day of redemption," when the iron chains that hold them shall be snapped asunder, and His sleeping myriads shall arise in immortal glory to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb. Then will hope be fully realized; for now they are only "saved by hope," and this a hope of deliverance from the grave. "We are saved by hope," says Paul, "but hope that is seen (or realized) is not hope; for what a man hath, why doth he hope for it? But we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." (Rom. vii., 24, 25.) "For by grace are ye saved through faith; and not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." (Eph. ii., 8.) But as "faith is the confidence of things hoped for," three great truths are made manifest. (1) That salvation is a manifestation of the grace or favor of God. (2) That it is "through faith" that any receive this favor, or grace. And (3) that salvation is "the gift of God." None can save themselves; but by faith in Christ, and obedience to his requirements we can lay "hold of the hope set before us" in the gospel; that when the coronation day shall come, the Lord of life and glory shall "deliver them, who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." (Heb. ii., 15.)

In a condition of "patient waiting" we can but sigh and pray for the triumphant appearing of the "Author of our salvation," and our hearts are glad to know that the morning of redemption soon will dawn.

"Soon our friends we shall meet, and our lovely ones greet,
Who so long have been slumbering in dust;
'Twill be joyful and sweet, when salvation's complete,
To unite with the glad ransomed throng.

BIBLICAL ARCHAEOLOGY.

OF DWELLINGS.

As men in the primitive condition of society were unacquainted with the arts, they were not of course in a condition to erect houses; they lived, consequently, under the open sky. In unpleasant weather, whether hot or rainy, they sought for a shelter under shady trees, in the clefts of rocks and such caves as they happened to discover. Nor are we to suppose, that shelters of this kind were altogether inadequate. The inhabitants of Mount Taurus, even to this day, in a climate much more severe than that of Palestine, live in caves, as also do the wandering shepherds of Arabia Petrea, either in caves and the clefts of rocks, or beneath the shade of trees.

Caves are not only numerous in the East, but many of them are both large and dry. They formed convenient dwellings, being warm in the winter and cool in the summer. Hence, in a comparatively recent age, when dwellings of a different kind were resorted to, the caves were still preferred by many, especially by those who had emigrated to distant regions. The dwellers in caves whom we find mentioned, at quite a late period, were robbers, who had abandoned the restraints of society, and were the last occupants of these abodes. The inhabitants of caves and mountains commonly occur in the Old Testament under the designation of HORITES; in regard to whom we are informed more particularly,

I. Of the inhabitants of mount Seir; they chiefly occupied the mountains of Seir, but were found dwelling as far as Paran in Arabia Petrea, Gen. xiv., 6, xxi., 21, Deut. ii., 12, 22, Num. x., 12, Gen. xxxvi., 20–30.

II. Of the Rephaims, who in addition to their caverns, had some fortified cities, and were divided into three tribes, as follows: (1) The Emims, who dwelt in the region, which the Moabites afterward occupied, Deut. ii., 11, 12. (2) The Zanzummins, men of large stature, living in the region, which was afterwards possessed by the Ammonites. (3) The Rephaims, or giants strictly so called, who lived in the country of Bashan, were also of large stature, and were driven out by the Hebrews, Deut. ii., 10–23, iii., 3–16.

III. Of the Troglodytes, or, as the Hebrews denominated them, the Sons of the Caves, called in the English version, Anakims, Deut. i., 28, ii., 10, ix., 1, 2) the three tribes, into which they were divided were, (1.) the Nethilim, Num. xiii., 33. (2) The clans of Aciman, Sheshai, and Talmai, Num. xiii., 22, 23; Josh., xiv., 15. (3) The Anakims, inhabiting Debir, Anab, and the mountains of Judah, Josh. xi., 21, 22. (4) The Anakims around Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod, 1 Sam'l. xvii., 4.

Note.—The caves, of which we have spoken, when they had become less frequently, selected for the abodes of the living, were employed as sepulchres for the dead, Gen. xxiii. In times of persecution and war also, those which were not converted into cemeteries, nor occupied, as they sometimes were, by hordes of robbers, became a refuge to the oppressed and the vanquished, Josh. x., 16, Judg. xv., 8, xx., 45. 1 Saml. xiii., 6, xxii., 1, et seq. In these caves, the necromancers sometimes practised their inauspicious arts, and the beasts of the forest found a dwelling place.

TABERNACLES.

As caves could not always be readily found, and as it was sometimes great labor to excavate one, men were compelled by the exigencies of their situation, to form some other sort of residence. The shady trees and tall shrubs, whose tops approached each other and were twisted together, suggested the plan of cutting down large branches, fixing them into the ground in parallel lines, binding them together at the top, and covering them with leaves, herbs, reeds, branches, and even broad flat stones, in order to shield themselves from the cold, the heat, and the dew. Thus they built tabernacles, huts, or lodges. The Romans called them Mappalia. They were small and low in the beginning, so that a person could not stand erect, but was obliged either to lie down or to sit; but afterward were built higher.

The use of these tabernacles did not cease, even after the erection of more stable and convenient dwellings. They were frequently made, sometimes from necessity, sometimes for convenience, and sometimes for pleasure, and are to this day erected in the summer among the wandering tribes or Nomads of Mesopotamia.

ON TENTS.

As tabernacles, which could not readily be moved from place to place, and from a want of materials could not everywhere be built, were made partly of skins, the design arose of erecting a shelter wholly of skins extended round a long pole, and so light as to be easily moved from one place to another. It was tents of this kind, we may suppose, which Jabal invented, Gen. iv., 20. In the progress of years they were no longer covered with skins, but with various kinds of cloth, particularly linen. The Nomads of the East still use them. They pitch them in any place which appears suitable, but they give the preference to a spot near some shady tree. Gen. xviii., 4; Judg. iv., 5.

The first tents which were made, were undoubtedly round in their construction, and small in size; afterward they were made larger and oblong. The Nomads of Arabia Petrea have two kinds, the one larger, the other smaller, Gen. xxxiii., 17. They call the former kind, in distinction from the smaller ones, baiton or houses. The smaller tents are sustained by three poles only, and covered with a fabric, woven of wool and camel's hair; the large ones are sustained sometimes by seven, and sometimes by nine poles. The three longest of these poles, whether seven or nine in number, are erected in the middle, and on each side of the middle row are placed two or three others parallel, though much shorter than those between them; they are covered with a black cloth made of goats' hair. The pole in the middle is taller than any of the rest, though it rarely exceeds eight or ten feet.

The Arabians take a pleasure in pitching their tents on hills, in such a way as to form a sort of circular encampment. When thus pitched, being of a dark hue, they exhibit a beautiful appearance to the distantly approaching travellers, Cant. i., 5. The flocks and cattle during the night are driven into the space in the centre of the encampment, and guarded by dogs. Job xxx., 1. Some one of the shepherds keeps watch also during the night, a duty which is performed alternately. Isa. lvi., 9–11.

The larger kind of tents are divided by curtains into three parts, as was done also in the holy tabernacle. In the external division or apartment the servants lodge, and during the night the young animals also, to prevent their sucking the dam. In the second apartment are the males, but if the tent be smaller than usual, all the males of the tent, together with the animals just mentioned, are lodged together. The third, or interior apartment, is allotted to the women, Num. xxv., 8.

The bottom of the tent is either covered with mats or with carpets, according to the wealth of the possessor, and upon these they are in the habit of sitting. . . . The utensils of the Nomads are few; they have vessels of shell and brass, viz., pots, kettles, and cups of brass covered elegantly with tin; also leathern bags. Their hearth is on the ground. It consists of three stones, placed so as to form a triangle. In the middle of them is a small excavation of the earth, where the fire is kindled; the vessels are placed over it upon the stones. The table, if so it may be called, from which they eat, is nothing more than a round skin spread upon the bottom of the tent.

THE PRINCIPAL THING.

BY PRESIDENT E. O. HAVEN.

WHAT should every Christian aim at, male or female, clergyman or layman, renowned or obscure? Can any man "taught of the Lord" hesitate in his reply? And yet how many various shapes the same answer may assume. "To glorify God," says one. "To bless man," says another. "To make his own life exactly perfect," says another. "To forget himself and do his duty," says another. "To believe constantly on the Lord Jesus Christ," says another. "To waste no time in indolence; to utilize every passion and every faculty; to secure the greatest possible amount of physical strength, and health, and mental power, and the best opportunity within his reach, and then employ them so as to bring about the largest possible result," says another.

Granted; but why? Because only thus man can reach the highest development, and it is the nature of everything to seek its own maximum.

Suppose we grant this; still how can it be shown that man needs to do voluntarily what every vegetable and animal does involuntarily? And is not man exhibiting before high heaven the maximum of his capabilities when his passions and powers run riot into every possible extreme? Such is the subtle insinuation of the Devil, sooner or later, to all minds capable of relishing the poisonous sweet of this sophistry. But God recommends to us constraint. He suggests it to us by analogy. He imposes it in the form of inflexible law upon Nature. He says to the ocean, and to everything else, "Thus far only." He subjects man, as an animal under the same struggle for existence. He even begins moral discipline by revealing to man's conscience an iron law; and usually the dawn of his higher life, revealed to his own consciousness, is an apprehension of the fact that he has unwittingly done wrong, and finds himself in the position of a culprit justly charged with crime. Then, if he is a heathen, he frets, and perhaps sacrifices to his gods, or gropes about in sadness like a sick man who neither knows of a remedy nor, indeed, that he is sick. Then, if a moralist, he strives to cure himself by endeavoring to repair a broken life. Then, if obedient to Christian instruction, he accepts Christ as his Saviour; and, leaving God to adjust for himself all the demands of his moral government, "works out his own salvation," at the same time perceiving that God works in him according to his own good pleasure. Who dares say that the Almighty is not wiser than the wisest man, and better than the best man; and, consequently, bestows his approval or disapproval upon all men, not according to their outward circumstances, or to their inherited drapery, but according to their character?

Should we then be indifferent to the truth? The man who honestly asks that question betrays so narrow a vision, and so low a grade of moral development, in this Christian land, as really to excite our sympathy more than the most degraded heathen in the dark places of earth and the habitations of cruelty. It is idle to argue with such a man. Logic cannot save him. Goodness is not obtained on the principle of profit and loss. It is a passion; it is a sentiment; it is a life; it is from above; it is a likeness to God. The righteous man works for God and humanity, as the flower blossoms, because he likes to.

That man is most like Christ who seeks the principal thing with the most ardor and constancy. Christ did not seek notoriety—he shunned it; nor wealth; nor the favor of a party; but simply to show to man his nature, his opportunity, and the way of life. That church receives the most favor from Christ that seeks most the principal thing. If a denomination is seeking wealth, and popularity, and renown, and splendid church-edifices, and rich and great members, Christ knows it, and that denomination gets just the proper reward. It matters not what the idol be—rank or ritual, money or numbers; God and mammon never harmoniously accept the same worship. There is a division made in the prayers, and singing, and preaching in many a church; a part goes up, and a part goes down. That denomination which deifies reason or free thought, and cares less for the truth and its great Master than for its reputation, receives the reputation and the weakness for which it bargains.

There is only one way to reach the highest and best result. Seek the principal thing. Bless man; honor God. If you see Christ, the Son of God, the Revealer of spiritual truth to man, the world's Saviour—in whom and through whom only God reveals himself to man—then "honor the Son even as you honor the Father." "No man can say that Jesus is the Lord, but by the Holy Ghost." So thought Paul, and all agree that he was a wonderful Christian in theory and in life. It does not come natural to a man to accept Jesus as Lord. It is a sure evidence of the life from above, that comes not from the flesh, but from the Spirit.

A man who seeks the principal thing cannot make a fatal mistake. His purposes will beautify his life. He has a panoply stronger than the most perfect human prudence. Bigots will hate him on the one side, and licentious sinners on the other; but his influence, little or great, will promote the kingdom of Christ.

The prime doctrine of Christianity is that none are saved except through Christ. It must, therefore, be the highest development of the intellect to perceive this truth, and to see how it infolds and beautifies all good works, and all proper experience, even far out beyond where the fact is appreciated. The time has not come yet, but it will come, when every knee shall bow to Christ, in heaven, on earth, and in all the realms of God's universe.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.—The Independent.

CHRIST GLORIFIED.

The following extracts are from a sermon by "Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D. D.," preached in the St. George's Protestant Episcopal Church, New York, Sunday morning, March 28, 1869. Reported for "The Methodist."

THE TEXT.—"And I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain."—Rev. v., 6.

Dr. Tyng said:

And this is Christ in his glory as we have followed him from the birth in Bethlehem to his triumph over death upon Golgotha. My dear brethren, the illustration of the lamb as the type of the atoning Saviour, you are all perfectly well aware, fills up the whole thread of divine Scripture. Believing in him as promised, Abel brought a lamb of his flock and offered it an accepted sacrifice for his sinfulness before God, perfectly confident in the promises which had directed his mind to this great Saviour. Abraham bound his own son a willing sacrifice to God himself, and thus testified his entire confidence in the glorious appearing of his divine Redeemer. Discerning this glorious appearance, the prophet Isaiah declares he beheld him as a lamb led forth to the slaughter, and as a sheep dumb before her shearers, opening not his mouth. Welcoming him in the very morning of his appearing in a tabernacle of flesh, John the Baptist said aloud, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world." Standing beside his cross and recognizing him as the true Paschal Lamb, the institution of which we have read this day, St. John says, "There was not a bone of him broken, that the Scripture might be fulfilled." And now, with an inveiled glory in the heavenly world, that Lamb which Abel saw and fully believed and accepted, and that Lamb which John the Baptist proclaimed as he appeared in humiliation upon the earth, is seen once more, no longer humbled in the flesh, but exalted above all principalities and powers—angels, principalities and powers being made subject unto him. "I beheld," says the Evangelist, "and lo, a Lamb that was slain stood in the midst of the throne."

The lamb is a symbol of expiation and atonement. It is set out before us in the sacred Scriptures as the title of the divine Saviour, in that one divine and atoning Redeemer. The histories of his Evangelists are the histories of a Lamb of the deepest humiliation, enduring the cross, bearing the penalty and the burden of human sin. The history and the revelation of a world of glory for redeemed man is that of an atoning lamb in the highest conceivable exaltation. The heavenly beings sing around him the song of thanksgiving: "Thou art worthy, for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation. Thou art worthy to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing." Now, this is our Easter blessing; and as I have gone with you to view the Christ of Bethlehem, the Christ of Nazareth, the Christ of Capernaum, the Christ of Bethany, the Christ of Gethsemane, the Christ of Golgotha, I ask you to come with me and view the Christ of glory. "I beheld, and lo, in the midst of the throne, and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain."

The throne, in the language of man, is the symbol and source of government over men; and the Lamb standing in the midst of the throne as he has been slain, is simply revealed to us as the one that exercises this office of government that proceedeth from the throne, and of which the throne is the symbol and the token. He upholdeth all things by the word of his power; he rules over all mankind, because for all mankind he has died. All things are placed in subjection beneath his feet, and for the suffering of death he hath been crowned with glory and honor. I would have you never forget this great truth thus illustrated, to which I delight to lead your minds at all times—the whole government of redeemed man is in the hands of man's Redeemer. This world in which we dwell is not simply under the authority of its divine Creator; it has passed into another dispensation, and the world of man is under the control of him who hath bought it with his blood, and over-paid its price in his own sufferings. The throne of exaltation is occupied by him who has thus acquired by right of conquest the supreme command. He drank of the torrent that crossed his path as he travelled onward to his glory, and he hath therefore lifted up his head as one infinitely supreme and everlastingly glorified. Because he hath offered himself once for all a sacrifice for sins forever, he is henceforth seated upon his throne expecting till his foes be made his footstool.

The blessings of divine government are dispensed through his one offering, and, brethren, all your blessings come to you sprinkled with the blood of Jesus Christ. Forgiveness of sin, acceptance unto eternal life, the joys and the blessings which dignify and adorn every position of man upon the earth, come to us through that Lamb who was slain. All things are his that hath found his part and portion with Christ, for Christ is head over all things to them that love him. The condemnation of man and the loss of the privileges which the Saviour brings to us come from the one fact of rejecting him. . . . The guilt is upon them for treading under their feet the blood of the Lamb, and the condemnation and the ruin come because they have refused directly the gift of free salvation that would have cleansed them from all sin.

I would have you notice the throne is the sign of manifestation of royal presence in the language of man. God dwelleth in light inaccessible; the one revelation of his nature is love; his power that man hath seen is that which has been made in the person of the only begotten Son. The manifestation of the Father is declared to be in the face of Jesus Christ, shining forth from glory to glory, to those who believe in him. The only access to God is through this blood of the Lamb. "No man cometh unto the Father," the Saviour says, "but by me." God hath set forth the name of Jesus as the only name in which salvation from the condemnation of sin is to be attained. This is the new and living way through which every believing man finds access to pardon, rest, and acceptance with God forever and ever. We are to bring our sins and lay them down upon this divine Saviour; we are to bring our burdens and rest them upon this everlasting Rock; we are to bring our weary souls, without one doubt or fear, and embrace the precious promises which are revealed to us so fully in him. The Lamb in the midst of the throne, in the highest conceivable exaltation, calls as a risen Saviour to us all. We have nothing to do in ourselves to get advantage of that glorious work but to receive it; nothing this moment interferes between a single soul to whom I speak and absolute acceptance in the divine Saviour, but that man's perverse unwillingness to accept the offering thus freely made. The divine triumph and work lie plainly and simply before you, and the message from the Saviour's tomb of triumph and glory is a message of unlimited deliverance to the race of man for whom he died.

And why is not every heart in this assembly attuned to that heavenly song, a song of grateful remembrance of the blessings that demand it: "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive honor and glory and blessing?" The invitation is from him. Come, just as you are, in the very place you sit, in the very crisis of your present needs; rise, if you will, and tell him, in the face of a surrounding world, "I go to my Father," and say, "I am not worthy to be called thy son." The manifestation of the Father's love will never be found but in the fulness of revelation in the Son. . . . . . . My message to you, beloved, is, Come, gather around that Lamb who was slain; bring the homage of your grateful hearts and thanksgivings there; rejoice that he whom you have loved is in the midst of the throne, and anticipate that day when the people of the whole earth shall acknowledge that Christ is Lord and King to the glory of God the Father.

Not merely the token of government, the way of access, the centre of homage and praise, but the throne, in human application, is the foundation of human confidence and strength. While the throne stands among men, in undiminished and undimmed power, a nation is at peace; and, although the throne in our land is but a mere figurative expression for law that commands, as emanating from and dwelling in the very bosom of God, yet with us the security of the nation consists in the stability of the throne.

The exalted throne of the Lamb of God is the universal confidence of the people of God. An unchanging union here marks the character and makes the strength of the whole multitude of God's redeemed, wherever scattered, upon the earth. However otherwise separated, however far from clear perception may be their discrimination of the glorious truths which are there revealed, one foundation still remains, and upon that they rest. Sometimes in the feeblest conviction of its power, sometimes in the most hesitating and trembling manner, desiring to be partakers of this strength, and yet not for all that earth can give would the feeblest believer in Jesus this day sacrifice that hope that he hath in him as the abiding and everlasting friend of his soul, however feebly and however indefinitely he is compelled to hold it. In Him the Spirit teaches every human heart to rest; and as the truly humbled seek in him their hope, the Spirit leads them and gives them light.

Ah! while weary ones hardly yet perceive the glory which shines in Jesus, and while darkened and troubled ones hardly yet discern the excellence of the provision made for their salvation, to the believer in him they are perfectly clear. It is a glorious and significant fact that in two hundred different dialects of mankind this day the name of Jesus has been sung and celebrated; in two hundred various tribes and nations upon the earth this day, a song to the praise of this divine Saviour, has been uttered with thanksgiving by uncounted millions upon the face of the earth. . . . .

My dear brethren, let us unite, on this Easter morning, to exalt the only source of government for man, the only living way of access to the sinner back to peace, the only centre of universal righteous homage and praise for redeemed souls, the only oblation, strength, hope, and confidence for man destroyed in the condemnation of his sin. Ah, how much we need him! How secure we are in his protection! How happy is the heart that retains him! How blessed the man that can return from the house of God this day and say, "My heart and my portion are truly with Jesus Christ!" Oh, let it not be your ruin that you have rejected him!

I say to this immense throng that the providence of God has gathered here before me, look up, look up to that great exalted Saviour, and feel the responsibility of having this day heard the fulness and the power of his grace to save. Let this Easter morning be the day in which you will cast away your unbelief, and commit yourself with filial, affectionate, and entire trust to him who is able to save to the uttermost, because he hath made a sacrifice for sin in one offering, and is exalted upon the throne of glory and government in an everlasting covenant for man. May his blessing go with this simple, practical lesson of his word, through the riches of his grace, to every heart.

The Age to Come.

If we were allowed to suggest, we would say, this subject has had a pretty good hearing in the Herald of Life. Now would it not be as well to let it rest, and give us more of that practical "faith which works by love, purifying the heart?" It seems to us that the church has erred in seeking to understand prophecy. They have wanted to know too much; too see too far into the future. Peter tells us that it is as a light, shining in a dark place. Take your lantern and go out into the street on a dark night; how far ahead will it shine? Just far enough for present safety and effort. Thus is prophecy. How long is it to be so, Peter? "Until the day dawn." 2 Pet. i., 19. It is not in being wise above what is written; but in walking in the light as He (Christ) is in the light.

Bible knowledge, like all other, is of little use, comparatively, only as it is of a practical kind. God's truth is to feed upon, nourish, strengthen, and induce correct action. Let love—the love of God—be the great, the chief thing of our strife. Like honey, with the hive of bees, this only will bring harmony; bring success; make us rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate, apt to teach, and easy to be taught; followers of God as dear children; which may God grant. Amen. A. Boynton.

Anecdote of Lyman Beecher.

The Rev. Doctor, some years ago, was going home one night, with a volume of an encyclopædia under his arm, when he saw a small animal in his path. The doctor knew it was a skunk, but hurled the book at him. As might have been expected, the worthy divine was glad to retreat.

When he arrived at home, his friends could scarcely come near him. His clothes were so infected that he was obliged to bury them.

Some time after this some one published a pamphlet speaking very abusively of the worthy doctor, who was asked,

"Why don't you publish a book, and put him down at once?"

His reply was prompt and wise. "Sir, I have learned better. Some years ago I issued a whole quarto volume against a skunk, and I got the worst of it. I never mean to try the experiment again."

"Geo. Storrs Caught" at Last:

OR, "ZION'S HERALD" AFTER GAME.

Solomon saith, "Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird." Prov. i. 17. "Zion's Herald" spread a net, two weeks ago, and covered it with "N. H. Christian Advocate." Its bait was "Soul Existence." The "H." was the chaff, which the compositor or proof-reader put on without the knowledge or consent of the worthy editor, "Rev. Gilbert Haven." Underneath the whole lay entirely concealed from view "Rev. E. O. Haven, D. D., President of Michigan University." To tread on such a trap, or wander into such a net, who could expect to escape being "caught?" so we give it up, and own we were "caught;" for last week we poured five columns of matter on our highly-esteemed hidden friend of Michigan University. "Surely the net" was not "spread in" our "sight." Our paper of last week had just left our office, and we had actually mailed a copy of it to "Rev. E. O. Haven, Ann Arbor, Mich.," when "Zion's Herald," of the 20th inst., came to hand with the following announcement:

The article on "Soul Existence" in our last number should have been credited to the N. W. Christian Advocate and the Rev. E. O. Haven. It is a good answer from his pen to late charges that have unjustly been made in the journals, of Annihilation.

Thus were we "caught." Our consolation is, the "Rev. E. O. Haven" is a generous "soul," having a tangible "existence." Whether he or ourself will receive most benefit from the sudden and unexpected conjunction, time must determine. We yield the palm to him, without dispute, so far as science and general literature is concerned; but so far as "soul existence" is involved, we shall not yield to him, or to any other human being, till convinced by better argument than we have ever seen, as yet.

"Is a good answer from his pen to late charges that have unjustly been made in the journals, of Annihilation."

We suppose this remark refers to "charges made" by "journals" of the Methodist E. Church. We may be mistaken in this conjecture. Be that as it may, it seems to us that a theological teacher should express himself not in language liable to be mstaken as to the position he occupies at the time the utterance is made; he may afterward change or modify his thoughts, which he has a right to do, if convinced he was in error.

Our respected friend, "Rev. E. O. Haven," believes in "progression;" and though he does not now believe in "annihilation" of any "soul existences," he may, possibly, in the course of his progression, find himself moved forward to that position. On the outside of this paper will be found an article from his pen—which was in type when the announcement by "Zion's Herald," above inserted, came to hand—which we copied from "The Independent." That article is headed, "The Principal Thing." We thought it worthy of a place in our columns. We did not intend to make any remarks on it, and should not, had it not been for the note in "Zion's Herald" announcing "Rev. E. O. Haven" as the author of the article, "Soul Existence," etc. There are some things in the article from "The Independent" which seemnot quite "orthodox." The concluding sentence reads thus:

"The time has not come yet, but it will come, when every knee shall bow to Christ, in heaven, on earth, and in all the realms of God's universe."

We do not pretend to know exactly how Dr. Haven would have this sentence understood: he may have a different idea from what the language seems to imply. Our mind was led from it to Rev. v., 13, but we do not know that text was in his mind when he penned the sentence. If it was, as the words, "in all the realms of God's universe," seem unmistakably to indicate, what inference can be drawn from his words but that of the "annihilation" of all the wicked, not excepting the theological "devil," or else, the restoration of them all, including the theological "devil?" The words of Rev. v., 13, are, "Every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and power, be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever." That looks like embracing "all the realms of God's universe;" and Dr. Haven says, "the time will come when every knee shall bow to Christ in all" those "realms." As the Revelator says, they were all praising God and the Lamb, we confess we do not see why Dr. Haven is not a believer in the "annihilation" of the wicked, or of their universal regeneration. May be we are mistaken in this, but so it looks, unless he has some other explanation to give of the sentence under consideration.

At all events, the sentence seems to explode the theological hell of eternal torments; that explosion must land its advocates in the universal extermination of the wicked, or their universal restoration to obedience to Christ. As "Zion's Herald" says, Rev. E. O. Haven has cleared himself from the unjust charge of "annihilation;" will it tell us if the Doctor has really gone over to Restorationism? If so, will it tell us if the Methodist E. Church is swinging into that doctrine, as less unpopular than the doctrine of "No future life out of Christ?"

This latter doctrine is that we promulgate and defend, because we believe it to be the teaching of the Bible, and that a future life is "the gift of God through Jesus Christ," and not an inherent life in man by creation or natural birth.

At the opening of these remarks we confessed ourself "caught;" but remember, we did not and do not confess that the "net" has strength enough to hold us; it can no more hold the truths we advocate from marching right on to the upturning of the inherent immortal soul theory than the "green withs" could place Samson in the power of the Philistines.

Not one valid argument has ever yet been produced from the Bible to prove the inherent immortality of the soul; no such language can be found in the Book of God; it is merely of human invention, originating in the pride of the human heart, puffed up by "vain philosophy."

To us, it is evident that the continued adherence to the immortal soul theory will ere long force its advocates into some form of restorationism. The horribleness and utter irreconcilableness with the perfections of God and the reason he has planted in the human breast, will lead to the indignant rejection of the doctrine of eternal torments before many more years are past. There are many signs, already, in the nominal churches, that such is the tendency of the doctrine of inherent immortal-soulism. Of course this result will not be reached without a struggle. Immortality, as "the gift of God," at the resurrection by Christ at the last day—and no future life without such resurrection—is a humiliating doctrine to the unsanctified heart; and the struggle will be, in the mind, between that and the pride of heart which is more gratified with the idea that we are now "as Gods"—immortal—and hence must be all brought back to union with him, and so "the time will come when every" sinner "in all the realms of God's universe," will become holy and happy.

"The Unpreached Gospel:"

"AN EMBODIED TRUTH."

The above is the title of a pamphlet of 46 pages which has been sent us from two sources; but at first we did not feel disposed to notice it. The second copy was sent us last week by Eld. J. Parry, Sandy Hill, N. Y., with a request to make some remarks on its contents. It is published in London, England, "By the Author of 'The Study of the Bible.'" Who he is, we know not. The object of the pamphlet is to "call attention" to another work entitled "The Destiny of the Human Race." The latter work we have not seen, but as the pamphlet is a kind of synopsis or index of the larger work, we gather the design of the author is to teach a universal restoration of the human race, or nearly so; very few being ultimately lost. The foundation of his theory rests on the assumed position that men are "immortal," and that all—saints and sinners—will have a resurrection; after which the saints glorified will be employed to convert those who failed of being converted in this life.

The author says, the preaching in these days "announces the glorification of the elect, and nothing more." The unpublished gospel, or "The Gospel of the kingdom, proclaims, in addition, the salvation of the world:" p. 14. But he says, on page 23, that some "men are undergoing their entire probation now." These, he tells us, are "believers," who "in consequence of the profession they have made, have placed themselves in a very different position from that which is occupied by other men." These are the ones who are now undergoing their entire probation. He says of them,

These may rise, to be actual "partakers of the Divine nature;" they may lose, through their negligence and carelessness, this spiritual birthright; and "after having preached to others, may themselves become castaways," i. e., be degraded, and set aside as unfit for the Divine service. Worst of all—for this too is possible—they may, by pride and unbelief, become altogether "apostates," and irrecoverably perish in their sins.

Thus it appears, after all, some who have been believers may perish irrecoverably, though the "unpublished gospel," it is affirmed, page 14, "proclaims the salvation of the world." "Universalism," he tells us, is "irreconcilable with Scripture;" but wherein his theory differs from it we cannot see, only he would, it seems, convert the words of Jesus, Matth. vii., 13, 14, so as to make them read, "Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to life, and many there be that go in thereat: because straight is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leaded to destruction, and few there be that find it." That is "The Unpublished Gospel," so far as appears from the language of this new pamphlet. On page 31, the author says:

The redemption of mankind from the tyranny of Satan; the deliverance of the race from "captivity;" the salvation of the world . . . is never made dependent on the belief or unbelief of mortals; nor is there a shadow of support to be found in the Bible for the supposition that the reconciliation of the world unto God pails to take effect when man neglects to co-operate with the Reconciler.

Such are some of the bald assertions of this author. We cannot but regard the work as being a mixture of truth and falsehood, made up chiefly of the latter, growing out of that fruitful root, inherent immortality; an attempt to escape the horrible consequences of that most corrupting of all errors. The "mortal resurrectionists" will find it a vast improvement on their theory, and much more in harmony with the Divine character and the Bible; for it gives some apparent reason for the resurrection of all men, good and bad; while the mortal resurrection theory, to make alive to kill again, not only has no apparent reason in it, but is stamped with horrible cruelty.

"The Prophetic Periods."

We have been solicited to insert articles in this paper on the Chronological or Prophetic periods, and we have given place to one this week, which is very free from the positive spirit which so generally appears in articles on this subject; but when a writer on the question comes forward and says, "We have proved that the 2,300 days end in A. D. 1875," etc., we simply say, they manifest a pride of opinion which has wrecked more than one such positive proclaimer of their discovered time. We have no objection to any candid expression of opinion of the commencement and termination of any of the prophetic periods. But after all we are firmly set against the idea that any of those periods give, or were ever designed to give the day, month or year of the second advent of our Lord. That some of them bring us into the vicinity of it we have never doubted for the last twenty-five years.

Devils, Demons, Etc.

In Dr. Lardner's "Credibility of the Scriptures," he gives in volume 1, four discourses on the above. He holds to the existence of a personal Devil, also of fallen angels, but rejects the view that fallen angels or demons took possession of any one in the days of our Saviour and the apostles. He shows what has been shown by others, that fallen angels are not devils, and vice versa. He remarks:

"Give me leave to observe, . . . that in speaking of this matter, particularly of persons possessed with devils, our translation is not exact; and instead of devils, the word demons would be much more proper: for that is the ancient word which we have in the Greek original, and in the ancient Latin version, and in many modern translations.

"If any one will be pleased to observe carefully, I believe they will find, that throughout the New Testament there is but one evil spirit called devil. . . . . Nor is that word once used in the plural number, in the New Testament, where Satan, or the fallen angels are spoken of."

Concerning the use of the term demons, he says:

"It is somewhat difficult to determine what ought to be understood by the word demon, as used in the New Testament.

"It is likely, that many now by demons understand fallen angels. But at present our inquiry is, what was the meaning of the evangelical writers; in what sense this word was used by them, and was used and understood by their contemporaries, or those who lived in the time of Christ and his apostles. And though it may be difficult to determine this point with full and absolute certainty, yet there are some reasons which may dispose us to think, that thereby they mean the souls of bad men.

"The word demon, used in the gospels, and in other parts of the New Testament, is very frequent in Greek authors. And in those profane authors, as we call them, the word has various senses. It sometimes denotes God himself, or the supreme deity; sometimes an inferior deity, and sometimes those genii, or lower orders of spirits, of which some were reputed good, others bad.

"In the New Testament the word is almost always used in a bad sense, to denote an evil or impure spirit. Nevertheless in one place, we may allow it to be taken in a good sense. Acts xvii., 28. . . . But generally, for certain, in the New Testament, and ever since, among all Christian writers, the word has been used to denote an evil spirit.

"And there are remaining some passages of ancient authors, which may be of no small service for assuring us what was meant by this word among Jewish people, and by the writers of the New Testament. One is a passage of Josephus, the celebrated Jewish historian, who was contemporary with Christ's apostles. He says, that 'demons are the spirits of wicked men, who enter into living men, and destroy them, unless they are so happy as to meet with speedy relief.' Another is a passage of Justin Martyr, a Christian writer, born of Greek parents, in the country of Samaria, who flourished about the middle of the second century. He is arguing for a future state, and among other things he there speaks 'of those who are seized and tormented with the souls of the dead, whom all call demoniacs and madmen.' And there are many other authors, to whom I might refer as countenancing this opinion."

From the preceding it seems clear that the Jews in Christ's day believed that the demons were not fallen angels, but the souls of dead men, that is, wicked dead men. There were persons in those days who ascribed these possessions to natural or physical causes. The Sadducees denied the existence of angel and spirit; that is, they did not deny that God is a spirit, and they did not deny that angels had once existed; but they denied that men have spirits, as the Pharisees taught, and, though they believed that angels formerly existed, they held that in their day they were extinct. Thus the Sadducees denied that possessed persons were controlled either by the souls of wicked dead men, or by fallen angels. Origen, who believed the influence of demons, (according to Dr. Lardner) says:

"The physicians endeavored to account for them in a natural way; not allowing the agency of any impure spirits, but calling them bodily distempers." Dr. Lardner adds, "So said physicians in those times; and they must be reckoned as good judges as any."

Again: "Plotinus, a celebrated heathen philosopher, who flourished about the middle of the third century, blames some who ascribed to demons diseases, which, as he says, may be accounted for in an ordinary way, and are owing to fatigue, excess, indigestion, and other causes, either internal or external, and are oftentimes cured by medicines.

"And Philostorgius, an ecclesiastical historian, at the beginning of the fifth century, mentions one Posidonius, a learned physician, whom he knew, who ascribed all the bad symptoms of those called demoniacs to natural causes; and did not believe that demons had power to torment men, though he did not deny their existence.

"I might show that this has likewise been the opinion of some judicious, and thoughtful, and pious men of late times. But as I suppose you to be rather determined by reason than authority, I forbear to insist on their judgment.

"I therefore would recommend to your consideration the observations which have been now mentioned: which seem to me to render it very probable that the afflictions which those labored under, who among the Jews were said to have a demon, or an unclean spirit, were mere bodily distempers and indispositions. They are at least so far as I am able to judge, cogent arguments against such possessions, in the gross sense of the word, as unders'oop by some learned men of late times."

I have not brought Dr. L's. arguments forward, but have merely shown that he did not believe, nor the Jews either, nor many others, that demons were fallen angels.

I propose to write another article on this subject, giving the reasons of Dr. Lardner for ascribing the difficulties to natural causes, and not to fallen angels or the souls of wicked dead men.

In conclusion I submit a quotation from Dr. L's book which has made me laugh most heartily, and I think whoever reads it, whether they agree with Dr. L. or not, will laugh heartily, too.

In Bp. Smallbrook's "Vindication of our Saviour's Miracles," occurs the following paragraph in Vol. 1., p. 203.

"So that even this permission of Jesus to the evil spirits was amply compensated, by casting a whole legion (6,000) of devils out of one person, that is, by suffering about three of them to enter into each hog, (there were about 2,000 hogs,) instead of about six thousand of them keeping possession of one man. And this dispossession of those evil spirits, and permission given them in consequence of it, were arguments of great force, to show the power of Jesus over so numerous a regiment."

Upon the foregoing Dr. Lardner remarks, "So that great author. The number of the spirits that had taken possession of the unhappy man, is here inferred and concluded from his calling himself Legion. A Roman legion at that time usually consisted of six thousand soldiers or more. That learned writer therefore supposeth, that there were so many evil spirits in that man. And when those spirits were cast out of the man, there being about two thousand swine that were drowned in the sea, the same writer supposeth, that each swine became possessed, and was hurried down the precipice by three devils." F. H. Burbank.

Eben Hester, Suffield, Conn., writes: I met with considerable opposition at first; but the Herald of Life works its way. My father, who is eighty years old, saw the name of Jesus Christ so prominently set forth in it that a new light seemed to dawn on his mind, and on my mother's also; and now they both read it with a relish, which pleases me much. When they have read the paper through, they send it to different parts of the globe; thus scattering light through the thick darkness.

Who will Live from the Dead?

"Search the Scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." John v., 39.

These words were spoken by our Lord to the Jews, who were the natural seed of Abraham; and as they thought they had eternal life in the Scriptures, they must have had reasons why they thought so. Now the question is, Why did they think so? Evidently because they were the seed of Abraham; as you will see by consulting another conversation Jesus had with this same people, when he tells them, "If ye continue in my words, then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man." We see by this that they relied on the promise made to Abraham and his seed for their freedom and eternal life, and this promise they found in the Scriptures; and I must say they had more reason to expect eternal life on this promise than our brethren have to expect a future life to all the wicked at the last day, on any promise found in the Scriptures of the Old or New Testaments.

Let us examine this promise. "I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee; and I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession." Now, can a man have an everlasting possession without everlasting life? I answer, no. Did the promise include Abraham and his seed? It did. Were they the literal seed of Abraham? They were. Why not, then, expect eternal life in the Scriptures? They did expect it by a resurrection of the dead. You see, by consulting Paul, Acts xxvi., 6, that his hope and their hope were on the same promise: "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers. Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come; for which hope's sake, King Agrippa (viz., the hope of the promise) I am accused of the Jews: the very ones spoken of in the text, who thought they had eternal life in the Scriptures. They supposed all the seed of Abraham, "both just and unjust," were included in the promise. Hence their hope, founded on the promise, involved a resurrection of the dead, both just and unjust. Acts xxiv., 15.

Now, were they right or wrong in their expectation? I answer, they were wrong in supposing the promise referred to the seed after the flesh. Paul makes the thing very clear in his letter to the Galatians: "If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise:" and as all that are included in the promise will have a resurrection, and none others, it is necessary to belong to Christ in order to secure a resurrection at the last day. Hence we see, Paul was willing to suffer the loss of all things that he might be found in Christ; if by any means he might attain unto the resurrection of the dead. Phil. iii. 10, 11. Thus we see the resurrection is a blessing promised; and those who attain unto it "cannot die any more, and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." So saith Jesus. Amen.

To Die, to Live Again.

The question, so far as human experience goes, is yet unanswered, (Spiritualists and others to the contrary notwithstanding), whether, "If a man die shall he live again?" and the question must forever remain unsolved so far as our own experience goes, unless God has, or designs to make known to us the dread and solemn mystery of another life. The question, then, before us, is not as is currently adopted; but, is death all it seems to be, or is it a sham and a deception? That it is no sham the mourners going through the streets certify, else why those habiliments of mourning for the dead, if they are not dead? Rather, why not put on garments indicative of joy, if it is true that the dead have gone to their home in the skies? progressing from sphere to sphere until their seventh or seventy-seventh heaven is reached; and then, as has been well remarked of those great and controlling minds here, after all this extra experience in the "better land," they are called upon by numskulls of all grades of intellect to visit this mundane sphere, and rap out nonsense of the highest or lowest order, whichever you choose to have it.

"If a man die, shall he live again?" was the text recently used by a Universalist to prove the immortality of the soul. A sorry proof, alas, to be found in these words. The proof, it happens here, as in all other texts used for proof, is indeed found to be wanting.

Orthodox and heterodox "Reverends" may continue to flounder in the slough they have made, and call all the texts they can possibly rake together, the proof is still wanting, and as a last resort the sublime (?) teachings of modern Spiritualism are invoked; but still the thing is uncertain, only as we may assume false premises, and thereon rear a superstructure. It is really begging the question to assert, "God had not created a desire of a hereafter without a purpose," and that "there was no nation on the earth but believed in a future existence after death." The truth of the matter is, God's thoughts are not as our thoughts; and what might seem correct to "nations," on this question, is certainly no proof. In this age of progress as to government, one nation does not ask another which is the best form: each has its own peculiar form.

Our Universalist preacher told his "large and intelligent audience" that "death forever dissolved the relations of the spiritual with the natural," i. e., the soul from the body. How wise some preachers are! If they know so much now, what will they not know when they reach the place where Mohammed's donkey has gone? Progress, indeed!

If death is not being dead, then living is is not being alive. How many are ready to accept these manifestly self-contradictory propositions? and yet 'tis true in profession—the dead are not dead; how about the living not being alive? I recently heard it advocated by a "D. D.," "Believe in a future hell, if you belive nothing else." Alas for all such guides! They surely are void of understanding God's invitation, which is by the mouth of Christ. "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ," said one; and Christ said, "He that believeth shall have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."

CHRIST'S COMING.

PRACTICALLY, the return of our Lord from heaven is rejected by a large majority of professing Christians. They do not deny it outright, but so cold and dead is their faith in it that the subject is well nigh as seldom named by them as if the Bible made no more mention of it than does the Koran. Some, indeed, there are, who hesitate not to pronounce the doctrine groundless, but while its truth is generally conceded, the event itself is by very many who profess to accept it, distorted and multiplied into as many distinct comings as there are assumed-to-be righteous souls to be conducted to the fancied sky-kingdom. Christ comes to every believer at death, is the boastful cry, and as it is a fact too prominent to be overlooked that inspiration couples the advent with resurrection from the dead, they accommodate their theory to circumstances, or circumstances to their theory, by making the resurrection a separation of soul from body. Thus is it that men in their eagerness to "hew out unto themselves cisterns," have forsaken the word of truth, and have sought to turn to naught just so much of the counsel of God. Though prevailing ignorance has caused some well-meaning ones to become ensnared in this particular, the number of such must be comparatively small, for few candid Bible students can have failed to note certain considerations which absolutely forbid such conclusions. Various allusions of Christ, prophets and apostles to the second advent show beyond peradventure that it is not to be a mere transient circumstance, a moment seen then gone forever, like the meteor's flash, but that it will introduce a period during which a great and glorious work will be accomplished. When our Lord had spoken to the Jews of his second coming, and of some events that should previously transpire, "the disciples came to him privately, saying, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world" (age)? He told them of many things that would come to pass before that "great and notable day." They, the disciples, would be afflicted, and would be killed. Wars would exist and rumors of wars be heard. "Nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places.... Many false prophets shall arise, and shall deceive many," etc., etc., "and then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven; and then shall the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." The Scriptures do not present our Lord's return from heaven as a constantly recurring circumstance, but as a future event the importance of which cannot well be over-estimated. Of all great occurrences, that will surpass in sublime greatness, in awful grandeur.

When the attention of even those religionists who profess to hold to the second coming of Christ, as a Scripture doctrine, is directed to the fact that while the apostles and primitive Christians constantly insisted upon it, the subject has, until within the past few years, long remained almost unmentioned, and is yet unnoticed by a large portion of professing Christians. They urge in extenuation of the negligence that while it is true that the apostles and early fathers made it a prominent feature in their teachings, they did so expecting the event was then nigh, but so many centuries having elapsed without bringing the occurrence, it may be as far in the future beyond us as we are beyond them. This seems very like the servant who is represented as saying, "My Lord delayeth his coming," but we will not judge. Let us notice some facts which indicate that the event is not far off.

Previous to the ascension of Jesus, and to their receiving the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, the apostles evidently did expect Christ would then set up his kingdom. On one occasion, in discoursing to them, Jesus "added and spake a parable, . . . because they thought the kingdom of God should immediately appear. He said, therefore, a certain nobleman went into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom, and to return." Luke xix., 11, 12. Now when that nobleman, the Saviour, was about to leave his disciples to go into that "far country," they inquired of him (Acts i., 6, 7) saying, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel? And he said unto them, It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power." Jesus was ever ready to correct any misapprehension on the part of his followers respecting the time of that event, and knowing their expectations on the subject, he disabused their minds and gave such a relation of what must first transpire, as to put the idea of a speedy setting up of the kingdom entirely out of the question. True, they failed to comprehend the Master, on that as well as on other points, but when they experienced the baptism of the Holy Ghost, they remembered the things which Jesus had spoken unto them, and they understood them. They went out and henceforth zealously preached the fact of his future return from heaven. Why? Because their mission was to proclaim the gospel glad tidings of future life from the dead through Jesus at his coming. Accordingly we find that the sum of their preaching was "Jesus and the resurrection." They accounted their efforts highly successful when they could induce men to turn "to God from idols, to serve the living and true God, and to"—expect to go to Christ at death? no, no; but—"wait for His Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead, even Jesus which delivered us from the wrath to come." It was not for them to know, respecting the second advent, "the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his own power," for enough was it for the people of that day to be assured of the fact itself. Further knowledge on the subject was reserved to be unfolded in the period denominated "the time of the end."

We may rest implicit confidence in the truth of inspiration that "surely the Lord God will do nothing, but he revealeth his secret unto his servants, the prophets." This will be true respecting Christ's coming, and while we do not believe the day or hour will be known, yet the faithful, watching ones will know that it is even at the door. God's manner of communicating truth to his creatures is not always the same, but is different in different ages of the world. "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son, whom he hath appointed heir of all things." Heb. i., 1, 2. Unto faithful men who are called and qualified by him to become "embassadors for Christ" He revealeth his secrets by moving them to the study, and enabling them by the enlightening influence, of the Spirit, to comprehend the import of the "sure word of prophecy, whereunto," says Peter, "ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts."

A writer has properly remarked, "It is not to be truthfully disputed that during the last half century, the attention of the church has been called to the study of the prophetic Scriptures, in a manner never before witnessed, and with an intensity and earnestness of investigation that is irreconcilable with any theory that denies that God is thus moving upon the people, and preparing his chosen ones for some manifestation of his dealings with them, the nature of which can only be known by a careful and prayerful study of His word." Yes, faithful "embassadors for Christ" have during the past few years been moved to the study of the word of God, and the result is that not only has much of the truth that became buried beneath human traditions, during the dark night of apostasy, been brought to light, but just in proportion to prayerful investigation does faith in the speedy return of our Lord from heaven increase and abound. More and more clearly is it seen that many of the occurrences which were to closely precede that event are now taking place. "Famines and pestilences" have abounded, and "earthquakes" there are "in divers places." Nation is rising against nation, and "kingdom against kingdom" in wars unceasing, while rumors of wars are carried upon the wings of both wind and lightning from the centre to the very ends of the earth. "False prophets" in abundance have arisen, and have deceived and are deceiving many. "Iniquity" abounds to a truly alarming extent, compassing God's people about as with a strong wall, and "the love of many waxes cold." The gospel of the kingdom is preached "in all the world for a witness unto all nations," and soon shall we see the "Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory." Soon he will "send his angels" to "gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other." Since, then, the burden of apostolic preaching was Jesus and the resurrection of the saints at his appearing, notwithstanding those events were then so far in future, how much more important, if possible, is it that men should proclaim it now that the event is thought by so many Bible students to be nigh at hand.

Let not professing Christians deceive themselves in this matter. Life from the dead through Jesus Christ, the resurrection and the life, at his coming, is the only gospel-inspired hope. It is the gospel glad tidings. If men, thinking they have found out a more desirable way to life, attach little importance to the coming of Christ, they will do well to consider whether at the return of the "nobleman" from the "far country" they may not be reckoned with those from whom shall be taken the little they have. The kingdom of heaven is nigh at hand. When it comes, the great mass of the people will be like the antediluvians who "were eating and drinking, and marrying and giving in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and knew not until the flood came and took them all away;" for it is declared, "So shall the coming of the Son of Man be."

They only are wise servants who stand "like unto men that wait for their Lord." The day when Jesus in burning glory shall descend with his myriad angel host will be one of awful terror to unbelievers, but glorious will it be to them who love his appearing; for he cometh to give eternal life to both waking and sleeping saints. How surpassing sweet is the reflection of the pilgrim when he backward bends his gaze upon a life of struggle, that faith and hope in the object striven for grow brighter and brighter as the sun of life sinks into the west, and already, perhaps, withdraws its animating rays; for well that pilgrim knows he soon will be born into a life whose sun will ever be at meridian brightness.

What, then, though waiting ones become enveloped in fiery trial, or be called upon to go down into the dark valley of the shadow of death? Like the Psalmist of Israel, they need "fear no evil," for over and beyond all the eye of living faith will view with transporting delight the saints' unfading inheritance. With eager, longing gaze, it will behold the eternal kingdom nigh. How blessed will they be who attain thereto. Freed from the fetters of mortality and death, decked with the bloom of immortal youth, secure in unending association with dearly loved and loving ones, what joy will be then? No pain, no sorrow, no dying, no nothing but an eternity of joy unspeakable and full of glory. "Blessed are those servants whom the Lord, when he cometh, shall find watching;" for "the Son of Man cometh at an hour when ye think not."

WHAT IS OUR MISSION?

BY JACOB GRIM.

WE have a principle of truth. Is it worth contending for? "God is Love" is the great principle that underlies the whole Bible doctrine of God's dealing with the children of men.

Thirty years since, nearly, when our eyes were first opened to see the beauty of the Divine character, we made up our mind to defend the character of our God against all traducers, and whenever opportunity offered. Br. Storrs says, "It is not our mission to build up a sect:" to which I say Amen. But I ask the question, what is our mission, and are we fulfilling it? Paul says in Gal. ii., 18, "For if I build again the things which I destroyed, I make myself a transgressor." Paul had left Judaism and all its forms; and to go back and build them up again under the law, which was dead, he would make himself a transgressor.

Now I would like each individual to ask himself this question, If the doctrine of the immortal soul, hell torments, and all the kindred branches growing out of them, are a lie, and are dishonoring to God and his character, Are we not dishonoring God by supporting a lie, and building up a dishonoring system by going to these churches, holding fellowship with and helping support them? I am speaking more for Philadelphia, the section where I live, than for any other. We have a list of subscribers for the HERALD OF LIFE sufficient to fill our Hall full every Sunday; and before we had a Hall, our brethren and sisters were very anxious to have a place for meetings. Well, we have had a place going on two years: one of the most pleasant rooms in the city. At first it was well filled; but, alas! it is, like all the rest, left to take care of itself, while Life believers go to, and support "orthodox" churches by their means and presence: thus telling to those who do not believe in our doctrines, you are not in earnest or you would maintain a place, and support it by your presence. I confess if we had as much zeal as politicians have, we have truth enough, and would have influence enough, to make it felt throughout the world.

I now wish to say to the friends in Philadelphia, whom this may reach, If you think it is worth while to keep up a meeting in the city, we wish you would manifest it by your presence; but if it is of no importance, we will, after giving you time to decide by your presence, close the Hall and the meetings; and consider that we have done our duty, and shall make no further effort in that direction.

FROM G. B. MARTIN.

GOLDFIELD, IOWA, May 14, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I am greatly pleased with the HERALD OF LIFE. New light is constantly beaming forth through its columns on the sacred pages. No other paper is equal to it in the dissemination of light on the Scriptures of truth. May God speed it on its mission. May it have a wide circulation, and continue to be the medium of breaking down the old pagan ideas of immortal-soulism; and, consequently; eternal torturism, and an immortal spirit-devil, to pack the sins of wicked men and women to market, which they and they alone have committed and must be responsible for.

If I believed there was such a being as a spirit-devil, and he was a fallen angel, as some think, I would not give two cents for the future heaven of the saints (which will be on the earth), for we are told in the Scriptures that God is no respecter of persons; and if that be so—and we believe it is—what would be the condition of the saints in the future heaven? Why, fallible, subject to fall as did the devil when he was a happy and holy angel around the throne of God; for if one happy and holy being in glory could fall, in an immortal state, why may not another as well? God has represented himself, in his word, as no respecter of persons; and if that be true, may not a glorified, immortal saint fall, as well as a glorified, immortal angel did? What good reason would there be to disbelieve it? Now, if this be so, what encouragement would there be to the saints in the present state to seek for immortality and eternal life? If that be fallible, better perish at first, than to fall after being saved; for that would render the theological hell actually necessary.

We hope that those people who believe there is an immortal spirit-devil, and that he was once a holy and happy angel in heaven, and fell from that holy and happy state, may reflect on their view of that subject, and see where it will lead to in the future. It will actually lead to a million times worse condition than the present one here on the earth. Yours in hope.

ELD. WM. P. SHOCKEY, Aspinwall, Neb., sends three new subscribers, and for a dollar's worth of tracts, and writes: The truths advocated in "Life only in Christ" are gaining ground in our field of labor. We are anxious that the HERALD OF LIFE should be published in a form more easily preserved. The sheet is now so easily worn that we cannot lend it long enough. I have just returned from my first trip since last Jan., the time my wife was crippled by being thrown from a wagon, Jan. 14. I am gaining fast: have preached sixteen times on things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus Christ. Some made the good confession concerning Him, "I am a King: to this end was I born." They believe this testimony and yield obedience to the faith. I thank you for the tracts.

THOMAS W. VAUGHN, Pent Water, Mich., writes: The package of Campaign Documents you sent me last winter are all gone; judiciously distributed. I think there is a good prospect in this thriving village to present the truth on eternal life by a resurrection through a LIFE-GIVER. I spoke last Sunday to an attentive audience. Our cause is making progress; for, like Israel in crossing the Red Sea, God's word is a pillar of fire to enlighten our path, but a cloud of darkness to the opposers, who are stumbling to their confusion and final overthrow. The signs are portentious: the morning is dawning, and we are looking and longing for the sun's rising, and the glorious appearing of our King and LIFE-GIVER. "Thy kingdom come." Thy brother in affection.

TIMOTHY E. CORLISS, Minnesota, writes: About thirty years since I embraced the joyful news of our Saviour's soon return and am yet strong in confidence He will quickly appear again; and I intend by grace to be ready: and as I have been trimming my lamp, I have embraced and now believe the "Spirit baptism;" and if any are disposed to treat this subject lightly, I would advise them to "take the water of life freely." I have also embraced the solemn, yet to me plain Bible truth, there is "No future life out of Christ." I mean to hold fast to these truths, however others may regard them. Send me some Campaign Documents.

SKETCHES OF THOUGHT.

THE sermon in a late No. of the HERALD OF LIFE, by Br. Joel A. Simonds, of Grand Rapids, was truly cheering to our minds, having been an old friend of ours. We were glad to have him so effectually break the ice (of tradition) and launch out into the sea of divine love. We hope to hear from time to time through the HERALD, of his explorations therein. Truth—the truth of no future life out of Christ—is spreading; gradually leavening the Church; and it will, if we be careful that the love power alone is used for its enforcement.

Patience seems to be the thing in greatest demand; or, at least, the thing of the greatest need just now. The Spirit directs the apostle to pen an admonition, peculiarly adapted to our time and need, in Heb. x., 35–38: "Cast not away, therefore, your confidence (in God's word; yet many things conspire to shake our confidence in man's; be careful to discriminate here), which hath great recompense of reward." Yes, yes; confidence in, or according to the truth pays good interest; no failure in this matter. "For ye have need of patience, that after ye have done the will of God (the specific work of which is, the destruction of the remaining traditions of men left in the church by the reformers before us; particularly in regard to the second advent, and truths having a bearing or relation to this event,) after ye have done the will of God in this direction, "ye might receive the promise."

The times are hasty; men run to and fro; all is exciting and excitement; but God's people have no license to get embroiled therein. No? quite the contrary; they have got to keep out of this general rush, or they will also be drowned in perdition! Ah, methinks I see the great apostle standing above the surging billows of strife and contention, which roll and dash o'er all the earth, and waving over the troubled elements his holy hands, sound forth his solemn message to the church, "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand." Phil. iv., 5.

I tell you, brethren, God's truth as ballast must sink us deep into the sea of divine love, or the gales and tempests, as we are nearing coast, will capsize us and peril our salvation. Christ told the tempter that man should live by every word of God, Luke iv., 4; or, as it is in Deut. viii., 3, "And he humbled thee, and suffered thee to hunger, and fed thee with manna, which thou knewest not, neither did thy fathers know; that He might make thee know how that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord, doth man live." As Israel was humbled so must all God's people be humbled, become as little children, or not enter into the kingdom of heaven. Matth. xviii., 13. Just here is the "secret spring," the germ of Christ's planting—a willing mind; one subjugated to Christ. All expression of faith and practice is but the manifestation of the principle within. May we all have the new name written upon the heart, which no man knoweth but he that receiveth it. Rev. ii., 17.

A. ROYNTON.

WEST BATAVIA, N. Y., May, 1869.

LOVE THINKETH NO EVIL.

NEARLY ever one has been fortunate enough to meet with persons whose moral powers have been brought under such perfect control that neither by word nor deed do they give occasion for offence, even in their most intimate and unguarded associations. They never belong to the class of stoics whose cold unsympathetic natures are wanting in all those passions which at times tyrannize over most men, and bring them unto temporary condemnation. Sensitive to all natural and social influences, and realizing no small happiness from such influences, they are nevertheless above them. It is something more than a natural happy adjustment of their faculties or peculiar harmony of man's complex nature. The perfection of their character appeals more to our conscience than to the imagination. We are conscious that they are conquerors of the highest rank, having obtained the mastery over themselves. Eruptions of the passions in physical violence, or in sharp bitter words that cut into the tenderest parts of human nature as no other weapons can, are more to be shunned than common dangers.

The writers of the New Testament Scriptures, especially those who distinguished themselves as leaders of the Christian movement, seem to have kept this matter of self-conquest continually before their converts as a definite point in Christian experience. They do not accept the strongest temptations as a sufficient apology for sin. They teach that the design of Christ's coming into the world was to destroy the rule of evil. Appetites and passions, principalities and powers, are no longer to have dominion over us. The most perfect theories of right doing, the highest ideals of the purest minds, must be wrought into successful practice. Christ teaches us by his own example the measure of success.

A system of restraints, however perfect, cannot be that exalted condition of liberty which Christ has provided for us. In the service of God, love is enthroned above all legal exactions, for it is itself the highest law, and the fountain of all perfect moral life. There is a development of spiritual life in which the heart has been purged by the Holy Spirit until what remains is the pure gold, reflecting always the image of the Invisible. It harbors no longer any hatred of jealousy, envy or discontent, nor any selfish or evil thoughts at all. That love which has taken possession of the heart thinketh no evil. All its surmises and suggestions, its desires and intentions, are full of goodness and benevolence. Unguarded words and actions are not censured with wanton intolerance, but the wanderer is won back by tender solicitude. Like the Master, a most generous judgment is passed upon the guilty, and yet none suspects it of being in league with sin. Such persons transport a glowing warmth and aroma of happiness with them wherever they go. Their presence is a pledge of peace and enjoyment.

No wonder, then, that the best men and women are entranced by the beauty and serenity of such a life as these servants of God live. The record of these saints—their names are so written in the Book of Life—brief and fragmentary as they often are, have a wonderful charm for sincere souls, and are a source of the highest instruction. But who can properly describe the joy and glory of a life that is reaching upward all the while. What spiritual health and vigor of faith mark the quiet activity of their unpretending ways. The ease and grace of their goodness is as charming as its fragrance.

Can any one doubt that thus to be transformed, purified, and ennobled by love is God's richest endowment? This consecration and sanctification is higher than the apostolic office, or prophetic vision, or eloquence, or any and all perfect and useful human faculties which God has selected and honored as his instruments. It is the ripest fruit in God's earthly vineyard.—Selected.

THE WALDENESS IN ITALY.

THE Waldenses, who long suffered persecution from the Romish church, and who were reduced to a small and feeble band by the cruelties which they suffered for centuries, are now, under the new kingdom of Italy, putting on the vigor of youth. They have now more missionaries than pastors. They have only 26 congregations with 3,000 communicants, and they have in Italy 80 missionaries, agents or evangelists, and 49 teachers. In Venice there is a flourishing school of seventy children under an able Waldensian master; and the station is in a healthy condition. It is stated that in Venice "the Vaudois heretics, like a set of raging wolves, have rushed into the fold of the Patriarch" of that city, and that the Romish Church, alarmed by the inroad, sent an able and eloquent priest to denounce them, but he has been obliged to retire from the field discomfited.

At a recent meeting in England called to express sympathy and afford aid in the evangelistic work of the Waldenses, it was stated that of the 24,000,000 of Italians there were 17,000,000 or 18,000,000 who could neither read nor write; so that in respect of education, Italy was the darkest nation on the Continent, being in a worse condition even than Spain. On account of this ignorance, and to facilitate intercourse with the people, it was desirable that the work of the gospel in Italy should be prosecuted by native missionaries; and it must be borne in mind that until there was a thorough permeation of the people by the gospel they could never be said to be truly free. There are nearly one hundred places throughout Italy and Sicily where the gospel is proclaimed, and where more or less progress has been made toward forming evangelical congregations; and judging from the reports of travellers whose hearts are in the work, there seems to be a great readiness among the common people to listen to the simple preaching of the gospel. But the ignorance and vice that prevail are appalling.—Selected.

A GOOD STORY.

A VERY amusing anecdote is told of an Irishman who happened to be in Paris a short time ago, while three crowned heads of Europe were there on a visit to his Imperial Majesty Napoleon. These distinguished persons were the Emperors of Russia and Austria and the King of Prussia. One day, having thrown aside all state ceremonial, they determined to see the sights of the beautiful city on the Seine, for their own delectation, and for that purpose they resolved to go incog., so as not to be recognized by the people. However, in their stroll through Paris, they went astray, and meeting a gentlemanly-looking person, who happened to be an Irishman, they politely asked him if he would kindly direct them to the Palais Royal.

"Faith and that I will, my boys," says Pat, at the same time taking a mental photograph of the three "boys." "This way, my hearties;" and so they were conducted to the gates of the Royal Palace; and the Irishman was about bidding them farewell, when the Emperor of Russia, interested and pleased as much by the genuine politeness of Pat (and what son of Erin was ever yet deficient in courtesy and politeness?) as by his naiveté and witty remarks, asked him who he was.

"Well," rejoined their guide, "I did not ask you who you were, and before I answer you, perhaps you would tell me who you may be?"

After some further parleying, one said:

"I am Alexander, and they call be Czar or Emperor of all the Russias."

"Indeed," said Pat, with a roguish twinkle in the corner of his eye, and an incredulous nod of the head (as much as to say, "This boy is up to codding me a bit.") "And might I make bould to ax who ye may be, my flower?"

"They call me Francis Joseph, and the Emperor of Austria."

"Most happy to make your acquaintance, Frank, my boy," said the Irishman, who, thinking he was hoaxed, and in his despairing efforts to get the truth, as he conceived, out of any of them, turned to the third one, and said: "Who are you?"

"They call me Frederick William, and I am King of Prussia."

They then reminded him that he promised to tell them who he was, and, after some hesitation and a mysterious air of confidence, Pat, putting his hand to his mouth, whispered: "I am the Imperor of China, but don't tell anybody."—Selected.

"WE WILL LIFT A LITTLE."

Lift a little! lift a little!
Neighbor, lend a helping hand
To that heavy-laden brother,
Who for weakness scarce can stand.
What to thee, with thy strong muscle,
Seems a light and easy load,
Is to him a ponderous burden,
Cumbering his pilgrim road.

Lift a little! lift a little!
Effort gives one added strength;
That which staggers him when rising
Thou canst hold at arms' full length.
Not his fault that he is feeble,
Not thy praise that thou art strong;
It is God makes lives to differ,
Some from wailing some from song.

Lift a little! lift a little!
Many they who need thine aid;
Many lying on the road-side,
'Neath misfortune's dreary shade.
Pass not by like priest and Levite,
Heedless of thy fellow-man,
But with heart and arms extended,
Be the good Samaritan.

THE LITTLE TRACT DISTRIBUTOR.

THE following remarkable and affecting incident is related by the Rev. Theophilus Woolmer. A tract distributor, who was generally most attentive to his duty, allowed himself to be detained at home one Sabbath afternoon, on account of the excessive rain.

When his little daughter returned from the Sabbath-school, she saw his bundle of tracts lying upon the table, and immediately inquired:

"Father, havn't you been with your tracts?"

"No, my dear."

"Are you not going with them, father?"

"Not to-day, my dear. It is so very wet."

"Oh, father, let me go with them. I have got my bonnet on, and I shall soon take them round."

"No, no! It is too wet for any one to go this afternoon. We must stay at home, my dear."

The child, however, was very urgent with her father. She said she thought it would be such a pity for the poor people to be disappointed of their tracts, and she would take great care not to get wet. At last the father gave his consent, and away went the child with the bundle of tracts.

Among other houses, she came to one where there was no response to her knock. She waited patiently, and then knocked again. Still no reply. The rain was coming down fast, and the afternoon was particularly gloomy. There were many reasons why she should leave that house and go to the next. But perhaps the person belonging to the house was taking a short nap, or had gone up stairs to dress; so she knocked again, much louder than before. Then she thought she heard somebody moving about; and, after another knock, the door was opened, and a respectably-dressed, but unhappy-looking woman took in the tract. The child finished the round, and went home.

On the next Sabbath, when the father came to the house where his little daughter had been kept waiting so long, the same woman appeared, but with a countenance very different from that which she wore on the previous Sabbath.

"Who was that dear child," she asked, "that brought the tracts last Sunday?"

"My little daughter. I wasn't inclined to come myself, because it was so very wet. But when she came from the Sunday-school, and found that I had not gone with the tracts, she begged very hard to take them for me. And I have really felt quite ashamed ever since, that I allowed the wet to keep me at home, seeing that my little girl was not afraid of it," replied the distributor.

"Well!" said the woman, "I shall have to bless God to all eternity that that child ever brought the tracts round last Sunday! I had been in a very bad way for a long time, and had got so low that I felt as if I could not bear to live any longer. And last Sunday afternoon I went up stairs, with the intention of destroying myself. I had fastened a rope round the bed-post, had made a noose in it, and was just slipping it round my neck, when your little daughter knocked at the door. I did not know who it was, but thought I would wait until the person had gone away. She knocked several times. Then I thought it would be better to go down to see who it was, and afterward come back and complete my wickedness. When I found that it was nothing but the tract, I felt very angry. But your dear little girl handed in the tract with such a loving look, that I was obliged to take it; and God made that tract the means of turning me from my wicked purpose, and of dispelling all my gloom and doubts. It led me to Christ. And now I am happy in his love, and rejoice that God has spared my life."

"LO! I AM WITH YOU ALWAYS."

A MOTHER, one morning, gave to her two little ones books and toys to amuse them, while she went to attend to some work in an upper room.

A half hour passed quietly, and then a timid voice at the foot of the stairs called out,

"Mamma, are you there?"

"Yes, darling."

"All right, then;" and the child went back to its play.

By-and-by the question was repeated:

"Mamma, are you there?"

"Yes."

"All right, then;" and the little ones, reassured of their mother's presence, again returned to their toys.

Thus we, God's little ones, in doubt and loneliness look up and ask, "My Father, art Thou there?" and when there comes in answer the assurance of His presence, our hearts are quieted.

THE PROPHETIC PERIODS.

BR. STORRS: Much has been said in relation to the prophetic numbers in Daniel, and various opinions expressed with regard to their significance with respect to the time they cover. It has been the general opinion that each day represented a year. With this view men have calculated their commencement, and foretold their termination. Wm. Miller had them adjusted so nicely that they all terminated in 1843; others more recently found their termination in 1868. The time is past, and the desired event has not come, so that some become doubtful of their being year-days, and think they are literal days that will mark events that will finish up the gospel dispensation. But if so, there is no date given for their commencement, so that they might commence and terminate without shedding light upon the Christian's pathway.

I never had the privilege of reading Wm. Miller's lectures until lately. I esteem him to have been an earnest Christian, and having done a great and good work in inaugurating the literal principle of interpretation of the Scriptures, which makes them shine in God-like harmony, and reveal glorious truths that have been long obscured in mysticism and vain traditions. With respect to his exegesis of the prophetic numbers, time has proved he was mistaken. That mistake has added another strong evidence, to my mind, that the event of Christ's second coming is near. When the disciples asked Jesus, What would be the sign of his coming, and of the end of the world, or gospel dispensation? among other signs he gave a view of the moral condition of the world, of the unfaithful condition of a portion of the stewards of his household, and "Then," at that time, "the kingdom of heaven would be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom." But they were so meet with disappoint, for he tarried; "and while the bridegroom tarried they all slumbered and slept." If men had not made mistakes, this part of prophecy would have been unfulfilled. But while in this slumbering and sleeping condition, the true cry will be made, "Behold, the bridegroom cometh." He cometh unexpectedly to his friends, and as a snare upon the world, just as they had fancied themselves safe in security and peace; having got rid of their fears by the repeated failures of "set times," they begin to scoff, and, tauntingly ask, "Where is the promise of his coming?"

Now, if Christ had come in 1843, these predictions would not have had a very marked literal fulfilment; but as the time passes, the courage of an awe stricken world rallies to its scoffing position; and can we wonder, when some of the stewards of God's household set the example? Well do I remember the first Sabbath after the time set by Wm. Miller, of a minister raising himself up some inches above his natural stature, to give emphasis to his declaration that he was "no Millerite, and never was."

With respect to the 2,300 days, found in Daniel viii, at the end of which, "then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." For the proper understanding and consideration of that vision and prophecy, Daniel was informed there would be seventy weeks determined upon the Jews and upon Jerusalem. Now it seems reasonable to suppose that if the events to be accomplished within the seventy weeks had been completed within seventy literal weeks, the remainder of that vision and prophecy, of which the seventy weeks were a part, would have been fulfilled within the 1,810 remaining literal days of the 2,300. But time has shown that the seventy weeks, containing 490 days, were representatives of so many years, so that the remainder of the days will also be the representatives of years.

According to the computation of some, these days or years have run out, bringing no event to justify their expectation, hence they doubt the year-day system.

While reading Wm. Miller's lectures, I thought I discovered a great mistake. "From the going forth of the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem." Wm. Miller locates this decree 457 years before the Christian era, and refers to Ezra chap. vii. Now, this was not the decree "to restore and to build Jerusalem," but a permission to rebuild the temple. We find the commandment given to Nehemiah several years after; and with respect to the date of this decree, chronologists differ, and I have no evidence to decide. But evidently at "the going forth of the commandment" the seventy weeks commence, and their termination, instead of being at the crucifixion of Christ, seems to me to be at the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish polity. It says, "Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon the holy city." Now, if this 490 years spanned from "the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem," unto the destruction of the Jews as a nation, and of the city of Jerusalem, the 2,300 years cannot yet be expired. I do not know if we are certain about the year that Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, but I see it set down as the year 70. Now 490 from 2,300 leave 1,810, which add to seventy make 1,880. But the 2,300 do not make the time of Christ's coming; it says, "Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed." I think we have reason to believe Christ's coming will precede that event.

With respect to the 1,260, 1,290, and 1,335 days, it seems to be generally conceded that "the time, times, and the dividing of time," "time, times and a half," "the forty and two months," "the twelve hundred and sixty days," all refer to the same period, and measure the dominion of the Papal power. Some have commenced the Papal supremacy in A. D. 532–3, making it terminate in the French revolution. But Wm. Miller commences it in 538, which seems to make a more correct termination in 1798, when Napoleon, the scourge of Europe, imprisoned the Pope, took away his power to persecute by compelling him to grant religious toleration. But Wm. Miller puts 30 years, the difference between 1260 and 1290, between the fall of Pagan Rome and the rise of Papal Rome, for which I can see no reason unless to make the forty-five years, the difference between 1,290 and 1,335, to fill up the chasm between 1798 and 1843.

I read that the beast with seven heads and ten horns and seven crowns upon his heads (Pagan Rome), called the Dragon, "gave his power, and his seat, and great authority, "unto the beast having seven heads and ten horns, and upon his horns ten crowns, and upon his heads the name of blasphemy," which was Papal Rome. Now if the first beast transferred power, seat and authority to the second beast, where was the room for thirty years between them? It seems more consistent that the seventy-five years, "the time of the end," the difference between 1260 and 1335, should be after 1798, during which time papacy was to be consuming by the spirit of Christ's mouth, awaiting its complete destruction at the appearing of his presence, when Daniel would stand in his lot at the end of the days. Now, if we take this view, these numbers do not terminate until 1873.

I suppose some will be apt to say that 1873 does not harmonize with the cleansing of the sanctuary in 1880.

I do not present these periods with the purpose of saying that either of them is correct, but to show the possibility that these year-days may not yet be run out, as some seem to think.

But let us suppose that 1873 brings us to the end of the days when Daniel shall stand in his lot, may we not reasonably expect that Christ comes before Daniel has his resurrection and stands in his lot? When Christ comes to establish his kingdom with his joint-heirs, it will be a work of time, not an instantaneous event. Prophecy warrants the belief that he will meet the kings of the earth and their armies on the mountains of Israel, and destroy them with an awful destruction. Such will be the great magnitude in the preparations for war on the part of the kings of the earth, that, prophecy tells us, it will take seven months to bury the dead, and seven years to burn the instruments of war: "thus they shall cleanse the land." 1873 and 7 make 1880.

But if all these times pass, and Christ does not come, we are yet surrounded with evidence that that event is near. God grant that the writer and readers of this article may hail it with joy. Yours in love,

W. PATTERSON.

THE ISRAELITES IN THE HOLY LAND.

THE condition of the Jews in Palestine, their former home, has long been a subject of solicitude among those of their race in this and other lands. We give the following, from a secular paper, for what it is worth to the student of prophecy, and as indicating that the Jews, even in this free country, are not indifferent to their ancestors' land.

Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State:

SIR: Within the last twenty years, through the suggestion of the Department of State, made by its ministers, religious toleration has been granted in Prussia, Sweden, and other States of Central Europe to Christian believers entertaining the forms of faith and practice held by different denominations in England and America; and, in union with the government of England, the same moral intervention has secured a like immunity to Christian converts in the Turkish provinces. During the same period the privileges of Christian visitors and residents in the Holy Land have been constantly increasing through the combined influences of the governments of Russia, France, England, and the United States. The Israelites in their fatherland—dearer to them than it can be to any class of their co-religionists—have no nationality to which they can specially appeal when the rights granted by the Turkish government are, in this distant province of the Empire, invaded by irresponsible parties or by local authorities. The American Constitution, unlike any European constitution, wisely makes no distinction among its citizens as to religion. The nations of the Old World, therefore, have respected the consistency of the American government in asking from other governments at least religious toleration for all good citizens of whatever religion. The Israelites of the Holy Land look to this country, where, from the first, so many of their co-religionists have enjoyed all the immunities and privileges of citizens, ask from this government what other nations cannot so consistently grant. The undersigned respectfully ask as promising to secure the end sought by the Israelites of the Holy Land:

First. An appeal to the government of the Sultan for the privilege to Israelites, as well as Christians in the Holy Land, of visiting spots held sacred by the believers in the Old Testament, as also the security of their rights in engaging in various industrial pursuits, especially in the right of purchasing and cultivating the land in this province of the Turkish Empire.

Second. The appointment of a consul professing the Jewish faith at Jerusalem, charged with the protection of their interests.

Your obedient servants,

A. S. SOLOMONS, S. WOLFE, HENRY WILSON, U. S. Senator; JOHN M. THAYER, U. S. Senator; G. W. SAMSON, D. D., President Columbia College; J. HEILPRIN, M. J. FRANKLIN, ISAAC HERZBERG, J. GEORGE BUTLER, D. D., A. HART.

FINAL SATISFACTION.

"I shall be satisfied when I awake with Thy likeness."

THE glorification of believers is invested with profound mysteries which the testimony of God does not unveil, and unto which our sin-weakened minds could not attain. "We know not what we shall be." Let us, therefore, not give unrestrained license to our fancies, and follow the inordinate impulse of a prurient curiosity: but keep ourselves to the landmarks of revealed truth, and form our anticipations by the promises which we inherit. While there is much respecting our future being and destiny which we cannot now know, yet there is much which the grace of God has placed in our power to know, and altogether sufficient for the demands of this life. And we are as criminal in the neglect of what God has revealed, as in attempting to search beyond what He has been pleased to make known. It is the truth, and the whole truth of the inspired word which is profitable to our souls. And all baseless speculations and wild vagaries are pleasing only to a distempered mind, and are but hurtful fanaticism. If we believe in Christ, we have the divine assurance that God hath given to us the power to become His sons. We are even now His sons,—having the nature of such by regeneration; and with this nature the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry Abba, Father. And we have the title and right as children to an inheritance bestowed by our Father, sealed by our elder brother in the testament of his own blood; the earnest of which inheritance we already possess in the gracious power and indwelling of the Holy Spirit. And while the glory pertaining to this sonship and adoption is adjourned and reserved for another world—while the details of our condition and blessedness are yet of those secrets which belong unto the Lord our God, yet we have such a testimony given us that we may cheerfully walk by faith, and live by hope. We know that Christ is infinitely blessed and glorious, that His character is infinitely holy and beautiful, that His state, and dignity and honor, are the highest in the house of the Father. And though we know nothing else, we should be content while here, with the assurance that we shall be like Him.—Selected.

A LITTLE SERMON.

SITTING in a station the other day, I had a little sermon preached in the way I like; and I'll report it for your benefit, because it taught one of the beautiful lessons which we all should learn, and taught it in such a natural, simple way, that no one could forget it. It was a bleak, snowy day; the train was late; the ladies' room dark and smoky, and the dozen women, old and young, who sat waiting impatiently, all looked cross, low-spirited or stupid. I felt all three; and thought, as I looked around, that my fellow-beings were a very unamiable and uninteresting set.

Just then, a forlorn old woman, shaking with palsy, came in with a basket of little wares for sale, and went about mutely offering them to the sitters. Nobody bought anything, and the poor old soul stood blinking at the door a minute, as if reluctant to go out into the bitter storm again. She turned presently, and poked about the room, as if trying to find something; and then a pale lady in black, who lay as if asleep, on a sofa, opened her eyes, saw the old woman, and instantly asked in a kind tone, "Have you lost anything, ma'am?"

"No, dear. I'm looking for the heatin' place, to have a warm 'fore I goes out agin. My eyes is poor, and I don't seem to find the furnace nowheres."

"Here it is;" and the lady led her to the steam radiator, placed a chair, and showed her how to warm her feet.

"Well, now; ain't that nice?" said the old woman, spreading her ragged mittens to dry. "Thanky, dear; this is proper comfortable, ain't it? I'm most froze to-day, bein' lame and wimbly; and not selling much makes me sort of down-hearted."

The lady smiled, went to the counter, bought a cup of tea and some sort of food, carried it herself to the old woman, and said, as respectfully and kindly as if the poor old soul had been dressed in silk and fur, "Won't you have a cup of hot tea? It's very comforting such a day as this."

"Sakes alive? Do they give tea to this depot?" cried the old lady, in a tone of innocent surprise, that made a smile go round the room, touching the glummest face like a streak of sunshine. "Well, now, this is jest lovely," added the old lady, sipping away with a relish. "That does warm the cockles of my heart."

While she refreshed herself, telling her story meanwhile, the lady looked over the poor little wares in the basket, bought soap and pins, shoe-strings and tape, and cheered the old soul by paying well for them.

As I watched her doing this, I thought what a sweet face she had, though I'd considered her rather plain before. I felt dreadfully ashamed of myself, that I had grimly shaken my head when the basket was offered to me; and as I saw a look of interest, sympathy and kindliness come into the dismal faces around me, I did wish that I had been the magician to call it out. It was only a kind word and a friendly act; but, somehow, it brightened that dingy room wonderfully. It changed the faces of a dozen women; and I think it touched a dozen hearts, for I saw many eyes follow the plain, pale lady with sudden respect; and when the old woman, with many thanks, got up to go, several persons beckoned to her, and bought something, as if they wanted to repair their negligence.

Old beggar-women are not romantic; neither are cups of tea, boot-lacings and colored soap; there were no gentlemen present to be impressed by the lady's kind act; so it wasn't done for effect, and no possible reward could be received for it, except the ungrammatical thanks of a ragged old woman. But that simple little charity was as good as a sermon to those who saw it; and I think each traveller went on her way better for that half-hour in the dreary station. I can testify that one of them did; and nothing but the emptiness of her purse prevented her from "comforting the cockles of the heart" of every forlorn old woman she met for a week after.—Merry's Museum.

SIGHTS IN THE MORMON THEATRE.

BRIGHAM YOUNG owns a theatre, which cost, it is said, $200,000, and which has yielded a large revenue. It is a well-built edifice, nearly as large as the Boston theatre, with parquet and circle, dress circle, family circle and gallery. Gentiles are consigned to the dress circle, though saints also sit there.

Climbing a narrow stairway, we find ourselves in the dress circle, occupying a front seat, giving us a good position to study the audience. We are not there to see the play, but the people. The curtain is still down and the audience are taking their seats. The parquet is arranged with slips like those in a church. At the right hand side in the parquet circle is Brigham's family pew—distinguished from all other seats by its red plush or damask upholstery.

In the right hand aisle of the parquet is a rocking-chair which Brigham sometimes occupies, when he wishes to be on a familiar footing with the saints.

At our right hand is a woman with a baby in her arms, three other children by her side. Behind us are three roystering fellows, from the mines of Montana, ogling the girls in the parquet. They are Gentile wolves. Elder Williams cautioned the girls last Sunday to beware of those which came in sheep's clothing to lead them away from the church and down to perdition. These wolves do sometimes carry off the fairest lambs of the flock. Some of the girls prefer the undivided love of a hardy, good-looking young Gentile to the fortieth or fiftieth part of a withered old Apostle.

Two seats distant is another baby. The mother is wrinkled and careworn. We can see lines of care and suffering across her forehead, and in her sunken cheeks, as if Time had been turning deep furrows and his ploughshare had gone down into the subsoil and had cut the heart-strings. Not hers alone. We see the same joyless cast of countenance on every female face. Artists, who with pen and pencil paint character—who can read the joys and sorrows of life in the lines of the human face—should come to Salt Lake City. They would find it one vast studio—every woman a subject. "Dead Affections" would be an appropriate title to their pictures. Stifled, rather. These women never have known what it is to love or to be loved. They know only sacrifice. They are slaves—in bondage to the church and to the devil at the same time. They are ground to powder between two mighty mill-stones—the upper one a religious idea, the lower one the lewdness and lust of hard-hearted men. Heaven and hell together are brought into action, crushing out human affections and the highest and holiest instincts of the soul.

The priests of Buddha, in China, in one of their delineations of the damned, have accurately portrayed the condition of these women of Salt Lake. I remember a scene in a temple at Canton—a mill in which human souls were ground up—a slow, steady turning of the stone. The soul went in head foremost. Down below there was a trickling stream of blood and brains. It is so here. Intellect, joy, happiness, hope, peace, brains, and hearts, are ground slowly out in this infernal mill.

But there is the man who runs the mill—the head of the church—President and Revelator—in the private box by the side of the stage. He is portly, his hair is nicely brushed. He wears a white vest, black broadcloth coat, kid gloves, puts an opera-glass to his eyes and looks over to the gallery containing us Gentiles, to see who is there. He has a broad forehead, large nose, and whiskers turning white. Ability, decision, duplicity, shrewdness, cunning—the good and bad elements of character are plainly marked in his countenance. Apostle Wells, a tall, thin, spare man, nearly as old as Brigham, is by his side.

In Brigham's family circle we see two of his concubines and twenty-two of his children—all but three of them girls. One of the women is past the prime of life—plain countenance, plainly dressed. She is sad—sad when others laugh. The play is the Somnambulist, but the comic scenes which set the crowd a laughing bring no smile to her face.

At the end of the seat is one of the favorite concubines—a woman of thirty, pale, thoughtful, with an intellectual cast of countenance, with a book in hand which she reads between the scenes. She has large lustrous eyes, dark brown hair, jewels on her fingers, and a mother-of-pearl opera-glass in her hand. She is elegantly dressed—wears a costly fine cape. Did I not know that they were Brigham's concubines, I should set them down as teachers of a girl's boarding school, who had come with their classes to enjoy the evening.

It is a motley audience—saints, sinners and Indians. Far up in the gallery I see three of the Ute tribe, in moccasins and blanket, gazing with imperturbable gravity upon the scene.

Brigham looks upon the audience most of the time—turning his attention to the stage only when something especially attractive or laughable occurs. He talks with Brother Wells, takes a knife from his pocket, pares an apple, which he slowly munches. He has the appearance of a man not well acquainted with the usages of good society, but who is well off in the world, independent of everybody, and who for the remainder of his life is going to take things easy and have everything his own way.—CARLETON, in the Boston Journal.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS: with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none, therefore, fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—" the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

"IS SAUL ALSO AMONG THE PROPHETS?"

CERTAIN events create surprise. Saul the son of Kish was a very singular man, and not very likely to be numbered among the eminent worthies of Israel; but Samuel, the Lord's prophet, was directed to anoint him king while he was looking after his "father's asses," which were lost. This was a most singular circumstance; but his heart was so changed in this event, that after leaving Samuel, it is said, "a company of prophets met him; and the Spirit of God came upon him, and he prophesied among them: and it came to pass, when all that knew him aforetime saw that behold he prophesied among the prophets, then the people said one to another, what is this that has come unto the son of Kish? Is Saul also among the prophets?" 1 Saml. x., 9–11.

Little less surprise do many feel at the fact that the "New York (Sunday) Herald," the paper of James Gordon Bennett, should have its columns open, soliciting "Light on Religious Matters," from whatever quarter it may come; and for the first time in the history of the Life Views, this city has witnessed the spectacle of a secular paper—or a religious paper either, outside of the HERALD OF LIFE—giving place to a defence of our views, or giving anything like an honest representation of them. Almost like a resurrection from the dead did it appear to our friends to see in the "N. Y. Herald," Sunday, May 23d, the following article, which of course has been read by thousands to whom we have had no access. The author is unknown to us, but our views are evidently not unknown to him. Le him write on so long as he can have access to such an organ; and we thank James Gordon Bennett for so generously giving place to such "Light on Religious Matters." If the Balaams of this age cannot or will not speak out for God and truth, let "Bennett's Herald" have the honor. The following is the article:

"LET THERE BE LIGHT" ON RELIGIOUS MATTERS.

To the Editor of the Herald:

Having seen an article in the HERALD entitled "More Light Wanted" on spiritual matters, I would answer the same through your paper, it being the medium of light to the public, by asking the question where shall we go to get the light? Shall we go to man, shall we go to the preachers of the day, or shall we go to Him who said "let there be light and there was light?" Gen. i., 3. If he brought forth light for the natural world will he not give light to the spiritual? Is not His word as immutable as when he said by His Son "I am the light of the world?" John viii., 12. And if His Son be the light of the world, that must be the source to which we must go. Is it not true also that he said "I am the way, the truth, the life?" John xiv., 6. It follows, then, that He is the way by which we can get the truth and life; and if we are to get life through Him, have we it within ourselves? He also says, "The flesh profiteth nothing; it is the spirit that quickeneth. My words are spirit and they are life." John vi., 63. He says again, "Except ye eat My flesh and drink My blood ye have no life in you: he that eateth My flesh and drinketh My blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi., 53, 54. If this be part of the light He sent into the world, how dark must be the teachings of those that say to man "You have eternal life; every man, woman and child born of Adam;" thereby making a direct contradiction to the word of God and making it of none effect by their traditions. They forget the record that God gave of His Son And this is the record that God hath given to us—eternal life; and this life is in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. 1 John v., 11, 12. They forget also what Moses said in giving the law to Israel: "Behold I set before you this day life and death, good and evil; choose which you will. Deut. xxx., 19. Did Christ come to do away with the law? No; but said that not one jot or tittle of the law shall pass, till all be fulfilled. Matth. iii., 18. The apostle Paul said he taught none other things than Moses and the prophets did say should come. Acts xxvi., 22. Now, if life and death be taught in the Scriptures, and life is to be gotten through Christ, how say our preachers that we all have an eternal life that must live in happiness or misery forever? Is not this contradictory? Which shall we believe, God or man? I prefer to believe the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever. 1 Peter i., 23. Some say that life means happiness and death means misery. Very singular, to be sure, to say if one man kills another, oh, he is not dead, he is only in misery. Would the law be satisfied with such an excuse, and will God be satisfied with such teachers of His word? Did God say to Adam, in the day thou eatest thou shalt surely die, Gen. ii., 17, or did He say he should go into eternal misery? No; death was the penalty. Now what did Adam transmit to his posterity—anything more than what he had himself? I answer no. What law, then, does Adam's posterity come under? Paul says, "Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin, so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." It follows, then, that the law that Adam's posterity is under is one of death. Now, has God porvided any means whereby man can obtain eternal life? The word of God says yes; through His Son, who came to bring life and immortality to light by the Gospel. 2 Tim. i., 12. This Gospel was first preached to Adam and Eve in the saying, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Gen. iii., 15. It was also preached by Noah before the flood, but none of that generation gave heed to it, so the waters came and destroyed them all. Noah went into the ark a type of Christ, and was saved, because he had prepared it as God had told him. The apostle says that there is no other name given under heaven whereby men can be saved but by the name of Jesus Christ. The question now arises. How shall we get into Christ? The apostle says, As many of you as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ; and if ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs, according to the promise. Gal. iii., 27 29. What was the promise made to Abraham? He told him that he would give him a certain tract of land, Gen. xiii., 14 17—told him to walk through the length and breadth of it; gave him the boundaries of it—Gen. xv., 18—and said: To thee and thy seed will I give this land forever. He said not to seeds, as of many, but of one, which is Christ. Gal. iii., 16. Stephen said that Abraham never had so much as to set foot upon. Acts vii., 5. He reiterated the same promises to Isaac and Jacob; and Paul says that it was for the hope of the promises made to the fathers that he was judged, Acts xxvi., 6. Should a Christian believe in the promises made by God? Should they have the same hope that Paul did, and he says there is one hope, one faith, one baptism. Eph. iv., 4, 5? Paul had faith in them, Abraham had faith in them, and it was accounted to him for righteousness. But is this the faith and hope of the present day? No! They will tell you that man has an immortal soul, (the definition of which I heard a learned D. D. say, a few weeks ago, was an immaterial substance which is nothing at all) which goes to heaven at death; and this in the face of what Christ tells his disciples, that he should go to the Father, but whither I go ye cannot come. John xiii., 33. But if I go I will come again that where I am ye may be also. John xiv., 3. Paul also says of Christ That He is King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality dwelling in the light which no man hath seen nor can ee nor can approach unto, 1 Timothy vi., 15, 16. In the face of this testimony they will tell us that they go right to heaven at death; and this is the light we get from them. Christ truly said if the blind lead the blind they will both fall into the ditch. One might ask how can you inherit the promises if we have no immortality? I answer by a resurrection from the dead through Jesus Christ our Lord: for Paul says as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order, Christ the first fruits then they that are Christ's at his coming; Cor. xv., 22, 23. Paul further says: Some man will say how are the dead raised up and with what bodies do they come, 1 Cor. xv., 35–44. And goes on to show that there is a natural body and there is a spiritual body. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual. 1 Corth. xv., 46, 47: "The first man Adam is of the earth earthy; the second man is the Lord from heaven." This shows that our father Adam was of the earth earthy, and therefore the penalty that God put on him for his sin in saying, "dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return" is a literal fact, for he was not spiritual in any manner. One might ask what is a spiritual body? I answer Christ was after his resurrection, for he was raised from the dead by the Spirit of God; he said himself that he was flesh and bones. Luke xxiv., 39: "For flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God," John iii., 5, and I Corth. xv., 50: The life of his body was the Spirit of God, the blood was before his death: as it is with us now. And he shed his blood for the redemption of the world for, He was made like unto his brethren in all things, (yet without sin), that he might be a merciful high priest in things pertaining to God"—Hebrews ii., 17. Paul says: "Behold, I show you a mystery, we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible and we shall be changed; for this corruptible must put on incorruption and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying, Death is swallowed up in victory" —1 Corth. xv., 51–54. Thus we see that man can get a victory over the curse pronounced on Adam, through Jesus Christ our Lord, by a resurrection from the dead. Nowhere in the Scripture do we find such expressions as "immortal soul," "never-dying spirit." God always speaks to man as an organized and intelligent being, and has given him laws and commands to follow. If God said to Adam he should die, should not the thing that was lost be the thing to be saved? and did not Christ come to redeem man from the power of death? Immortality is always spoken of in the Scriptures in connection with the body, and men can see by searching them how grossly they have been deceived and led astray by the teachers of the day who teach the same doctrine that the serpent taught Eve, in saying "Thou shalt not surely die." Gen. iii., 4. Let men give heed unto the word of God which is able to make them wise unto salvation. And Peter says of it, "We have a sure word of prophecy whereunto ye do well to give heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place." 2 Peter i., 19. But I will close, hoping that the inquirer may learn to look for the light at its proper source —that is, the word of God.

IN WHAT SENSE DID CHRIST BECOME POOR?

"For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty . . . might be rich." —1 Corth. viii., 9.

IN what did the riches of Jesus Christ consist, and how did he become poor? In the first place, I have no faith in the belief of the learned theologians that the riches of Jesus Christ consisted in the inheritance which he possessed in heaven with the Father, before he came into the world. I can find no such doctrine taught in the Old Testament Scriptures. I wish to look at the facts as they present themselves to us in the word of God.

There are two lines of prophecies or promises running through the Scriptures, to which we do well to take heed. The Jews looked at one, and ignored the other, as we find by the language of the disciples, when Jesus met them after his resurrection: "But we hoped that it was he who was about to redeem Israel." Luke xxiv., 21. Jesus replied to them, "O, inconsiderate men, and slow of heart to believe all the prophets have spoken, was it not necessary for the Messiah to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?"

Here we have the attention of his disciples called to a fact that they had overlooked, viz., the sufferings of Christ; or, in other words, his poverty. We will look at a few of these prophecies, and see if there is not some excuse for the Jew.

David is promised a seed: "He shall build me an house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee: thy throne shall be established for ever." 2 Sam'l vii.

All will admit this language is too strong for David's son, Solomon; hence we refer it to the Messiah. Again we call attention to Psalm lxxii.: "He shall judge the poor of the people . . . . and shall break in pieces the oppressor; they shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations. He shall have dominion, also, from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth . . . Yea, all kings shall fall down before him, all nations shall serve him . . . And he shall live." No wonder the Jews were astonished when Jesus said to them, "And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me." The people answered him, "We have heard out of the law that Christ abideth forever: and how sayest thou the Son of man must be lifted up? who is this Son of man?" John xii., 34. No wonder they were astonished to hear such words when they knew such strong language existed, "And he shall live, and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba. His name shall endure forever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun; and men shall be blessed in him, all nations shall call him blessed.

No wonder the Jews, and even the disciples, were astonished when they heard Jesus talking of death. Their Messiah was to be rich and powerful; and he was to live and his name was to endure forever. And who is claiming to be David's son, the royal heir in whom all the prophecies centre? and he talking about death! Our Christ abideth forever. With their understanding of the prophecies, well might they wag their heads, when they saw the inscription "King of the Jews." "And he shall break in pieces the oppressor. Yea, all kings shall fall down and worship him." And yet find him in the grasp of the oppressor, and nailed to the cross! Are there not some mitigating circumstances for the Jew?

On the other hand, we find a line of prophecies speaking on this wise, "he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him. He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows . . . and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off out of the lands of the living . . . And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death." Isaiah liii.

Now how was the Jew to reconcile these conflicting statements? They were looking for the Messiah to come in all his glory; and because he did not so come, they despised him and so fulfilled the second statement.

When Jesus asked the Pharisees, "What think ye of Christ? whose son is he? They say unto him, The Son of David." Matth. xxii., 41, 42. Here the acknowledgment is made that Jesus is the Son of David. Then he was entitled to the throne of David. There was no dispute in the time John came preaching, and the burthen of his message was, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. Matth. iii. 2. Jesus came making the same proclamation, saying, "The time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand; repent ye and believe the gospel." Mark i., 15. Christ's devil or adversary understood all this when he showed him all the kingdoms of the world, and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. Matth. iv., 8, 9. The apostle says he was in all points tempted like as we are, without sin. Heb. iv., 15. Now Jesus was learned in the Scriptures, and he knew it was written of him, "He shall have dominion from the river to the ends of the earth: yea, all kings shall fall down before me; all nations shall serve me. Yea, I shall live (and not see death), and to me shall be given the gold of Sheba."

We can fancy for a moment the sore trial under which Jesus was placed, and in the moment of his extreme agony all these Scriptures present themselves to his mind—"I am Abraham's seed, and to me belong the promises; I am David's royal Son, and to me belongs the throne, and God did promise to give it me; why then should I be the subject of these strong temptations? Why should I be the subject of death? when God has said by the mouth of the Psalmist I shall live; and when all the people understand this to mean, when the Christ shall come he abideth forever. Am I not rich? Rich in the promise of God to Abraham, rich in the kingdom which I inherit from my father David, and which God has promised to give me? I have the promise that I shall live. No man taketh my life, "I lay down my life for the sheep . . . therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life that I might take it again. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself; I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again; this commandment have I received from my Father." John x. Jesus had power and the right to live according to the law and the promise of God. But he resigned his right to live, and his right to all the riches God had in store for him. And what was the sacrifice for? That his sheep might live. God first made the sacrifice: "For God so loved the world that he gave up his only begotten Son (the only one who was ever found to obey him in all things), that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting life." And Jesus, who was rich, for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might become rich. Yours, JACOB GRIM.

DEVILS, DEMONS, ETC.

"We now proceed to the third head of discourse, under which we are to consider what is really the truth, or what idea we ought to form of those unhappy persons, who in the New Testament are spoken of as having 'an unclean spirit.'

"Here I certainly intend to speak my mind freely, and to show plainly what appears to me to be the truth. Nevertheless, I am under little or no apprehension of giving offence; partly, because I think I can rely on the candor of those who hear me; partly, because I do not desire to impose a particular sentiment upon any. All are at liberty to judge for themselves, when they have heard and considered what may be said on one side or another. For no one opinion concerning these cases is like those articles of faith: that Jesus is the Christ, that he lived and died in Judea, and rose again, and ascended into heaven, and will come again to judge men according to their works. . . .

"Whether the indispositions that these persons labored under were owing to the influence of evil spirits or not, the cure of them was miraculous. Nor is the miracle at all lessened, by supposing them to be only grievous and long-continued bodily distempers. The rectifying the human frame, all on a sudden, which had been before greatly disordered, is at least as great a work, as commanding an evil spirit to leave the body, or any other particular place. . . .

"The opinions of modern interpreters, and other Christians, concerning the case of those who are spoken of as having unclean spirits, you may remember were these two; one more generally received, which allows that they were real possessions: the other less common, that they were mere bodily diseases and indispositions; though it was then the prevailing opinion, that those disorders were caused by evil spirits. And those persons, and their friends, attributing these disorders to Satan, and demons under him, our Saviour often adapts his expressions to that opinion, without countenancing or approving of it.

"That this last-mentioned is the more just and probable account of these cases, may appear from several considerations, which I shall now propound to you.

"1. It having been in those times a very common opinion, that there were many evil spirits in the region of the air, it is not at all strange that many people should live under apprehensions of suffering from them.

"And many might be induced to ascribe to such spirits and to their power and influence, several indispositions and other calamities that befel them. Moreover some persons of a speculative and philosophical temper might think it best to cherish this opinion among the people, with a view to subserve divers ends and purposes which they deemed innocent and useful: one of which might be promoting the belief of the existence of spirits or invisible beings. Some there were, as the Sadducees among the Jews, who denied the existence of angels, and the souls of men after death. The Pharisees therefore, and some others, might lay hold of and encourage the notion that many bodily disorders were owing to evil spirits, the better to secure the persuasion of their real existence. For effects cannot be without causes. If such affecting disorders proceeded from spirits, they have a being, though they are not visible.

"This therefore may in some measure help us to account for the prevalence of this opinion, though it had no good foundation.

"2. I observe, secondly, that the chief foundation of the opinion may be called in question.

"By the principal foundation of this opinion, I mean the supposition of the liberty of evil spirits, either bad angels, or others, to rove about near this earth, in the region of the air . . . I perceive not any clear evidence of the permission of such numbers of evil angels to act upon this earth, as the common opinion supposes.

"But if by demons be meant other evil spirits, different from fallen angels, then the supposition of their liberty seems to be altogether without foundation. In Isa. lxiii., 16, the Jewish people are introduced by the prophet owning, that "Abraham was ignorant of them and that Israel did not acknowledge them. If good men are not allowed after death to concern themselves in the affairs of this world, not so much as of their own descendants, how can it be reasonable to think that bad men are permitted after death to concern themselves in our affairs, for injuring and tormenting us?

"3. Allowing evil spirits the liberty just mentioned, and also the power of inflicting some evils on men, it does not follow that ever there were any possessions, in the strict and gross sense of the word; that is, evil spirits actuating and inhabiting the bodies of living men upon this earth.

"4. It does not appear that the common opinion of possessions has any support and countenance in the Old Testament.

"And it is not unreasonable to conclude . . . that the notion of possessions was received by the Jews from the Chaldean or Greek philosophers, after the shutting up of the canon of the Old Testament by the ancient prophets.

"5. We find not any instances of possessions by good angels, or other good spirits. Why then should possessions by evil spirits be allowed of? Can it be reasonable to suppose, that Divine Providence would permit evil spirits to have more powers to do evil, than others have to do good. . . .

"6. Possession by evil spirits is a thing in itself absurd and impossible, at the least unreasonable and improbable, and not to be supposed, unless there be clear and full proof of it, which I think there is not. . . .

"7. Real possessions seem inconsistent with the goodness of God.

"I say, it seems to be inconsistent with the wisdom and goodness of the Divine government to allow of possessions, in the gross meaning of the word. If, indeed, there were any clear and undeniable evidences of such a thing, we should be willing to do our best to reconcile it to wisdom and goodness. But as there is not, that I know of, any clear and undoubted evidence of this fact, and the thing appears to be very strange and shocking, I apprehend we may say it appears to be inconsistent with the wisdom and goodness of God.

"For let any man think with himself, if it be not a strange and hard case, for a man to be put into the power of evil spirits: or for apostate angels, or other impure and wicked spirits, one or more of them, to be allowed to take possession of him, and to tease and torment him as they see fit. Is this suited to that state of trial in which we now are? Such unhappy persons, it is true, are not cast into hell, nor fixed in a state of damnation. But apostate angels, or other infernal spirits, are supposed to be permitted to come to him, seize on him, torment and distress him, and that for many years together.

"Is this a supposition that should be easily made or allowed of? Can we fairly reconcile this to the wisdom and equity of the Divine government?

"Besides, from many things said in the gospel, it appears that divers of the persons there spoken of, as 'having evil spirits,' were not the worst of men. Yea, from anything we can perceive, divers of them were honest, virtuous persons. And some had labored under those distempers, commonly ascribed to evil spirits, from their youth, or from childhood, before they can be supposed to have been guilty of great and heinous transgressions. . . .

"8. Another argument against possessions arises from the manner in which the persons said to have unclean spirits speak of our Lord Jesus Christ.

"For such persons did often bear an honorable testimony to our Lord. . . .

"In like manner it is incredible that any unclean spirits should cheerfully bear testimony to Jesus, as the Christ, the Son of God. Therefore that profession, or declaration, did not proceed from such spirits, but from the unhappy diseased persons, who, under their melancholic affections, thought themselves to have demons, in conformity to the prevailing opinion, though they had not.

"This is a much more reasonable way of accounting for this matter, than to suppose that evil spirits openly professed Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of God.

"Indeed this appears to me a very forcible argument; I have been sometimes apt to think that this consideration has been overlooked by learned and pious men, who have so readily admitted real possessions. . . .

"9. All those persons who are spoken of as having demons, or an unclean spirit, had some bodily indisposition. Nor does it appear clearly from their history that there was anything beside such indisposition.

"That all these people had some bodily indisposition is manifest, and cannot be denied by any. Some labored under distraction, as the men in the country of the Gadarenes; others had other disorders. St. Peter, Acts x., 38, gives this general account of our Lord's miraculous works: 'Who went about doing good, and HEALING all that were oppressed of the devil.' Therefore, they who were supposed to be under the oppression of Satan, had distempers which our Lord healed. Observable are the words of St. Matthew, iv., 24, 'And his fame went throughout all Syria, and they brought unto him all sick people, that were taken with divers diseases, and torments, and those which were possessed of demons,' or demoniacs, and 'those that were lunatic, and those that had the palsy, and he HEALED them.'

"These persons, therefore, are reckoned up among other sick people, and they are said to be 'healed,' or 'cured,' by the Lord Jesus, when brought to him.

"10. There were some in ancient times, who were of opinion, that those called demoniacs were diseased only."

In our next we will quote Dr. Lardner's answers to objections urged against his views.

GREET MARY.

BY PHEBE PALMER.

MARY was a good housekeeper. At least so we have reason to infer. By general consent Paul has been classed among the bachelors. He did not lead about either wife nor sister, as some of his more highly favored fellow-helpers. Not but that he had a right to, as other of the Apostles, and as Cephas, and the brethren of our Lord. But he waived the right.

He was a bachelor quite beyond life's meridian, and that he had neither wife, sister, or daughter, was not because his affectionate heart did not prize such companionship and help, but because there was a needs be. Christianity was in its infancy and its poverty. And Paul was all-absorbingly in love with Christ and his cause, and it was by the constrainings of this love, that he gave himself up to be a homeless "single man."

And who can tell to how many inconveniences he was subjected? But he had a friend, and her name was Mary. Though not a sister in the flesh, yet having been begotten with him in the bowels of Christ, she was a sister-spirit.

And who was this Mary? We know not, only that we may infer that she was a kind-hearted, thoughtful, laborious sister in the Church, who "bestowed much labor" on the devoted, self-sacrificing Paul. She may have bestowed this labor amid much weariness. She might have been surrounded by a large family and had many household cares, making ceaseless exactings on her time and energies. But however that might have been, she was hospitable.

How many seem unmindful that to use hospitality without grudging, is a divinely enjoined duty. But Mary was mindful to entertain strangers. And what an angel of love and goodness did she entertain, when she received Paul to her house and bestowed so much willing labor upon him. Paul being a single man of course needed something more done than that a table should be spread for him. During his two years' stay in Rome, he needed that some one should have an eye to his wardrobe, etc.

Well, we do not know just what good Mary did, only that we are quite sure that there must have been many nameless, loving assiduities on the part of this good sister, or Paul, in writing his beautiful, dignified letter to the Church of Rome, would not have said, "Greet Mary, who bestowed much labor on us."

Little did Mary imagine, while engaged in much labor during Paul's visit, that more than an angel pen was taking note of her humble toil. Yet so it was. The book of her life was being written. The humble service performed for Paul was more than a cup of cold water. So God caused it to be written in His Book. And surely as the Word of the Lord endureth forever, so surely will the service Mary performed for Paul be had in everlasting remembrance.

Toiling one; called to the performance of much service, remember that the great Master of the household has said, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto Me."—Zion's Herald.

The Watchers.

The joy felt in heaven for the rescue of a single soul is something higher than we have any conception of. A faint idea of this was conveyed to me by a friend in Scotland, who had witnessed a deeply interesting scene in one of its bays.

In a dark wild night a small fishing-boat was expected back; there was no lighthouse to guard its course; the wind howled, the storm raged, and the surf dashed madly over the bar of the harbor. Gathered round the bay, on every available spot of ground from whence a glimpse of the boat might be obtained, were all the inhabitants of the hamlet. At first they seemed powerless, but quickly beacon fires were kindled on both sides of the harbor, which was very narrow at its entrance. Fresh fuel was placed on these occasionally; those who fed the fires never flagged, those who watched seemed never weary. An intense and almost breathless suspense held the assembled multitude as, out at sea, might be seen at times a little black spot, now seen for a moment, now again hidden from view in the hollow of the waves. The boat approached nearer the dangerous coast; there was little, very little chance of its escape. Expectation was strained to the utmost when the boat appeared on the crest of a wave almost in the harbor. One moment would decide the fate of the brave men who were toiling for life in the midst of the danger, and in the presence of those they loved. It was agony. At last the waves seemed to rise to an immense height, and the boat, which was but a plaything in their giant grasp, was hurled safely into harbor. A woman whose nerves had been strained to the utmost, was standing beside my friend. Now that all was safe, she uttered the cry, "He is saved! he is saved!" and fainted away. It was a wife's cry.

We are but at best as the watchers on that bay; we may indeed light the fires, and give some intimation to those who are in danger of perishing where there is safety for them, even in the love of Jesus the Saviour. When, through our instrumentality a soul is saved, the joy to us ought to be great, but it is far greater in heaven.

Mission Work.

This week I close my labors at the Herald of Life office, to enter once more into mission labors among the poor and needy of Philadelphia. For months past I have earnestly desired to return to that work; in fact, I have been homesick much of the time concerning it. My stay with Bro. Storrs, so far as Christian fellowship is concerned, has been very pleasant, but duty leads me among the afflicted and poor.

Some deprecate the step that I am about to take, but the question of duty must be settled between ourselves and the Lord. The course for me to pursue is plain, and I go forward, trusting in the Lord for wisdom and grace to keep me.

There is work enough for me to do in the garrets and cellars, enough to keep me exceedingly busy until Jesus comes. I hope in that day to see many in his kingdom whom the Lord may have been pleased to make me the instrument of leading to Christ. My richest and happiest experience has been in the abodes of poverty and distress. I would not ask for a better location than a shed or shanty of some poor rich saint, from which to rise to meet my Lord at his coming.

Pray for me, your affectionate brother in Christ,

F. H. Burbank.

P. S. My future address will be 214 Marion St., Philadelphia, Pa.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, JUNE 2, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Tent Meetings.

The time has arrived when Life Believers should put forth an effort to spread the faith and truth abroad by means of Tent Meetings. Br. E. Wolcott, some two years since, got up one of the finest tents in the country; all at his own expense. For two summers he has pitched it in various places, and borne the chief expense of the meetings himself. His health has failed, and we fear unless something is done by our friends, generally, to sustain this work, the Tent will have to lie idle, and the benefit resulting from its judicious use will be lost.

There has been a noble work done in scattering tracts on the Life theme during the last twelve months: let that work be continued and increased; but to make it still more efficient, let us send out the Tent, with men to preach whose hearts are in the work, and who will use their influence to extend the circulation of the Herald of Life and the tracts furnished from this office. If this work is taken hold of now, and prosecuted with energy, we shall not fail to see a harvest that will surprise even our enemies and gladden the hearts of our friends.

For this purpose the men must be found who are willing to give themselves wholly to the work; and means must be raised to sustain them in it. Who has money which they wish to dedicate to the Lord for this work? Speak at once and tell us what you will do. The time has come to start these Tent Meetings, and it must be done.

Shall we not raise and expend at least one thousand dollars on the Tent and Tract enterprise before our next anniversary in August? We think we can and should. Let us come up to the work at once.

"A Man of Straw."

Our article under the above head, May 12, seems to have been what the orthodox "Advent Herald" of Boston, Mass., "expected;" for he gives us nearly a column in return, headed "As we Expected." Our Br. Editor quotes the following paragraph from our article:

"Now that our Br. Editor, in Boston, has abandoned that anti-scriptural phrase, immortal soul, and found it to be 'like a man of straw,' we hope he may also abandon the fruit of this poisonous deception, and come back to the Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the dead at the last day; and teach his readers and correspondents that, 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day.' John vi., 53, 54."

On this, our "orthodox" Br. begins his remarks thus:

> We have no intention of being drawn into a newspaper war with this New York editor on "the life and death question," but a few words on the above may not be out of place.
> We were taught in our school boy days that "abandon" signifies "to give up, to forsake;" but as one cannot "give up" what he never held, nor "forsake" what he never possessed, and as we have never since we entered the ministry nor before it, to our recollection, been in the habit of using the phrase "immortal soul," of course we have not "abandoned" its use. Brn. Litch and Bliss—the former editors of the Herald—though holding with us to the conscious state of the departed, were no more accustomed to write about the "immortal soul," than we are. We would as soon think of using the phrase "mortal soul," or "mortal spirit," neither of which is found in the Bible.

We have no wish to draw our Br. "into a newspaper war." If he never used the phrase "immortal soul," will he say he never does and never did use the phrases "undying soul," or "deathless spirit," and the like? Will he say that himself, "Brn. Bliss and Litch" never used these phrases, and that neither of them used them or similar phrases expressive of the deathless nature of what they call the soul or spirit?

If they have, do they not place themselves among what is everywhere understood to be believers in inherent immortality? If so, why is it they have rejected the use of a phrase which all Christendom understands to mean simply unending existence, or deathlessness? All men use and have used the phrase "immortal" to signify, "Not mortal; that can never die; exempt from death; deathless; undying; imperishable," etc.; yet these Brethren Bliss, Litch, and Orrock, who are or have been editors of the "Advent Herald" never use the phrase "immortal soul;" it is "like a man of straw" to them. They all maintain the thing which the phrase expresses, but for some reason or other they reject the language. Why is this, when all other "orthodoxists" use it, and the English language warrants such use of the phrase? There must be a reason why the three Brn. above-named have stigmatized the phrase as "like a man of straw." That reason we shall notice presently; but we wish to ask the Br. in Boston a question first: Were you "taught in our [your] school boy days that" the term "immortal" had any other meaning than that now in common use? If so, will you tell us who first introduced its present use? If it had no other sense in your "school boy days," why have Brn. Bliss, Litch, and yourself rejected its use when connected with the soul, seeing they all do and have maintained the thing which the phrase is understood to signify in all theological language? We do not know the age of the present editor of the "Advent Herald," Br. Orrock, and never saw him that we know of; but Brn. Bliss and Litch we knew well, and know when and why they "abandoned"—yes, abandoned—the phrase "immortal soul;" they were driven to it in our controversy with them on the Life theme as early as 1844. They could not stand in the conflict without such abandonment; and they plunged headlong into a new and unknown definition of the term immortal to escape the conclusions urged against them.

Early in 1844 Br. Litch came out in his "Anti-Annihilationist," with the abandonment of the idea that the wicked are immortal, still maintaining their eternal existence, and we met him in the April issue of our Bible Examiner by a Dialogue, which we will reproduce for the information of Br. Orrock and those who have followed in Brn. Bliss' and Litch's new definition of the term immortal.

That dialogue is the following:

The Wicked not Immortal.

BR. LITCH, A CONVERT.

S.—Happy to meet you again, brother L. You seem determined to change the issue on subjects presented in the "Bible Examiner." You give up the old doctrine that "the soul is immortal."

L.—I repudiate the use of the term in this discussion. There is being, and conscious being, without immortality. For instance, all men are mortal, but yet all men living on earth have being, and conscious being.—"Anti," p. 23.

S.—Happy to have you admit so much, brother; we are agreed so far, "all men are mortal;" but to make out what you attempt, from that position, you must prove that "all men living on earth" will have eternal being on earth; if you admit they will cease to live on earth, you will be compelled, in spite of yourself, to admit, at least, the possibility of their ceasing to exist anywhere.

L.—God alone hath immortality. 1 Tim. vi., 16.—"Anti," p. 23.

S.—Very true, brother. I am glad the light shines so clear on your mind. "As God alone hath immortality," no one else can have it unless he is pleased to impart it to them.

L.—Will you say, God has promised immortality to the saints?—"Anti," p. 23.

S.—Certainly—and you believe it is even so, do you not?

L.—True, but has he to the angels?—"Anti," p. 23.

S.—I shall not attempt, now, to determine that question, for I see you are determined every step we go to draw me aside from the point at issue. But suppose I say, "they have it already," as you would have me say?

L.—I reply, then you contradict the apostle, who says God alone hath it.—"Anti," p. 23.

S.—Suppose I should say, I love brother Litch, for he is good—Would you, or any of your friends reply—"You contradict Jesus Christ, who says, Mark x., 17, 'There is none good but one, that is God?'" Would you not say, There is none whose goodness is of themselves, but God—all the good in any created being is derived, not inherent; but, nevertheless, there are men that are good, for "The steps of a good man are ordered of the Lord." Psa. xxxvii., 23. And "Joseph was a good man," etc. Luke xxiii., 50. Also, "Barnabas was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost." Acts xi., 24. If God can impart goodness to his creatures, can he not also immortality? I do not think angels were immortal at their creation: if they were the devil could never be destroyed; but I think the "angels who kept"—"their first estate" (see Jude 6,) have been, or will be, made immortal—that God "will impart it to them."

L.—Give me the evidence from God's word, and I will believe it.—"Anti," p. 23, 24.

S.—Just as well might you ask me to give you evidence that all the holy angels will not turn devils. Suppose I were to put that question on the same ground you have their immortality? "Give me the evidence from God's word" that they will not all turn rebels.

L.—But, perhaps you will say, eternal life is immortality. Proof. Give us proof. "God only hath immortality."—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—True; but does it therefore follow that no one else will ever be immortal?

L.—When the saints receive God's Spirit, by its indwelling energy they will be God's children, begotten and born of him, and of course they will be partakers of his nature. Then this mortal shall put on immortality. 1 Cor. xv., 53.—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—Then somebody else will have immortality besides God, and your whole argument to avoid the true issue betwen us falls to the ground.

L.—But the Scriptures nowhere intimate that the angels will ever become God's children, and thus partake of his own nature, having God's Spirit in them as a vital medium. Yet they have being, and conscious being. And who doubts they will have it as long as the saints do?—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—"Who doubts" it? You must doubt it if you are consistent. "Give me the evidence from God's word" that angels will have "conscious being as long as saints do?" "Proof. Give us proof," brother? By the way—will you not give also a little proof that "the Scriptures nowhere intimate that the angels will ever become God's children," etc. Is it found in the words of our Lord, Luke xx., 36, where he says, the resurrection saints "are equal unto the angels?" Mark, brother—he does not say they are superior, which your argument requires to make your case good. And will you be kind enough to tell us who those "sons of God" were that "shouted for joy" when God "laid the foundations of the earth?" See Job xxxviii., 4–7. We want just a little "proof," brother—no mere opinion will answer from one who demands "proof" as you do.

L.—"Who only hath immortality." The word rendered immortality here is "athanasia," and exhibits the eternity of God's being. That he is in the most absolute sense and alone eternal. He always was, and always will be. It is the opposite of death, and signifies absolute and eternal being, which God alone has.—"Anti," p. 24.

L.—And no other being can have it, except as God imparts himself to them, and dwells in them.—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—Can God impart the "eternity of his being" to created beings, so as to cover the past, and make them "in the most absolute sense eternal?" Perhaps it is because my mind is so dark that I cannot see the light.

L.—Immortality—It is the confusion you introduce by the use of this term which distracts your readers. Why have you never asked, "Have the angels immortality?" It would have at once opened your eyes to the fact that conscious and continued being does not imply immortality."—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—But does not eternal being "imply immortality?" That is the point. Just insert eternal for "continued" in your argument, and the charm of your wonderful discovery is broken. "Conscious and continued being" in "incorruption [aphtharsia,"] must differ marvellously from immortality.

L.—I repeat, then, I repudiate the use of the term in this discussion.—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—I do not wonder at it, brother; it is a self-evident truth that you cannot meet the argument on that ground, hence you must raise a false issue. My inquiry in the "Six Sermons," which you are attempting to review, is, "Are the wicked immortal?" You deny that they are immortal, and close the first number of your "Anti" by saying, "They will neither be raised immortal nor incorruptible!!" Have I not headed this conversation right—"Br. Litch a convert?" You perfectly agree with me on the true point at issue. You have given up the old cry about "immortal souls," so we have no controversy on that point. But I fear you will not settle that question so easily with the believers in endless torments. My time forbids my going much farther, now, into the subject; but I will hear you a moment longer.

S.—I shall not attempt that, brother; nor have I taught it in my "Six Sermons." My position is—that he was a candidate for it—and that by sin he lost all title to it—and that it can only be had through Jesus Christ.

L.—If he had not immortality before he fell, then his being must have had an end if he had never sinned, if your argument is good for anything; for it is, that immortality and annihilation are opposites.—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—Is this Br. Litch, "the Adventist?" "His being must have had an end if he never had sinned!" Though he had not immortality before he sinned, could not his Maker have given it him, as well as he can give it to the saints in the resurrection, at the last day? "Do you not err, not knowing . . . . the power of God?"

L.—But your argument is, that annihilations and immortality are opposites.—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—You still insist on a false issue: find such an argument anywhere in my "Six Sermons," as published in "Bible Examiner," No. 10, you if can. My argument is—If the wicked have not immortality they may cease to have conscious being; and I have attempted to prove that such will be the result in their case.

L.—It will not be expected of me that I should go into the arguments which you have predicated on that false position, that there cannot be conscious being without immortality.—"Anti," p. 24.

S.—The pretended "false position" is of your own fabrication: it does not exist in my Six Sermons. You were obliged to coin a new phrase for eternal being, because, if you had used the phrase eternal being instead of conscious being, your whole argument would have been stripped of its power. Make a man's being eternal, and then deny that he has immortality, would have been quite too barefaced to have passed with common minds. But make the people think that I believe "there cannot be conscious being without immortality," then you can show that I am very absurd in my "position!" Why, Brother Litch, in the name of Christian candor, I ask, Why have you raised this false issue?

Such is the history of the abandonment of the common signification put on the term immortal. Josiah Litch was the father of it, and Sylvester Bliss adopted it. It was invented to combat the doctrine of the liability of men to the extinction of their being, and the Scripture testimony concerning it.

Br. Orrock now says:

> "We would as soon think of using the phrase 'mortal soul,' or 'mortal spirit'—neither of which is found in the Bible," as "immortal soul.'"

Our Br. will find the phrase "mortal man" at least once in the Bible; (see Job iv., 17)' and we suppose that embraces the soul; and the phrase is here used of man as a species—"Shall mortal man be more just than God?" and Paul tells us that some "Professing themselves wise became fools, and changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man." Rom. i., 22, 23.

Thus we have divine and positive testimony that man is "mortal and corruptible," and no exception is made in relation to any part of him. To this same fact the Bible everywhere bears its testimony in no equivocal language. And even the apostle of repudiators—Josiah Litch—has asserted positively that "all men are mortal." See his first reply in the foregoing dialogue.

Where can the "Advent Herald" theorists find one positive testimony that man or man's soul is in possession of endless being or existence? Nowhere; no such language is found in the Book of God; it is purely a human invention.

Our Br. Editor's criticism on the text we gave him, John vi., 53, 54, may receive attention at another time.

The Popular Hell.

The following description gives a vivid idea of the imaginary hell of Christendom. It is taken from "La Journée du Chrétien" by Father Bonhours, a French priest. When will men leave off to blaspheme their Maker by such representations of his administration? We trust real Christians will ere long cease from such shameful work, and teach the truth as it is in Jesus—"God so loved the world," etc. Here follows the description of Christendom's ideal hell:

What horror would hell inspire could we hear the lamentable cries of the damned!

They sigh, they groan, they rage like wild beasts in the midst of the flames!

They accuse themselves of their sins, they weep over them, they detest them, but it is too late!

Their tears only make more ardent the flames that scorch without consuming them!

O! penitence of the lost! how terrible, but how useless thou art!

To be miserable as long as God is God—what misery is that! It is not enough that the torture of the lost be extreme, it must also be endless. A pin's prick is only a little pain, and yet if it endured forever it would become insupportable. What, then, will be the torments of hell!

O, eternity! terrible eternity! When a damned soul shall have shed tears enough to fill all the rivers and seas of the world, it will be no more advanced after so many millions of years, than if it had only begun to suffer!

It must commence again, as if it had suffered nothing: and when its tears again number the sands of the sea-shore, the motes in the air, and the leaves of the forests, all this will count as nothing!

The damned not only suffer throughout eternity, but they suffer all of eternity in every minute!

Their eternity is ever present!

Eternity enters into all their torments!

An eternity of fire! An eternity of tears! An eternity of rage!

We sincerely pity the victims of such madness and folly. May the scales soon fall from their eyes, and they learn that "the wages of sin is death;" but "the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Small Game.

> We learn that Eld. J. T. Walsh contemplates a work entitled A Review of Destructionism; or, The nature of man, the state of the dead, and the destiny of the wicked. The Advent Herald thinks that "as he was once on the materialist side of 'the life and death question,' but abandoned it, he ought to be able to handle the subject with fairness and ability"—decidedly a non-sequitur. We anticipate more force of language than of argument. Eld. Walsh was really the father of the non-resurrection interest in this country, though some have claimed to divide the honor with him.

As to the "Review" spoken of, if the "Advent Herald" expects anything valuable from the above personage, by all means let it send Dr. Litch to N. C. to help the "travail," lest "the mountain bring forth a—." We know the "History and the Mystery" of the man better, probably, than any one else; and if he had the wisdom which is profitable, to direct he would not seek notoriety in this new field. If the "Advent Herald" anticipates help from that quarter, we suggest that it study Isa. xxxvi., 6, and it may learn a lesson at less expense than to make an experiment.

As to what the "Voice of the West," says of W.'s being "really the father of the non-resurrection interest in this country," that is simply a mistake. That interest was started by Jacob Grim, several years before W. ever heard of it, and we were the first to inform him of that fact, and he soon after seized upon it, for a purpose which soon became manifest; but his skill as a Dr. well nigh strangled the child in its birth, and he abandoned it to its fate; showing that he had no heart of a "father" in him. He was no more "the father of the non resurrection interest in this country" than the Editor of the "Voice of the West" was "the father of the" non-immortality "interest in this country."

"The History and the Mystery" of the would-be notorious was written nineteen years ago, but never yet published; and we desire there never may be an occasion to call it out; but it is at hand, if need be. If men seek notoriety it may come in an unlooked for way.

"Infant Salvation."

The advocates of the revival into life of the wicked dead having exhausted nearly all their ammunition against those who believe their is "No future life out of Christ," still try to make capital with the ignorant with the cry, that we hold to "infant damnation;" or, that no infants will be saved or made alive from the dead. "Ignorance is the mother of devotion" it used to be said. The "devotion" of some persons, or their hostility to the Life views, is kept alive by the ignorance, or something worse, of those who are glad of any excuse for keeping up prejudice against us.

We have again and again denied the charge that we hold, or that the Life views lead to the idea that infants will be lost. Suppose we should act in like manner toward those Christians who maintain faith is essential to salvation, and quote the text, "He that believeth not shall be damned;" and then add, "Those who hold to salvation by faith, teach that all infants will be damned, for they do not believe." Would any man think us honest or just in such a statement? But the conclusion is as correct as for them to charge us with holding to infant damnation, because we say, There is no future life out of Christ. Are they sure that all infants are out of Christ? Will they undertake to prove it from Divine testimony? Let them do it if they can. We do not say infants are out of Christ: that is no part of our theory. If any affirm it is a part of it, their statement is untrue, if not malicious. We do not wish to be wise above what is written. The Scriptures do not address themselves to infants, for the obvious reason, they are incapable of understanding such address.

We maintain in regard to all adults, their revival into life, from the dead, depends on their receiving and having the Spirit of God dwelling in them; because it is by the Spirit, alone, any of Adam's posterity can have life again after they have lost the life derived from Adam, and have gone to corruption. The resurrection life is a new life, derived from the Head of a new creation—the Second Adam, who is "the resurrection and the life." As He has "power over all flesh," so He "quickeneth whom He will." The adult who believes in Him has "everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day," saith Jesus. If in addition to this, He "will quicken" all infants into life eternal, at the last day, who shall say, He cannot or will not? Whatever a man's opinion may be on the question, surely none should have the presumption to say, He will not do it. May He "not do what He will with his own?" Shall it be said that, He who has "all power in heaven and in earth in his hands," cannot, if "He will," put the Spirit of God in infants and raise them up to life eternal? Let who will presume to assume such a position, we will not share the responsibility with them.

If it be said, "There is no promise in the Bible that infants will be raised from the dead," we might answer, There is nothing in the Bible against it; and there certainly are some things in it that may be urged, at least, in favor of the re-living of the infants of believers, and such as have lost life for the name of Christ, as the infants of Bethlehem did. But it is not our design to argue the subject, pro or con, but simply to put on record our protest against the ignorant or wilful slander of our opposers as to our position in relation to infants.

We have had communications for and against the idea of the resurrection of infants. For the most part we have excluded all such; believing that the heart that truly loves the Lord Jesus Christ feels perfectly at rest as to His disposal of the little ones we have dedicated to him from their birth, and even before they were born. If unbelievers are troubled as to the final disposition of their infant children, it is not our business to give them comfort while they themselves reject Christ as the LIFE-GIVER. First, let them give their hearts to Christ; and then "the promise is to you and to your children." Acts ii., 39. Here is rest, and nowhere else, concerning the little ones "God has given us."

CUMULATION OF HORRORS.

A NEW YORK daily, under caption of the above, publishes the following list of crimes and casualties as having either happened or become known during the preceding twenty-four hours. It is not claimed that the list includes all the events of that character occurring during those hours, but only such as came to the editor's knowledge:

"First—a steamboat sunk in the East River; second—a tugboat exploded at the foot of Wall Street, with loss of three lives; third—suicide of a man at Tarrytown; fourth—murder of a man in the Eleventh ward of this city; fifth—two persons killed by Broadway cars; sixth—an oil refinery burned at Hunter's Point; seventh—explosion of oil works at Bull's Ferry; eighth—explosion of the Cincinnati gas works, with loss of several lives.

Embezzlement in the Produce Exchange;

Defalcation in a Brooklyn Bank;

Destruction by fire of a Brooklyn livery stable;

And the drowning of a boy in the East River.

This is assuredly warm work for the season, and if it may be regarded as a prestige of things to come, we must look for a summer of uncommon fruitfulness in the way of havoc.

This at first glance seems a singular "cumulation of horrors," truly, but we doubt not that if all such events were known and chronicled, New York City and immediate surroundings would furnish a much greater number, and many of them more horrible, each successive day. From another daily journal published in the metropolis, we clip the following:

We have supped so full with horrors during the present week that an ordinary murder no longer startles even the most nervous of us, and the burning of half a million's worth of property, the scalding and maiming of a score of men, collisions on the sea, explosions in the harbor, are little incidents of the day upon which we hardly waste a moment's attention. The record of Sunday shows a drunken husband reeling half naked through the streets, covered with the blood of his wife and children, and faint with a self-inflicted wound. The attempt at murder and suicide has possibly failed; but will it be the better for the wretched family to die or to recover? On the next day there was a murder in Sheriff St., the culmination of a long-standing feud. The explosion of an oil factory at Bull's Ferry injured twenty persons, and resulted in a great conflagration. A bank in Brooklyn, supposed to be safe from ordinary accidents, was found to have suffered heavy losses through the mismanagement of a President whom death has removed from the reach of earthly courts. And in yesterday's paper we chronicled such a long array of crimes and disasters that the brain whirls at the mere recital of them. A rich business man is found in his office with his throat cut. The superintendent of the gas works in one of the suburbs is discovered shot in four places by his own hand. Two men are stabbed in a street broil. A sailor makes a murderous assault upon a woman. There is a stabbing affray between boys. Three children are arrested on suspicion of drowning one of their playmates. Another oil factory takes fire, and a million dollars' worth of property is consumed. A steam-tug is blown up, and its crew badly injured. Two vessels are sunk by collisions in the harbor.

This story is full of lessons, in the accidents as well as in the crimes. The feverish blood which courses through the veins of society throws out its unwholesome eruptions in more than one form. Corruption in the public morals, extravagance and unnatural excitement in private life bear fruit in that recklessness of temper which to-day may lead to steamboat explosion, and to-morrow may urge a ruffian on to murder. In every one of the accidents we have placed upon our catalogue we dare say there was somebody to blame; is there much probability that we shall ever know who it is? or, if we learn, that he will ever be punished? Boilers never explode without a reason; steamboats need not run into one another if pilots are reasonably careful, and if there is anything in the nature of oil-tanks which makes it impossible to prevent such awful destruction every now and then as happened on Monday and Tuesday, and has happened so many times before, then for the sake of humanity and common-sense let us put them in some wilderness where they may burn and blow up, and do no harm to a neighbor. It is the crimes, however, that awaken our most serious anxiety, and for which the remedy is hardest to find. When a few bold robbers were sentenced some months ago to long terms of imprisonment, and judges spoke bravely of their resolution to visit criminals with the heaviest penalties of the law, what a chorus of joy went up from the suffering public, who hoped that increasing ruffianism was checked at last, and the reproach of the courts was being wiped away! Meantime, prison associations were reporting that our systems of penal discipline increased the very evils they were instituted to prevent, and prisoners generally came out of jail worse than they went in. Meantime also the very prisons themselves became theatres of murder; the most desperate and dangerous felons were escaping almost as fast as they were convicted; the spasmodic energy of the law died away, and here we are, worse off than ever.

None need be startled by the foregoing, for the difficulty is not a temporary one, but is a marked peculiarity of the times in which we live. "In the last days perilous times shall come," is the language of inspiration, and those days having come upon us, we must needs be subjected also to the perils. A striking feature of these perils is that very many of the crimes are committed by those liberally possessed of the advantages of social and religious culture, and not a few may be foremost in the religious enterprises of the day. One knows not whom to trust, so largely is dishonesty in every form being practised by all classes of society. Men long esteemed eminent for piety and just dealing prove recreant to every trust, and all at once astonish the whole community by wholesale plunders and thefts they can no longer conceal; or too cowardly to face the just indignation of an outraged public, seek refuge from anticipated exposure in the poisonous draught, the rope, the bullet or the knife. The great harvest of the world is about ripe. The wheat and the tares "both grow together," and soon, whether we expect it or not, "the Lord from heaven" will say to the reapers, "gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them." "So shall it be;" the "angels shall come forth and sever the wicked from among the just." In the meantime all lovers of Jesus should be humble, ambitious only to be faithful, good and true, and ever mindful of the Saviour's injunction to "watch, therefore; for ye know not in what hour your Lord doth come." THE CAUSE IN ENGLAND.

WE make the following extracts from a letter of "W. Kellaway," England, to Br. Grant, published in the "World's Crisis," of the 26th ult. They will be read with interest.

... I have long been impressed to write you a letter giving you some insight into the state of the professing churches, and more particularly God's cast-out people, in England. ...

England is upheaved, I think I may say, in every sense of the word, except physically. She is upheaved in politics, in a social point of view, and in religion. Commotion is truly among all sections of the professing church. The ministers must observe it. "What is truth?" is an old cry; but it has not yet died out. Ever and anon its reverberations from all quarters fall on the ear. God's people, who endeavor to walk under his eye, and look for the sunshine of his face, being free men, will not be bound to a skeleton theology; and the substance and symmetry of the gospel are eagerly sought after in this day in England. Of course you will understand me that I do not predicate this of the "present evil world" which is so much seen in profession. Of these I may say they have a garb; but not the dress. They show fair; but are foul. Their fruits may be seen in conversaziones, penny readings from popular authors, and such unseparate and worldly delights. They take the name of the Holy and Just One; but they do not take him in the heart as their hope.

Now let me say also that D. D.'s and B. A.'s count not for much at the present in England; in many cases they are considered but the addition of letters, and unbecoming those who follow the One who never sought such titles himself. How blessed they who working for God seek only the praise of their Master—Christ. I say, beloved, there is one of those inquires in England which threatens to lay bare all creeds, and examine all faiths. O, our God knows that there is a need of an unsettling, that men may be established in Him of whom it is written—"The Lord liveth, and blessed be our Rock."

The world hates disturbance; and so it rests easy and won't inquire. It calls orthodoxy true, without seeing that it is true; and there are so many worldlings to clamor, that their noise is as the sound of many waters; but the Lord knoweth them that are his, and observes those who stand up for his glory. We have watched this inquiry with deep interest, which has been increasing and ever deepening. Think you the emotions of our hearts; and you may conceive how they have been enlarged daily. We were, as it were, in the first small circles in England. When we first saw "the gift of God" to be "eternal life," there seemed to be hardly another in the country; but it seems now there were many as separate from tradition as the unknown three thousand who had not bowed the knee to Baal. Of the ability which God has given we have spoken into every open ear we could command his truth; and who knows how much the word has accomplished the thing for which it was sent, through our instrumentality?

I have just begun to publish in its behalf. But, as you are aware, those who dare to speak the honest convictions of their souls don't got all praise; we rather think it to be as Christ promised his followers—all cross in the world; we have found it "tribulation." But we care not for scowls, scorns, mockings, persecutions, trials, crosses, or denials, for we are on "The Winning Side," which is "God's side." The impartial justice that shall be meted out at the bar of God and from the throne of burning splendor, will make all even, and every loss shall be more than made up; every expenditure paid over and over; every cross be annihilated in victory.

There are good men, godly men, eminent men, to-day numbered among those who profess "life only in and by Christ," and death to all outside him. Preaching brethren of the Church of England, such as Messrs. Minton and Ker; men of the Baptist denomination, whose names I may not communicate; men of Congregational bodies, known privately to me; men of the "Plymouth Brethren" fellowship; and Wesleyans. Men are coming out from all persuasions into the truth. Ministers and laymen are awaking from their deep, long lethargy, announcing that "the day is at hand." God's jewels are being seen, and many are emerging from pagan superstition and darkness. And I have private communication speaking of the Chairman of nearly the greatest (if not the greatest) body in England, who firmly holds this truth. I am informed that he has a work in the press, but intends keeping it back till the meeting of the "great body" of divines, when, I trust, God will give him the heart of a lion, with the eloquence of his Son, and the disposition of a lamb, to stand for the defence of the gospel.

O, if you will but believe me, England is moved—is moved to the centre; and the days of unscriptural dogmas are numbered. Dr. Leask has come out well in "The Rainbow," and others are ready. I can tell the state of affairs, for I have within sight I should think, at a guess, more than two hundred letters from all parts of England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales; and many of these are from ministering brethren of various denominations,—for the tract "Immortality only in Christ," for circulation among their people. Many towns have their few who speak to each other in the fear of the Lord. I have sent out about four or five thousand tracts in the last few weeks. I take this earnest inquiry as a token of the day dawn; as the harbinger of the coming glory.....

We desire an interchanging of sympathy, and thoughts, and love, between America and England. We would speak "face to face;" for though the broad Atlantic rolls between us, we are near to each other; oh, so near! "members one of another." By faith we can see each other; for we are enabled to look at God's Anointed, the Head, and New Man, in whom are all the church—his body. We can feel fellow-sympathy, for a oneness of life pervades us all; and love alike, because the heart's warm affections flow into us all. We are in the same wilderness; we travel to the same home; we have the same hope. Truly we are "one."

We shall be together soon. We are often together now at the mercy seat; we shall be soon together at the throne. And for so long. Years shall slink away with shame. Exhort all who love Christ to wait for him, desiring his appearing. Exhort all believers to joy in God, who is the Father of all those who are in Christ Jesus.....

A purse of one hundred guineas has been offered by a brother in London with the advertisement of "Immortality only in Christ," in the leading papers, for one text proving the natural immortality of the soul. An Archbishop has referred us to 1 Cor. xv., 42. "It is sown in corruption; it is raised in corruption." What a proof!

PSALM XLIX.

BR. STORRS: I had placed in my hands this morning a volume of the Bible, a translation by CHARLES THOMPSON, late Secretary to the Congress of the United States, dated Philadelphia, 1808.

In looking over the book I was struck with Psalm xlix, and will give it to show the harmony between it and Judge Halsted.

"Hear these things, all ye nations; listen attentively, all ye inhabitants of the world; both ye of the lowest rank, and heads of families; both rich and poor together. My mouth shall speak wisdom; and the meditations of my heart understanding. I will incline my ear to a parable; with a psaltery I will unfold my problem. Why am I terrified in an evil day? the iniquity of my heel will surround me. Some put confidence in their power; and some boast of the abundance of their wealth. A brother is not redeemed. Is a man to redeem himself? We cannot give to God an atonement for himself, and the price for the redemption of his life; though he labored for the age that he may live to the end. Shall he, therefore not see corruption? When he seeth the wise dying, together the foolish and senseless shall perish; and they shall leave their wealth to others. But their graves shall be their houses forever—their dwelling places to all generations. On these parcels of earth they have put their names. When a man, who is in honor, hath not understanding, he hath been compared to the brute beasts, and is like them—this very way of theirs was to them a stumbling block; and after this shall it with their mouths be praised? They are pent up like sheep in the mansion of the dead; death shall feed them and the early watches shall rule over them; and that help of theirs from their glory, shall in the mansion of the dead become obsolete. But God will redeem my soul from the power of that mansion when it receiveth me. Fear not when a man groweth rich, nor when the glory of his house is increased. For when he dieth he can carry nothing away; nor will this glory of his descend with him. Because during this life his soul shall be blessed, let him praise thee when thou doest him a benefit. He shall go to the generation of his fathers; he shall never see light. A man who is in honor, and hath not understanding, hath been compared to the brute beasts, and is like them."

Here we find, sixty-one years ago, a translation that preaches the doctrine of No life to the wicked dead; and redemption from the power of the grave to the righteous only.

JACOB GRIM.

PHILADELPHIA, June 1, 1869.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

BR. STORRS: It may be spoken to the praise of God and to the comfort of God's dear children, who believe in "Life only through Christ," that there are now more calls for the preaching of those views than can be well supplied.

It is true that in many places where there is a call for help the friends are still few in number, and weak; but the number of those who believe is increasing, and soon, as a matter of course, means will be improving. I find that the opposition to this conclusion, among Adventists, does not hurt it any. I felt very badly about it for a while, and was sometimes very anxious for the cause, lest we should become so weak that we could not maintain our position; but now I have no fears of that kind. All we, who now preach these views, have to do is to work—work hard; but work as the Lord opens the way, and the Lord will give the harvest. The improved condition of things has been the result of several causes.

1. The direct efforts put forth, in which we have employed our energies as the Lord hath given us ability—in publishing the HERALD OF LIFE, the Campaign Documents, Bro. Wendell's efforts in preaching and publishing—with the labors of other brethren who have, as we believe, "not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God" on the great question of immortality. Brethren who could not preach have given their money, and they will. They have given countenance also, which is an assistance as well as pecuniary aid.

2. The patient waiting which has qualified the action of some of the most devoted in this cause, whether in the ministry or otherwise. They have waited till they have seen the result in the reception of truth by some, at least, around them; and the ministers who have been prudent and careful, in the hope that the seed would take root, have the satisfaction of knowing that their "labors are not in vain in the Lord." I have felt that in a few instances it were best to speak more positively; but often it has been proved that the whole of the truth, especially dwelling on the Advent Plan, has given the opportunity to say that which has moved the hearts of the people to a faithful reception of the complete Word. I have no regrets now that I have been forbearing, and even at times have allowed myself to be beaten and whipped, if the friends have thought so, in private conversation; and heard often speakers who said bitter things, without making any effort to reply. I knew the Lord would justify his own word. To hear men who know they must be right, and yet interpret the word contrary to their own principles of interpretation, and then reflect on those who follow out those very principles, is very trying; but it is better to bear. The opposition which we have had from any source has never injured the cause at all; and never will. We may not have enough to keep the interest up to what it should be, for there will now be a great change. The change is coming on very much as it did when the doctrine of immortality—the gift of God in Christ—came up.

3. I will notice a fact which has had very much to do with this advancement. It is this: that in the opposition which the friends in the Advent body have made to this, they have been compelled to give the people something to offset the grand truth that "the dead are raised incorruptible;" which in itself shows that the destructible cannot come forth. They have been compelled to concede to the world the old Universalist ground that the dead are all raised in like condition. The Universalists said they were all saved. The Adventists that they were all unsaved, (some Adventists I mean). Neither saved nor damned. But the Universalist was the most consistent, for the word does certainly present that as a complete state; one thing or another. The doctrine, denying the word of God directly, therefore, that there is a mortal resurrection of the saints, because there must be of the wicked, was introduced to prove the destructibility of some in the resurrection. The whole thing is a denial of the plain statement of the Bible. Many are ashamed of the doctrine of a mortal resurrection of the saints, and wish it back where it came from; but it has done us a service in that it has led many to inquire why such a monstrous perversion of the word of God has been resorted to; and then they believed in the truth.

The apostle not only says, "the dead shall be raised incorruptible," but in his great illustration of the body that shall come, says, "Thou sowest not the body that shall be." Pretty good! Not the mortal, if it was mortal when it went into the ground.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., May 26, 1869.

FROM ELD. B. MATTHIAS.

LANESFIELD, Kan., May 13, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I am in this new place in this world by itself. After being here four or five days, still admiring. In all places east there are highlands or forests to bound your vision; but here the effect is, as if standing upon the shore of the ocean: you have here in all directions spread out before you the fairest lands, "abounding," like the ocean, in an endless succession of rollers. You must know that one of the peculiar beauties, and, they say, advantages of this country is these uniform rollers. They are seen in Missouri and Illinois, but these surpass all. Such a stretch of beautiful and superior lands, and withal so accessible and available, gives one large ideas of the bounteousness of the Creator. Here he has spread out for his children of this hemisphere a most extensive mine, where the necessity is to dig only "plough deep;" and many are availing themselves of the opportunity.

I am stopping on the Santa Fe road, where there is a pretty steady stream of emigrants and teamsters. Produce is high for a country so remote, owing to the constant influx of new comers. Corn is 75 cts., butter 35, potatoes 50, wheat flour $5 00 per cwt. Many goods necessary for families' use are as low as in the East. Furniture quite as low; lumber also, and other varieties.

As to the healthiness of the country, I cannot say. I have heard of one case of sickness this day; nothing in his case peculiar, however. They say, turning up new ground occasions bilious complaints. These are not peculiar to any country; free livers are liable to them anywhere.

I reached this place, some 1,500 miles from New York, in about 71 hours; six or seven of these I spent in delays at St. Louis and Kansas City. I took the N. Y. Central, changed cars at Pittsburg, again at Cincinnati; third change at St. Louis; last change at Kansas City, taking a new road—not known in books—to Olathe, its present limit. It is intended to reach Fort Scott, some 70 miles further South-west.

Stand where you will, you will see habitations in various distances until you fetch up at the horizon, where the whole circle is dotted with houses and clumps of trees, set out by the enterprising settlers. Reach this circle and the same thing occurs for many miles; so this is very far from being an unsettled country.

A good man with his land once subdued, broken up, (which three horses in a team can do—two yoke of oxen are better) can, after this, live easy; no more work required than is desirable, or than Adam had laid upon him to perform before his fall. He was required to "replenish the earth, and subdue it." One man by fair application, working only eight hours a day, can, I would judge, cultivate forty acres. In this country some help would be necessary in the ingathering; if not absolutely necessary, a convenience. No stumps nor stones in the way; no manure necessary; consequently few weeds.

Please the Lord, I intend to do what I can in publishing the glad tidings of the kingdom at the door. If it is your pleasure to send me a package of your Campaign Documents I will use them as best I can. Better send them as freight to OLATHE, Johnson County, Kan., at the same time addressing a line to me at Lanesfield.

Please say in your paper that I am ready to answer invitations to preach the word at convenient distances from this place.

My love to all the Brotherhood. I would like them to know, all of them, for generally I have to mass them, they are in my heart and prayers. There are three petitions rule the hour with me, viz.: That they may be continued in health and life, unto the coming of the Lord; and may prosper up to that time.

May grace, mercy and peace abound toward yourself, and may you be kept at your post in all faithfulness until sentinels are no longer needed, and those lines of one of our hymns shall be apropos:

"Watchman, let thy wandering cease,
Hie thee to thy quiet home."

Yours truly.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—The foregoing should have appeared sooner, but was overlooked. Eld. Matthias' Post Office address is LANESFIELD, Kansas, and not Lanes*ville*, as previously noticed. We shall send some "Campaign Documents," but shall send them by mail direct to Lanesfield. Our experience is, the expense is less by mail than express to any of the Western States, unless the quantity is large.

FROM LA FAYETTE NORRIS.

COMPTON, IOWA, May 23, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I have made a visit lately to the person that refused to continue to take the HERALD lest it would make him insane. I find he is much interested in the Life views, and of his own accord gave me fifty cents for Campaign Documents.

I have had a visit from a nephew of mine from Indiana. From him I learn that the Life views are gaining ground there; especially among young men.

Br. D. Ayers, of Manchester, Iowa, is well pleased with the HERALD, and will renew his subscription before long. He is a firm believer in the non-resurrection of the wicked, and in the yearly observance of the Lord's Supper. He is a well to do farmer, and I hope he may feel it his privilege to help spread the Compaign Documents.

I listened to a sermon to-day by a Methodist preacher on the resurrection. The most of it was very good. The text was 1 Cor xv., 14. He said the resurrection was the foundation of the Christian religion; and if Christ was not raised, we had no Saviour; that our Saviour was dead and gone to dust; and that there never would be a resurrection: and that our faith was vain and we were on the road to the bad place. A strange mingling of truth and error.

I hope Br. Osborn will come this way. I think with you that we depend too much on preachers. I am beginning to believe that it is not best for a preacher to locate, or preach in one place long at a time, unless there is a fair prospect of having new hearers most of the time. The apostles went from one place to another, and generally stayed but a short time in a place. After the truth is preached in a place, and some have embraced it, there is generally a reaction, as there was in the apostles' days; and I think it would be best to preach somewhere else for a while, and let the people ponder what they have heard; and tracts can be given them to read, and when a good preacher comes around again, the people would be more anxious to hear than ever. But Christians should not forsake the assembling of themselves together in the absence of the preacher, and conclude they have nothing to do while he is away.

It seems to me that some Christians are selfish: when they have a capable preacher among them, they want to retain him; not because sinners are flocking to the cross of Christ, but because they like to hear a smart preacher; as though their salvation depended on having a good preacher among them.

Would it not be better to give their money to the preacher, and tell him to go into other places where people are famishing for the word of Life? and that they meet together and pray for success in his absence. I do not wish a preacher to come here for my benefit, but for the perishing sinners around me. As a general thing, the Adventists that I am acquainted with have no meetings unless their preacher is with them. I hope there is a better state of things in the East. I go to no meeting of Life believers, for the simple reason there are none around here to meet with. But if, there were two or three to meet with, I would meet them regularly, preacher or no preacher, and talk of the love of God and his plan of salvation. My prayer is daily that I may yet have those few to meet. My love to all the dear brethren. Pray for me that my courage fail not.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We would suggest to Br. Norris that he give notice among his neighbors that his house, or some other place, will be open at a given time for any to meet with him who are willing or disposed to look into the Bible to learn what it teaches in relation to a future life. If none come, leave the matter with the Lord. We doubt if he will long be left without "two or three." Try it, and seek the Divine blessing on the effort.

THE DIVINE PLAN.

AN ADDRESS TO THE ADVENT CHRISTIANS OF AMERICA.

THIS address, which has been carefully prepared, is now in the hands of the printer, and will soon be ready for distribution. Breathing the spirit of love throughout, it is designed to remove much of the prejudice existing against the Life views, and also to set men to thinking and investigating on the subject, by presenting the Life views in various phases and in an original manner, backed up by unanswerable arguments. We feel confident that this will do good wherever circulated, and will greatly aid the successful introduction of the "Campaign Documents;" therefore we ask our friends to help us circulate this. It will be issued in beautiful, attractive form, printed from new type, bought especially for this "address." We offer this for distribution at the following rates post paid: Single copies, 5 cts.; per doz. 25 cts.; and $1.25 per hundred.

We expect the work out in about ten days, when all orders will be filled promptly. We should be glad to circulate it free among all classes, if we had the funds to do so.

Poetry.

Not Forever.

Not forever are we chastened
By the might of sorrow's hand,
Not forever pass we sighing
Through the stranger's weeping land.
There shall come a time for gladness,
When the heart may e'en forget,
In the melody of pleasure,
All the ills that grieve it yet.

Not forever in the valley,
With the yawning gulf below,
Not forever 'mid the briars
Zion's pilgrim bands shall go!
They shall tread with cheerful footsteps
On the pleasant sunny hills!
They shall march with mirth and music,
While their song the sweet air fills.

Not forever shall the darkness
Of the midnight's lonely hour
Overwhelm the timid spirit
With the terrors of its power,
There shall come the light of morning
To the weary, waiting heart,
And, amid the joy of daybreak,
Tears and sorrow shall depart.

Not forever have they left us,
Those for whom we shed our tears;
Not forever shall our mourning
Darken long and weary years,
There shall be a joyous meeting
When the reign of death is o'er—
In the house where all is happy,
In the land of evermore.

And forever shall the tear-drops
Vanish from each face away,
And forever is the darkness
Banished where 'tis endless day;
And forever death and sickness,
Sorrow, pining, pain and woe,
Shall be known no more nor looked for
In the house to which we go.

The Red Peppers.

In a basket of seeds and vegetables that had just arrived from the country was a string of bright red peppers, which immediately attracted the attention of James Anthon, a boy of four years, who had come in with his mother, while I was unpacking the basket.

"O mamma," he exclaimed, "what shining red things! How very pretty they are! May I have them to play with, mamma?"

"They are not playthings, my dear," she answered; "neither are they good for little boys. Besides they are very hot."

James opened wide his big black eyes. "Hot, mamma? Why, there is no fire;" and, reaching out a chubby finger, he softly touched one of the peppers, as though he feared it might burn him: exclaiming in a triumphant tone, "There, mamma, the pretty red thing is cold! May I not hold it in my hand one little minute?"

Now I am sorry to say that James, like a great many little girls and boys I know, loved to have his own way; and it was very hard for him to give up anything that he had set his heart upon. So he persisted in begging for the red peppers. "Oh, if you would give me one,—just one little 'teenty, tonty' one, mamma!" he said, in a coaxing tone. On his mother telling him it would burn his fingers, he gave a quick laugh saying, "How can a cold thing like that burn me?" Then she explained to him that they were hot in themselves; and that, if he got any of the pepper on his hands or face, it would smart terribly, and he would quickly find out what she meant when she called them hot.

And so the subject was dropped. I was called from the room, and Mrs. Anthon was busy with her sewing, when all a. once I heard a loud scream from James. He had slyly crept up to the table, and had taken possession of one of the scarlet playthings he had so long been coveting, and was speedily finding out, to his bitter cost, what his mother meant when she called them "hot." His plump little hands were smarting as though they had been plunged into the fire, and big tears were rolling down his cheeks. Suddenly he stuck both fists into his eyes, and then, with a howl of pain, threw himself into his mother's lap, crying out, "O mamma! how it hurts! how it burns! O mamma! can't you do something to take away the naughty pain?"

I got a basin of cold water, and dipped into it a soft linen cloth, which I laid again and again upon his flushed and swollen face and burning hands; his mother telling him that, another time he must remember she knew better than he did what a little boy ought to do, that now he was punished for being disobedient, and for persisting in having his own way.

I did not see James Anthon for several years after that little adventure—nor till he was a tall manly-looking lad. I asked him if he had forgotten the red peppers. He blushed scarlet, and turned toward his mother with a tender smile. She answered for him: "I am happy to say he never has forgotten them; and whenever he has attempted to have his way, and to set up his own will against mine, I have said 'Red peppers, James,' and he has instantly given up."—Child at Home.

"'Cos He Sung So!"

Leaning idly over the fence a few days since, we noticed a little four-year-old "lord of creation" amusing himself in the grass by watching the frolicsome flight of birds which were playing around him. At length a bobolink perched himself upon the drooping bough of an apple tree, which extended to within a few yards of the place where the urchin sat, and maintained his position, apparently unconscious of the close proximity to one whom birds usually consider a dangerous neighbor. The boy seemed astonished at his impudence; and after regarding him steadily for a minute or two, obeying the instinct of his baser part, he picked up a stone lying at his feet, and was preparing to throw it, steadying himself carefully for a good aim. The little arm was reached backward without alarming the bird, and Bob was within an ace of danger; when lo, his throat was swelled, and forth came nature's plea: "A link—a link—a link, Bob-o-link, Bob-o-link! a-no-weet, a-no-weet! I know it—I know it! a link—a link, don't throw it! throw it! throw it!"; and he didn't. Slowly the arm subsided to its natural position, and the despised stone dropped. The minstrel charmed the murderer! We heard the songster through, and watched his unharmed flight, as did the boy with a sorrowful countenance. Anxious to hear an expression of the little fellow's feelings, we approached him and. inquired: "Why didn't you stone him, my boy? You might have killed him and carried him home."

The poor little fellow looked up doubtingly as though he suspected our meaning, and with an expression, half shame and half sorrow, he replied: "Couldn't, 'cos he sung so!"

Dear little boys, don't stone the birds!—Selected.

"The Day of Judgment."

The following fancy sketch of the Theological Day of Judgment we take from one of our exchanges, "The American Baptist." It is a fair specimen of the "orthodox" view of the subject. We need not add any notes. Our readers can judge for themselves of its real orthodoxy, with their Bibles in their hands. After having read it, however, it may not be amiss to read the tract on "The Judgment," advertised in our list of "Campaign Documents." The contrast will enable the reader to see which is most Scriptural, and most in harmony with the reason God has implanted in the human mind, and to which He appeals when He says, "Come now let us reason together." Isa. i., 18.

The General Judgment.

For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ.—2. Cor. v., 10.

This is a most solemn, awful and momentous subject. I feel my need of special grace to think, write, speak or act upon this important theme. "Day of Judgment, day of wonders!" Yes, to all the world, the universe.

Our civil and criminal courts of justice secure deep interest from all concerned; and why should not the great court of "Assizes" engage paramount attention?

"Things seen are temporal; but the unseen are eternal."

We must die, each and all of us; the time is appointed. We shall be buried, but not to remain in our graves. The archangel's voice and the trump of God will awake the dead, and they shall come forth to their rewards. The resurrection morning precedes the judgment; for all, the righteous and the wicked, must there appear.

The day is fixed, and will soon be known; it will dawn upon us with glory or with gloom. A personal trial we must have before the bar of God; and all will be judged and awarded according to their deeds, either good or bad. Prepared or unprepared, there will be no escape; willing or unwilling we must meet the Judge. "That awful day will surely come;" and will not tarry. "Lo, he comes in robes of judgment!"

We have been duly notified, and faithfully warned, and affectionately exhorted to be ready for the meeting of the coming Bridegroom. Are any of us without the wedding garment? How many of us have already trimmed our lamps? The Lord has often summoned us to make Christian preparation. Soon he will issue the judgment summons, and it must be served.

Christ is our judge. He will come upon his white throne; call forth the living and the dead; assemble the nations, and judge the world.

The final day is now come; the affairs of earth are run; and time is ended. Our work is done; our characters formed and fixed for eternity; either righteous and holy still, or unjust and filthy still; all fitted and finished for heaven or hell. It is done! all acts and records are complete.

What a surprising day! It comes to the wicked like a thief in the night; and falls upon all unbelievers and reprobates suddenly, as voracious animals pounce upon their careless victims. Sinners not awakened by mercy, are now aroused by wrath and consternation. Dear friends, are we prepared? with new hearts, and new lives, and good hopes to abide the day of Christ's coming?

This is the great and notable day of destruction, "when the heavens shall roll up like a scroll; the earth melt with fervent heat; and the things therein burned up;" yea, and the wicked all destroyed by the breath of the Almighty.

What a terrible day! day of astonishment; day of fright and frenzy; day of conviction and retribution; a day of mourning, anguish and untold misery; when the wicked, overtaken in their sins, "cry out for rocks and mountains to cover them."

Oh, guilty, polluted, ruined sinner! what will be your doom when arraigned at the fearful judgment?

This day includes the resurrection; a day when all in their graves hear and come forth; the living become suddenly changed; the just and unjust, all congregated before the judgment-seat of Christ.

Behold the general assembly of the first-born and all the universe! the great meeting of all intelligent, rational, moral beings of three worlds. God is there, in the centre, sitting on his burning throne. Angels and saints from heaven come before Him in bright array, and sit at his right hand. Satan and all the sons of perdition muster before the august judge, and appear in gloomy silence at God's left hand. Oh, the myriads of millions, that "no man can number," gathered from all quarters and classes of creation, to be judged! We have seen enormous mass meetings in Washington, London, Paris and elsewhere, which made us feel solemn; but how utterly insignificant are all these, and all the thirteen hundred millions on the globe compared with the monster meeting at the judgment.

Awful day, tremendous sight! The great panorama of heaven, earth and hell, of time and eternity; all comes before us. Oh, how do you appear? Now is the time to make the soul's best preparation. Oh, be wise!

The day of reckoning is come. Can you "stand the trial?" The books are laid wide open, and another book is opened. Memory lives; conscience speaks, and the secrets of all hearts are revealed. God's witnesses from without testify; the king reviews the multitudes; the light of eternity breaks in upon every soul, and we see ourselves before the Bible mirror. The all-wise judge sums up the facts and evidences, and proclaims to all a just and final decision! How many ears must tingle, and hearts swell with anguish, while others rejoice.

A solemn day is before us. Each and all destinies are now fixed and declared, irrevocably and forever. Oh, what short space of time shapes our different fortunes and our l o:nes, for endless weal or woe!

What a heart-rending day of separation! Here parents and children, husbands and wives, brothers and sisters, friends and neighbors, part to meet no more. Notice the grief of parting with our dear friends for a month, a year, or for life; how inexpressible! The scenes at some death-beds and funerals, how distressing to the bereft! But to be rent asunder from loved ones, and without any hope of reunion, how intolerably bitter for the wicked! What torment to the soul, beyond all imagination! What excruciating reflection upon their convictions in youth, under devoted parents, and in revival days! While others chose the "good part and the things needful," they wickedly neglected their own souls, till the Spirit was quenched, and the day of grace all gone forever! Memory and conscience echo: "Son, remember how you sold your birthright." Oh, the wicked of all classes and degrees, from Satan down to the basest rebel, have their sentence "depart ye cursed," and are doomed to hell for eternity.

This is a day of exultation for the righteous! The battles all fought, and the victories won! They "shout, grace, grace, from foundation to top-stone; not by might or power, but by grace and the Spirit of the Lord! Glory in the highest!" Hark now, hear what Christ, the judge, proclaims to the righteous of all classes: "Well done, good and faithful, enter ye into the joys of your Lord." Behold now the Lamb's wife, robed in white, with a starry crown, singing the new song to God and the Lamb forever! Behold the redeemed and the holy angels casting their crowns at Jehovah's feet, shouting:

"Crown him lord of all!"

What a day of consummation! The righteous who were regenerated and sanctified, "glorying only in the cross," with but a foretaste of heaven, now share their full fruition around the throne of God. But the wicked, "having all their good things here," and only some forebodings of their future woes, now and forever drink their full cup of misery in hell. Dear souls repent and look to Jesus, and prepare to meet God!

Let us sing:

When thou, my righteous judge, shalt come
To call thy ransomed people home,
Shall I among them stand? etc.

Emerson Andrews.

A Real Picture.

The following article we also take from "The American Baptist" of the same week as the foregoing one on "The General Judgment." Here is an earthly "hell" described, but its torments had an end; but the theological hell has no end, no mitigation of its tortures—no such thing as death is ever to come to the relief of those who go there! The following description of an earthly hell—whose tortures have ceased, filled the mind of the "Rev. J. H. Pettingell" with horror: yet this was a paradise compared with theological hell of "Emerson Andrews," the "Orthodoxite." Compare the two together. In one the sufferings are horrible, but soon over. In the other they are horrible, but never, no never, end: How long shall the God of love be thus dishonored? Ans. Till the falsehood of inherent immortality is exploded.

The Iron Virgin.

Rev. J. H. Pettingell gives us, in the Sabbath at Home, an account of his visit to the old city of Nuremberg, with the ancient appearance and its antique churches on which a vast amount of labor has been bestowed, "sculpture, carving, painting, gilding, and mosaic." His visit to an old castle, in which he saw the Yungfrau, or iron virgin, he describes as follows:

After waiting some time, a woman came to me from an adjoining house; to whom I again uttered the significant words, Die eiserne Yungfrau; and she at once brought a key and a lighted candle. I followed her down, down, through a long, dark, winding stairway, hewn in the solid rock. At every turn, she lighted a tallow candle that was stuck in the wall, till we came, at last, to a series of large cells. Here I found, in horrid array, every sort of instrument of human torture of which I had ever heard or conceived; rude, rough, and rusty, most of them, but grim and ghostly. Here were goads and knotted lashes, thumb-screws and gags, yokes and pokes, and every sort of gear for every part of the body; and chains and manacles, and stocks of various patterns, vying with each other in their power to twist and wrench and confine the body in the most unendurable positions. Here were limb-stretchers and bone-breakers and flesh-crushers, and a great variety of nameless and nondescript instruments and machines, adapted to produce exquisite pain and prolonged agony in every conceivable way. In the corner of one cell was a high chair, the seat of which was filled, like a hatchel, with blunt iron spikes; at the top was an iron collar to fit around the neck of the victim, who was placed in it with manacled hands; and there were two iron weights, of about fifty pounds, to be attached to his feet as they hung dangling some eighteen inches from the floor. In another room was a rough roomy cradle, filled with the same sort of spikes, in which the sufferer was rocked till his flesh was pierced and torn to tatters.

In another room was a hoisting-machine, with rings in the floor below, to which the feet were secured; and rings in the wall above, through which went cords to be attached to the hands; and a windlass, around which these cords were carried; and then the unhappy victim was drawn upward till all his bones were dislocated and his muscles stretched to their utmost limit of endurance, or till his limbs were torn away one by one.

In an other place, there was a horizontal table, with a windlass attached, for the same purpose, with other devices for inflicting various other tortures upon him as he lay stretched on his back. My guide attempted to tell me in her broken English how many hundreds had met death by this instrument and how many by that: but I made no note of these details.

I surveyed the hellish engines of torture till my heart was sick and my curiosity was satisfied; and then I was led through a narrow, crooked passage, into the last cell of all. It was some ten or twelve feet square, hewn out of the rock, and utterly dark, excepting as it was lighted by two or three bits of tallow candles stuck in the wall around, and so far beneath the ground, that no noise within could reach the world outside. Here, by the dim light of these tapers, I found myself in the presence of the monster I had come to see. This Yungfrau is an image of a woman with a fair face, hooded and ruffled, and from the neck downward, apparently enveloped in a long cloak. The image is about seven feet high, and seems to be constructed of wood, but incased in iron. On either side is a pair of hinges, and in front two doors open by a spring, revealing a space within large enough to hold a full-sized man, and all bristling with rusty spikes several inches in length. Two of them at the top are so placed as to penetrate the eyes of the victim confined within, and others along down to meet and pierce other parts of the body. Opposite the mouth is a small orifice for introducing cordial to strengthen him, or through which, perhaps, he might also utter his confession. On closing the doors, a screw, braced against the opposite walls was applied to bring them very gradually together; and at the bottom, underneath the feet, is a trap-door through which he is finally dropped into a cavern below, filled with water, "unknelled, uncoffined, and unknown."

I have seen many dark and doleful dungeons, and many instruments of cruelty; I have been down into damp dismal dungeons beyond the Bridge of Sighs in Venice, and surveyed their narrow walls reeking with moisture, and have seen the hole through which those who perished there were thrown out into the sea; I have mounted up into the torture-chamber of the archbishop's castle at Saltzburg, and have seen the rings and pulleys by which the human form was stretched to its utmost limit, and the great stone of nearly two hundred pounds weight, which was attached to the feet of the victim as he hung in mid-air suspended by his hands; I have been through the underground cells of the Inquisition at Antwerp, and surveyed the arrangements for torture there, and looked into the dark cavern, into which, half filled with mud and water, the heretics, after having been tortured, were cast, and left to die by slow degrees; I have been through the Tower of London, and have seen the instruments of flagellation, tipped with iron burrs, the gags, the manacles and heavy collars for the neck, with projecting angles and points for galling the neck and shoulders, the screw for the thumbs, and bodkins for running under the finger-nails; I have seen in this and other museums of antiquities beheading blocks and broad-axes and guillotines, and all manner of contrivances for inflicting death and torture; but I never was more impressed than by this array of the engines of cruelty and destruction, culminating in the monstrous eiserne Yungfrau, at Nuremberg.

What is all this compared with the theological hell? Only as a drop to the ocean! The man who can complacently look at the woes of the theological hell, and tell us, the day in which the wicked are sent there, "Is a day of exultation for the righteous!" and yet is filled with horror at the sight of "The Iron Woman," must be composed of strange materials. But we forbear to give full expression to the thoughts that are in our minds when we see the blinding influences of the theory which makes men deathless, however full of sin, and though under tortures worse than those which have now ceased "at Nuremberg."

I heard a preacher take for his text, "Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? was I ever wont to do so unto thee?" Num. xxii., 30. I wondered what he would make thereof, fearing he would starve his auditors for want of matter. But hence he observed:

1. The silliest and simplest, being wronged, may justly speak in their own defence.

2. Worst men have a good title to their own goods. Balaam was a sorcerer; yet the ass confesseth twice he was his.

3. They who have done many good offices, and fail in one, are often not only unrewarded for former service, but punished for that one offence.

4. When the creatures formerly officious to serve us, start from their wonted obedience (as the earth to become barren, and the air pestilential), man ought to reflect on his own sin as the sole cause thereof.

How fruitful are the seeming barren places of Scripture. Bad ploughmen, which make balks of such ground. Wheresoever the surface of God's word doth not laugh and sing with corn, there the heart thereof within is merry with mines, affording, where not plain matter, hidden mysteries.—Thomas Fuller.

Religion Exemplified.

I would not give much for your religion unless it can be seen. Lamps do not talk but they shine. A lighthouse sounds no drum, it beats no gong, and yet far over the waters its friendly spark is seen by the mariner. So let your actions shine out your religion. Let the main sermon of your life be illustrated by your conduct, and it shall not fail to be illustrious.

Kings and Priests.

Alike on human lips and in the events of history are these two names associated; sometimes with honor, sometimes with dishonor. In the early ages they were united often in the same person. The king was also priest. He ruled in peace, he headed the army in war, he stood between the people and God at the altar. This was a lingering relic of the patriarchal state. As civilization made progress, it was found that kingship and priesthood represented realms too distinct and too broad to be under one head. So the two offices went apart, and the only glimpse we have of their union is in the all-comprehending functions of the Messiah, and in the promised glories of that state in which, in some sense, Christ will make his followers "kings and priests unto God."

To modern ears, in lands which possess or long for political and religious freedom, few words are more hateful than kings and priests. Nor is this fact either strange or unreasonable. Fearful things reflect their character and dread upon the associated words. Kings represent to the oppressed masses of the Old World, the sufferings of all the past ages under despotic government. Every Greek scholar knows that tyrant meant originally only ruler. But how woful the word has sounded to men for weary generations! And so king is fast coming into evil use. Crushed subjects hate it. Republican citizens despise it. As the area of freedom extends, and the hopes of the lower classes rise, the word becomes more and more odious. They think not of its abstract meaning, nor of what it might stand for, but only of the terrible past which it represents. Thus the moment revolution bursts forth, the people cry, Down with the monarchy! Death to kings!

Scarcely different is the experience of the word priest. It had honor when it had a function, and stood for religion and piety. But when it persisted in surviving its office, which was absorbed in Him who was both priest and victim, and who, upon the altar of his cross, offered the world's needed and only real sacrifice, it became a sham and imposture. Perverting from its true ideal and work the Christian ministry, and usurping a place to which it had no right, it was compelled to foster superstition, and create fear in the minds of the people, and to ally itself to the despotisms of the state. And so it has burned itself into the memory of mankind. Pronounce the word priest, and it calls up the idea of the dark ages, of cunning, intrigue, corruption, papal bulls against improvement, inquisitions, bloody persecutions, ghostly terrors, and undying hostility to free thought and free speech. Thus men who have had experience of the extravagant pretensions of the priesthood and the dire calamities in their train, loathe the very name. Hence the wild outcry of nations when they burst open their prison doors, Down with the king! is accompanied by, Down with the priests!

This were not so evil, did men always distinguish between priests and ministers of religion. But they do not; partly because their ideas are not clear as to what the Scriptures teach on this subject, and partly because the clergy of the Romish and Episcopal churches cling to the word priest as their official designation, and claim sacerdotal functions. So long as they do this, they must not complain that the masses shrink from them, and dread above all things the idea of being priest-ridden. The burnt child dreads the fire. The danger is, in the rebound from superstition to skepticism. In hating the priest many learn to hate the minister of Christ. Romanism and infidelity are the extremes between which unbalanced minds swing.

There is mischief brewing among the godless pleasure-loving masses in our large cities, who have brought from the Old World a hatred of priests which they easily extend to all ministers of the gospel. Naturally suspicious of attacks upon liberty from priestly quarters, they mistakenly associate all churches and religious teachers with the hierarchies which have cursed the world, and they fear every faithful exhortation and warning as but the echoes of denunciations from the altar. One who visits often among these classes tells us that a bitter feeling is on the increase toward all the clergy, and that a very popular cry ere long will be, Down with the priests!

What shall we do? Rail at them in return? Not at all; but disabuse their minds. To do this we must plainly tell them, that we also dislike a priesthood; that priestly claims are a usurpation, and always prove unfriendly to popular rights; that Christ neither instituted nor continued a priesthood in his church, apart from the holy character and divine work of the entire membership; that true ministers are no priests, but the simple teachers of the people and pastors of the spiritual flocks, their friends and helpers, the promoters of knowledge and of all needed reform; and that hostility to such is as absurd as hostility to physicians or school teachers. They must be made acquainted with our national history, and thus with the close connection which the ministers of the gospel have always had with the progress of education and the maintenance of freedom. We must learn to be patient with their Old World ideas of things, and trust to argument and persuasion rather than to denunciation or legal coercion. Thus doing we shall teach them to discriminate, and shall separate ourselves from all advocates of a priesthood, leaving the latter to bear their own burdens and meet their own fate! Kings and priests are both of the past, and are out of place in the nineteenth century and on republican soil. Down with them! But in dethroning kings we will not destroy civil government, or try to do without rulers; neither in abjuring priests will we reject religion, or think that society can prosper without helpers in the things of religion.—Selected.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE PASSOVER SUPPER.

AN INQUIRY BY JOHN X. WILSON.

BLOOMINGTON, Ill., May 10, 1869.

BR. STORRS: In reading your sermon on the Lord's Supper I was greatly instructed, and my mind turned to the study of the subject more fully. I think, however, that by searching the record in regard to the time in which Christ instituted his supper that it will be found to have occurred about twenty hours previous to what is properly termed the passover supper. The following are my reasons for so thinking:

John, in the 13th chapter of his gospel, writes, "Now before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come that he should depart out of this world unto the Father; and supper being ended, he riseth from supper and took a towel and girded himself." This language seems to be very positive that this supper occurred before the feast of the passover, and in perfect agreement with this, in the 29th verse we find when Judas had been told "That thou doest, do quickly," some of the disciples "thought because Judas had the bag that Jesus had said unto him, buy those things that we have need of against the feast." Would the disciples have so construed Christ's instruction to Judas if they had just finished eating the Jewish passover?

The priests, scribes, and elders of the people were responsible for the arrest of Christ. Judas received a band of men and officers from these high functionaries, who, a short time before, when plotting the death of Christ decided that it should "not be done on the feast day, lest there should be an uproar of the people." Matt. xxvi., 5.

Early in the morning of his arrest the Jews took Jesus to the hall of judgment "and they themselves went not into the judgment-hall lest they should be defiled; but that they might eat the passover." John xviii., 28. The Jews were too strict in the performance of all their required rites and ceremonies to omit at the proper time the keeping of that one which to them marked the beginning of their national existence; and at this time the passover is spoken of as yet in the future. Pilate brought Jesus forth and sat down in the judgment seat, in a place called the Pavement. "And it was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour." John xix., 14. This preparation included the killing of the lambs and the disposal of the blood, as directed in Exodus xii., but not the eating of the flesh of these lambs; that was to be done in the night, which would be on the 15th of the month, the 14th ending at evening, or sundown.

It could not have been over twenty hours from the time that Jesus and his disciples finished that last supper that he was hanging dead upon the cross. These two events took place on the same day; it was the day of the preparation of the passover, as stated in John xix., 14. In the 31st verse, same chapter, the account is given how the Jews came to Pilate, before they knew that Jesus was dead, and besought him that the legs of Jesus and the two malefactors might be broken and that they might be taken away, "because it was the preparation that their bodies should not remain upon the cross on the Sabbath, for that Sabbath day was a high day." This high day was the day of the passover. Some may say that that high day was the first day of the feast of unleavened bread. Luke xxii., 1, makes no distinction between the two. "Now the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the passover." In the Old Testament the feast of the passover and the feast of unleavened bread date from the same event. "Observe the month of Abib and keep the passover unto the Lord thy God; for in the month of Abib the Lord thy God brought thee forth out of Egypt by night." Deut. xvi., 1. "And ye shall observe the feast of unleavened bread; for in this selfsame day have I brought your armies out of the land of Egypt." Ex. xii., 17. Will not the careful reader find these to be the facts? That on the 14th of Abib the paschal lamb was to be killed and its blood struck upon the door-posts of the house wherein it was to be eaten; that the lamb was not to be eaten till in the night, with unleavened bread, making it the first meal of the feast of unleavened bread, and as the 14th ended about sunset this first meal would happen on the 15th; that in that night Pharaoh rose up and urged Moses and Aaron to get out of the land, and as the Israelites were to eat the passover in haste with their loins girded, their shoes on their feet, and their staffs in their hands, they were prepared to leave the land of the Egyptians and they did so in that self same night; and this day that they left Egypt is truly the day of the passover, the first day of the feast of unleavenen bread, the day of the holy convocation, and the high day of John xix., 31.

Once more, if the above views are the correct ones, we then have the chief priests and Pharisees coming to Pilate on the day of the passover, see Matthew xxvii., 62, requesting a guard to be placed over the sepulchre of Jesus, lest his disciples should steal him away during the night. This was in the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath, soon after Joseph had laid the body of Jesus in his own new tomb, immediately after, to what would correspond with our time, six o'clock Friday evening. Our "LIFE-GIVER" was arrested, appeared before Pilate, died upon the cross, and was buried, all within a Jewish day. These events followed immediately after the institution of the Lord's supper and before the passover; making the first to occur, therefore, on Thursday night about twenty-four hours previous to the latter.

JOHN X. WILSON.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

Br. Wilson's suggestions are difficulties as to the "Lord's Supper," so called, being instituted at the precise time of the Passover Supper; yet the testimony of our Lord himself must be allowed to overrule them all, if it does not fully explain them. Luke's account is more particular than the other Evangelists in this matter. See chap. xxii. It opens thus—"Now the feast of unleavened bread drew nigh, which is called the Passover." . . . Verse 7: "Then came the day of unleavened bread, when the passover must be killed: and He sent Peter and John, saying, Go and prepare us the passover, that we may eat." Jesus then tells them they should meet a certain man with a pitcher of water, and they should follow him into his house and say unto him, "The Master saith unto thee, where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with my disciples?" They found accordingly, and "made ready the passover." Thus far there can be no mistake: it is the passover that He is about to "eat." Let us follow the account:

"When the hour was come [to eat the passover, surely], He sat down and the twelve apostles with him; and He said unto them, With desire have I desired to eat this passover with you before I suffer; for I say unto you, I will not any more eat thereof, until it be fulfilled in the kingdom of God." Then follows the account of the institution of what we call "The Christian Passover," and others call "The Lord's Supper."

Is not the account of the whole transaction sufficiently minute to make it certain that our Lord did eat "this passover" at the proper time, whatever seeming difficulties stand in the way? We cannot suppose he would have deceived his disciples in these explicit directions to prepare the passover, and the declaration that He was actually eating it with them, and that hereafter He would not eat it "any more," etc., if He was not then and there eating it, and at the proper time. It would be much easier to suppose the whole nation had lost the true time than that Jesus had.

But there is another way, perhaps, to remove the difficulties Br. Wilson labors under. It will be found in the following explanation:

"The word PASSOVER has three general acceptations in Scripture: 1. It denotes the yearly solemnity celebrated on the 14th day of Nisan or Abib, which was strictly the Passover of the Lamb, for on that day the Israelites were commanded to roast the lamb and eat it in their own houses [just as Jesus and his disciples did]; 2. It signifies that yearly festivity, celebrated on the 15th of Nisan, which may be called the Feast of the Passover (Deut. xvi., 2; Num. xxviii., 16, 17); 3. It denotes the whole solemnity, commencing on the 14th, and ending on the 21st of Nisan, (Luke xxii., 1), though in strictness of speech, the Passover and the feast of unfermented things, are distinct institutions. The Passover was to be kept on the eve of the 14th of the first month (Abib), in which, although unfermented things were enjoined to be eaten with the lamb, yet the feast of unleavened bread did not commence until the following morning, continuing seven days, of which the first and last only were Sabbaths (Lev. xxiii., 5–8), the first probably in commemoration of the commencement of their march out of Egypt, the last of their passage through the Red Sea."—Kitto's Cyclopaedia of Biblical Literature; Art. "Passover."

If these statements are correct—and we think they are—it removes all the difficulties of which our Br. speaks; and to our mind settles the point that our Lord ate the passover of the lamb at the true time with his disciples. The feast of the passover followed the day after. This makes all plain.

"THAT man," said Sidney Smith, "is not the discoverer of art who first says the thing; but he who says it so long, so loud and so clearly, that he compels mankind to hear him."

DEVILS, DEMONS, ETC.

THIS week I give extracts from Dr. Lardner's fourth discourse on demons, etc., wherein he answers various objections that are urged against his view of the matter:

"Howbeit, Jesus suffered him not, but saith unto him, Go home to thy friends, and tell them how great things the Lord hath done for thee, and hath had compassion on thee." MARK v., 19.

"I have distinctly explained and improved the great cure, and miraculous work, here referred to. And the last time it was observed that some are inclined to think that the afflictions which they labored under who are spoken of as having evil spirits, were mere bodily diseases and indispositions; though it was then the prevailing opinion that they were under the power and influence of some evil spirit. And those persons themselves, and their friends, attributing their distempers to Satan, and demons under him, our Saviour sometimes adapts his expressions to that opinion, without countenancing or approving it.

"In favor of that sentiment diverse arguments and considerations were proposed, taken from the reason of things, from the Old Testament, and from the history and description of these very persons, and their cases, as recorded in the New Testament.

"IV. What now remains to be spoken to is the fourth and last head relating to this subject, the objections against the fore-mentioned opinion, or the arguments in favor of real possessions.

"I shall take notice of and consider these four.

"1. There might be such cases in former times, though there are now none.

"2. There are divers things said of those persons, who were called demoniacs, which are very difficult, or even impossible, to be accounted for, but by the supposition of real possessions, or the operation and interposition of evil spirits.

"3. The evangelists appear to have believed that these persons had really one or more unclean spirits.

"4. Our Lord himself does not oppose the opinion of real possessions, as he would have done, it is likely, if not true.

"Of these in order,

"1. Obj. There might be such cases in former times, though there are none now.

"Possibly such things may not be allowed of in the common and ordinary course of Divine Providence, but yet might be permitted at the time of our Saviour's appearance, when there was an uncommon and effectual remedy at hand. Bad angels, or other evil spirits, might be then suffered to leave their confinements, and come abroad, and inflict grievous distempers upon men, especially in the land of Judea and near it, that the power of Jesus might be rendered more conspicuous, by showing his authority over them, and removing by a word those evils which they had inflicted, and causing those malignant spirits to leave those persons of whom they had taken possession:

"To which I answer, that this supposition does not suit the histories related in the gospel, for these cases do not there appear to be extraordinary, but are looked upon by everybody as ordinary and usual things. No one expresseth a surprise that such people are brought to Jesus. His enemies never mention it as a reproach and dishonor to him that their country was then infested with evil spirits. If people had been now all on a sudden seized with disorders, never heard of among them before, and if such cases had been numerous, would it not have occasioned the utmost astonishment? Would it not have raised a loud and general clamor? Would they not have thought they had good reason to say, when they saw the cures performed by Jesus and his disciples, that there was a combination between them and some malignant powers? They first brought them in among them into the country, and then they cast them out and drove them away again. But there was no ground for such a charge: it was never mentioned: it was impossible to be made: for such cases were well known, and are spoken of by other writers cotemporary with the evangelists, by Josephus and others, as common in Judea and elsewhere, not only at that time, but also before and afterward, as was observed by us in a preceding discourse.

"The Jews had among them methods of exorcising spirits, or curing the diseases which they were supposed to inflict: though possibly with but little success, any farther than they were assisted by the art of medicine. However, as exorcisms had been in use among them, they afford proof that such cases, and the opinion concerning them, were known before our Saviour's appearance in the world.

"2. Obj. It is said that divers things appear in the history of these persons which are very difficult, if not impossible to be accounted for, but upon the supposition of real possessions, or at least the interposition and operations of evil spirits.

"(1.) First of all it may be said: if there was no agency of evil spirits, how came it to pass that this opinion prevailed as it did; and how came it that many persons thought themselves to be possessed by evil spirits? The man at the tombs, when asked by Jesus what was his name, answered, 'Legion, for we are many.' And divers brought their children or other friends to Christ, desiring him to have mercy on them, because an evil spirit afflicted and tormented them.

"To which I answer, It is no uncommon thing for opinions to prevail in the world which have no solid foundation. How many have been disposed to ascribe the diseases of the human body, and other disastrous events in the world, to the planets, or other stars! It was for a long time a very common opinion that spirits of inferior orders, in a manner, filled the region of the air, and many distempers were ascribed to their influence. When such an opinion prevailed, it was very likely that some who fell under grievous distempers should think themselves harassed and tormented by evil spirits, and upon some occasions speak in conformity to their inward apprehensions. This, particularly, was the case with the man called Legion, and perhaps of many others who were under a deep melancholy.

"(2.) It is urged, how came these persons who are said to have evil spirits, to know Jesus to be the Christ, if they were not under the influence of evil spirits, of great knowledge, as well as much power? 'And there was in their synagogue a man with an unclean spirit, and he cried out, saying, Let us alone, what have we to do with thee, thou Jesus of Nazareth? Art thou come to destroy us? I know thee, who art the holy one of God.' And the two men in the country of the Gadarenes 'cried out, saying, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? Art thou come hither to torment us before the time?'

"To which I beg leave to answer, it seems to me that these persons knew Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of God, in the same way that others did. The expectation of the coming of the Messiah had been for some while very common, and even universal, founded upon just interpretations of the ancient prophets, which were publicly read in the synagogues, and were in the hands of all men. These people, before they were seized with the disorders which they now labored under, were well apprized of the common notions concerning the greatness of the Messiah, which were allowed by the Jews in general.

"We ought likewise to recollect that none of the miracles recorded by the first three evangelists were performed by our Lord till after the commencement of his public ministry, that is, the most public and open part of it. This is evident from St. John's gospel, compared with the rest. The first three evangelists say but little of our Lord's ministry, till after John was cast into prison; but before that, as St. John assures us, he had wrought divers miracles, and had begun to gather disciples. Moreover, some of the miracles recorded by the first three evangelists might be wrought, and some of our Lord's excellent discourses spoken by him, before any of those persons said to have an unclean spirit made acknowledgments of our Lord's great character.

"The expectation of the Messiah being general, and John the Baptist having preached in the most public manner, and declared to all that the great person whom they looked for was at hand, and would soon appear among them; and our Lord beginning to speak as no man ever spake before, and doing many great and miraculous works, showing forth his glory, and many believing on him, and his fame being very great in Judea, and in neighboring places, no man could be altogether ignorant of him. It is therefore not at all strange that these diseased persons should, in their way, bear testimony to him. All those said to have evil spirits, as we readily perceive, were not discomposed in mind; many of them were epileptical or paralytical. These undoubtedly enjoyed, at some seasons, the free uses of their senses and understandings, and might discern the evidences of our Lord's great character; and being sincere and honest, might be disposed to own it, and declare the sense of their minds. But thinking their distempers to be owing to the operation and influence of evil spirits they affect to speak in their name.

"As for the men in the country of the Gadarenes, who were disordered in their minds, and yet acknowledged Jesus to be the Christ, the thing may be thought more difficult. But, as just said, before they were seized with that distemper, they were acquainted with the expectation of the Messiah; and before now, they had heard of Jesus. Many who labor under that indisposition are honest and acute; they have also some intervals of ease; nor are they unreasonable in every respect; but setting aside some particular fancy, can reason and argue consistently enough. It therefore is not impossible, or improbable, that some laboring under this affliction, having heard of the fame of Jesus, who was much talked of everywhere, should think, and then be disposed to speak honorably of him.

"(3.) The escape of the man called Legion from his confinement, it is argued, is a proof of the interposition of evil spirits of more than human power, and not to be otherwise accounted for. For the evangelist Mark says 'that no man could bind him, no, not with chains. For he had been often bound with fetters and chains, and the chains had been plucked asunder, and the fetters broken in pieces. Neither could any man tame him.'

"But, as seems to me, the escape of such a person from his confinement, needs not to be reckoned so very extraordinary a thing, when it is well known that persons in the like disorders have, at some seasons, uncommon strength.

"Moreover, I apprehend that many do imprudently magnify the security with which that man had been confined. We are too apt, inconsiderately, to judge of former times by our own. It is likely that great improvements have been made in late ages in the method of treating people in that unhappy circumstance.

"Hospitals for the relief and cure of such as labor under this and other grievous distempers may be said to be a Christian institution . . . . Supposing there was, for some short season, a want of attention to this person, the bands with which he was fastened, whether of metal or cord, with his continual and violent motion, would fret and wear, and then break and burst asunder; and when he felt himself at liberty his melancholic apprehensions would carry him to the desolate and solitary place where our Lord found him. . . .

"3. Obj. The third objection to be considered by us is, that the evangelists seemed to have believed real possessions, and to have thought that divers of the afflicted persons, whose cures they relate, had evil spirits.

"To which I answer, that I think this cannot be denied, and that it needs not to be contested. Nor ought this to be thought strange, even supposing that there was no agency or interposition of evil spirits; for the opinion of possessions being common at that time, and generally admitted by the knowing, as well as by the others, it is no wonder that the evangelist should be of the same sentiment. The twelve apostles of Christ were unlearned men: our Lord chose to have such for apostles, and he did not teach them philosophy, but religion, And, indeed, if the evangelists had appeared to know more than others, in this and other points of a philosophical nature, it might have diminished the credibility of their history. If they had been wiser and more knowing than others, and even than the learned and knowing of that time, some would have been apt to charge them with art and contrivance in the main parts of their history. But now there is no room for such charge or suspicion."

"GENERAL ATONEMENT."

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

WE were much amused, in a recent issue of the "Voice of the West," to find the following, offered as a conclusive reason for believing that the wicked dead will live again. A good brother, whose mind appears to have been much agitated regarding the resurrection of the wicked, offers the following as his conclusion, after much study on the subject. He says:

"If there is any general atonement, so that Christ is in any sense the Saviour of ALL MEN, all must rise from the dead at the last day."

If this assumption, so strongly relied upon by many, was true, then the conclusion drawn therefrom would be valid. But we know of no passage in the Bible that positively states that Christ is the Saviour of all men. If He really saves all men from the grave, then is Universalism true, for Christ distinctly affirms, that those who shall be "accounted worthy," to "obtain that world, and a resurrection from the dead . . . are as the angels of God, being the children of the resurrection." The force of this passage cannot be easily evaded. If all are "accounted worthy" of a resurrection from the dead," then Christ's own words for it, they "are as the angels of God, being the children of the resurrection." Will some one so kindly favor us as to harmonize this point with the above assumption, which is based upon the theory of a "general atonement?"

The proof text which is adduced to prove that Christ is the Saviour of all men, is 1 Tim. iv., 10. But this passage makes no reference to Christ, but clearly affirms that "the living God" is "the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe." John iii., 17, shows in what sense God is the Saviour of all men. "God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through Him might be saved." God has opened a way that makes it possible for all men to be saved, by submission to the Captain of our Salvation. "He that believeth on Him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already." "He that believeth not the Son SHALL NOT SEE LIFE, but the wrath of God abideth on him." (John iii., 36.) Thus, in "any sense" in which we may consider Christ the Saviour of all men, his emphatic testimony stands unimpeached, that "he that believeth not is condemned already," and "shall not see life." Therefore, can we consistently maintain a doctrine of a "general atonement" which is in direct conflict with the words of Christ?

In this connection we should like to offer a few thoughts, embodying our conclusion after a careful study, regarding the atonement.

1. The term ATONEMENT. This means, to be made one, or at one, and therefore implies an offence committed by one party against another, and that mutual agreement is restored between the opposing parties, so that they are at one. Man is the offending party, and God the aggrieved one. Man is in controversy with his Maker; the harmony that once existed being destroyed by man's aggravated crime, he stands under the fearful sentence of Jehovah, even the forfeiture of life—natural, or blood life, without the pledge of another, and while in this condition no future life is possible. In this condition man has nothing to offer the aggrieved party as an equivalent for the injury which He has sustained.

2. The RECONCILIATION proposed. To restore harmony between the opposing parties, a third party—Christ—offers his life as an expiation for the offending; and therefore proposes a reconciliation. Arbitary conditions, however, are made by the offending party, to which the offending party must comply, to make the offer of atonement an equivalent for the offence committed. The reader cannot fail to see that none are embraced in this atonement—or reconciliation to God—but those who comply with the conditions by which they become heirs with Christ to the promise made to the fathers, and become the children of God; i. e., they receive "the spirit of adoption" into their hearts, the actual adoption taking place by a resurrection from the dead. Therefore, the wicked, —by rejecting the conditions of the atonement, offered to the whole world,—stand in the, same relation to an offended Deity, as though no atonement had been offered, and lose or forfeit their life without any pledge or hope of another. I can see no way, in the nature of things, in which a "general atonement" can be put into operation, without establishing restorationism; and to this its advocates must inevitably drift.

3. The PROCESS OF RECONCILIATION. The conditions upon which the atonement was predicted are denominated "The word of reconciliation." This is promulgated through the gospel, and messengers are commissioned to preach it "into all the world," and to "every creature;" and "he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned."—(Mark xvi., 15, 16.) The fact that the gospel age is the time when the conditions of the atonement, or the offer of salvation is promulgated to the world, shows that the accomplishment of the reconciliation, by the "new birth," or adoption of children, by God, takes place at the coming of Christ, when his Priesthood shall cease. This process of reconciliation is also seen in the declaration that "God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself." How clearly we see, therefore, that the atonement was not made at the crucifixion, as theologians teach, but the offer was made, and the conditions upon which salvation, or a union with God can be obtained, were promulgated to the world, and every one who should comply with those conditions should be sealed as candidates for an eternal union with Jehovah.

4. The CONSUMMATION. As we have before said the atonement cannot be consummated while its conditions are being promulgated to the world, but will take place at the coming of Christ. This may be argued from the fact that at the resurrection we shall be glorified together. "If we suffer with him in the present life, we shall be also glorified together; for I reckon that the sufferings of the present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us." This is the same event "when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." "When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall ye appear with him in glory." Thus the completion of the atonement takes place at the return of our Saviour from heaven, to claim us as his own, having purchased us "with his own blood." He hath bought us from the claims of death. He laid down his life, "the just for the unjust," that we might be brought into a gracious relation to God, and receive the gift of God, which is ETERNAL LIFE. Therefore we shall be brought into that condition of one-ness, or at-one-ment with Deity by virtue of our spiritual relation to Christ. "For both he that sanctifieth and they that are sanctified are all of one; for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren."

Also in ordering, the name of the POST OFFICE, COUNTY AND STATE must be given, and written plainly, and if a CHANGE is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

Like the Israelites of old we are waiting and looking anxiously for the High Priest to come out of the Holy Place, and make the reconciliation or atonement. Within the veil he has been interceding in behalf of the people; and when he leaves the mercy-seat, and appears to bless the waiting congregation the saints of all ages will be brought into perfect one-ness with heaven itself: "To them that look for Him shall he appear the second time without sin (or a sin-offering), unto salvation." Thus will the grand scheme of salvation be completed, when the Son of God shall present the resurrection harvest, blooming in immortal glory, to the Father, as the purchase of His blood. Then shall he "behold the travail of his soul and be satisfied."

Again, in Revelation we behold that time of perfection, when the atonement shall be consummated. John says: "I saw the seven angels which stood before God; . . . and another angel came and stood at the altar having a golden censer; and there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne. And the smoke of the incense which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hand."—Rev. viii., 3, 4. Here is the grand atonement completed, and acceptable to God; for the incense offered with the prayers of all the saints ascends up before Him as an offering of sweet incense. And thus the world's drama closes.

"And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, blessing, and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the lamb forever and ever."

"'Tis finished, 'tis done;
The saints all made glorious shine forth as the sun;
The blood of the Lamb hath a toned, now they cry,
And raise the deep anthem of glory on high."

TENT MEETINGS.

BRETHREN: The season for Tent work is upon us. Calls for the light of Life come from every quarter, and yet we are doing comparatively nothing.

Some isolated efforts are sometimes made; and we thank the Lord that some good is accomplished; but, my brethren, we are engaged in a great work. We hold precious truth in trust, for which the race is languishing, and without which they will soon be lost in death. Should we not remember the command of our Master, "Work while the day last?" Work for the accumulation of stamps? No. Work for the accumulation of houses and lands? No. To lay up something for a rainy day? No, No. "Sell that ye have, and give alms." Work for the advancement of Christ's cause and truth.

You cannot preach, you say. Well, is there nothing else that you can do? Can you not give a dollar to the man who can? Can you not pay his car-fare, at least, one way? or, must he not only leave his business and sacrifice one or two days in each week upon the altar of truth, but be compelled to rob his family of a portion of his scanty earnings in order to pay his travelling expenses? Brethren is this right? you who pray for the prosperity of Zion, for the spread of the truth, for laborers to be sent into the harvest—you who sit quietly in your lovely mansions, with no rent to pay, with every temporal want supplied, think of this. Think, also, of that time when Jesus shall say, "WELL DONE."

A PROPOSITION.

That a united and systematic effort be made to spead the truth. To this end we suggest that the Board of Directors of the "Life and Advent Union" take the work in hand; procure a Tent; man and send it forth; not to the districts which have been burnt over for the last twenty-five years? but to new places, where there are many that are thirsting for the water of life. A little money judiciously expended in this way would be a good investment in more ways than one. The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. Take a case. Here is a merchant with plenty of goods, but few customers. What will he do? Well, if he is a live man, he will employ what they call drummers, and send them through the country to obtain customers. Well, Brethren Directors, you can take the hint if you choose. If you wish to plant our excellent paper on a paying basis, this is one of the best means to accomplish it. Go forward, brethren; cut out the work, state the case through the HERALD, and call upon all who have means to help. There will be no lack. "The night cometh in which no man can work."

NEW YORK, June, 1869.

FROM S. S. CALL.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE BODY OF CHRIST, SCATTERED OVER THE WORLD:

IF ye are the "body of Christ," or members thereof, take upon you your proper name, the only name under heaven given among men whereby you can be saved. These other names, such as Adventists, Methodists, Baptists, Seventh-day Baptists, Episcopalians, Sabbatarians, all such like names, "cause divisions and offences contrary to the doctrine which ye have learned" of Christ, our Head, who prayed that "all which shall believe on" Him "may be one, as thou, Father, art in me, and I in Thee, that they also may be one in us, that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me." Wherefore, come out from all sectarian names, and "be ye separate, saith the LORD, and I will receive you."

AN OFFER TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

THERE are fourteen numbers more to complete this volume. Those we will give to new subscribers for fifty cents; to which we will add the present and previous numbers till they are exhausted, thus giving you sixteen numbers for fifty cents. Friends, will you not send us one hundred new names immediately? No money can be made by this operation, but information on the Life views will be scattered, and thus much good may be accomplished at little expense.

CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS.

IT will be seen, by looking on the last page, that we have added to these the "Bible Examiner" tracts—"The Soul Saved or Lost," and "Earth, not Heaven, the Inheritance of the Saints." Let all who love the truths contained in these works continue to scatter them more and more. We know they have already wrought a good and mighty work; but it is only just the beginning of the good work Life believers are called to push onward.

ZION'S HERALD STILL IN THE FIELD.

ITS issue of last week contains an article headed, "Hell in the Light of the Cross." Whether editorial or not we do not know. It was probably aimed at Universalists; but as it takes occasion to speak of "annihilate" as a thing impossible with God, we give our readers the article entire, adding notes. It is the following:

HELL IN THE LIGHT OF THE CROSS.

Nowhere do we see the truth of the doctrine of eternal punishment more clearly than from Calvary's blood stained summit (1). Christ died "that the world through him might be saved." Saved from what? Nothing less than an eternity of impending woe could make it necessary that the Son of God should descend, forsaken of the Father, through the "valley of the shadow of death" (2). For if punishment for our transgressions could fit us for heaven, far better would it be that we endure the keenest of torments, even though our sufferings be prolonged through many millions of weary ages, provided only that at last we enter a blissful eternity; far better than that this most dreadful scene in the history of the world should have been written with the warm blood of "The Only Begotten" (3). Or if God could, by one stroke of His power, annihilate the sinner and sweep sin from His universe, He must exercise His power rather than to permit His dearly Beloved to expire upon the shameful cross (4). Or if by any act of His love He could bring us all into the eternal joy of His presence, irrespective of our moral condition, He would reach forth His hand and gather us in, rather than sit upon the throne of His power and look down, without any attempt at rescue, or even the cheer of a Father's sympathy, upon the death-agonies of the Son of His heart (5). An eternal hell impending over the guilty sinner demanded the atoning blood, and the dreadful sacrifice was made (6.)

O, sinner! look to the cross of Jesus, and see that it alone stands between you and a yawning hell (7.)

"See His body, mangled, rent, Stained and covered with his blood," and remember that were it not for His love for you your doom would be forever sealed. Will you slight His offered mercy? (8) Will you choose eternal punishment, while Christ freely took upon Himself the "chastisement of your peace," rather than you should experience that woe? (9)

NOTES BY THE EDITOR OF HERALD OF LIFE.

1. In this statement we have no controversy with "Zion's Herald." We have no doubt of the truth of the doctrine of "eternal punishment," and never have had. Eternal torment is entirely another matter.

2. This statement we consider a pure assumption, without a shadow of Bible authority. No such language as is here employed is found in the Book of God. "An eternity of impending woe" for sinners for whom Christ died! And then Christ's death was "made necessary" by this "eternity of woe." Our Br. leaves the primary cause of this "necessary" death, and contents himself with a secondary cause. Who appointed this "eternity of woe?" Who constituted man so as to make it "necessary" that he should endure an "eternity of woe," if he failed in his trial? Did his Creator do it? Was He obliged to create man so as to run this awful hazard for one transgression? or did He do it of His own free will? If the latter, was He not bound to let this eternity of woe fall on the first transgressor, and not allow him to propagate a race who must inevitably share in that eternal woe, or else provide a remedy against such an inevitable result? Then where is the cause of this "necessary" humiliation and "death of the Son of God?" Is it not a self-evident truth, that justice and righteousness demanded that the Creator should in some way remedy or remove the necessity of Adam's posterity suffering an "eternity of woe?" and if to do that it was "necessary that the Son of God should descend, forsaken of the Father, through the 'valley of the shadow of death,'" the true cause of it was not the fault of Adam's posterity, but it lies back of their birth in the act of creation.

This suggestion may be shocking to our Br. of "Zion's Herald;" but we believe it to be the legitimate and inevitable conclusion from his premises of an inherent immortal soul and an "eternity of woe." His premises are as shocking to us, as our conclusion from them can possibly be to him. We reject both as unscriptural, unreasonable, and as a reproach on God and His government; yes, and stripping our Lord's humiliation and death of all its glory and grandeur; contrived to cover or remedy a defect in creating man. If "an eternity of impending woe" was the birth inheritance of Adam's posterity, God, their Maker, was obliged to provide a way for them to escape it; and that provision is no act of mercy, but was "demanded" by every principle of righteousness and fair dealing; and the Creator could not have been just unless He had made a provision to enable His creatures to escape the "eternity of woe," which our Br. says was "impending" over Adam's race.

Thus "the Cross," with all its attendant and antecedent horrors, dwindles down into a necessity on the part of the Creator; and the theological "hell" annihilates all the glory of the undertaking of Jesus, and casts a dark shade over the wisdom, knowledge, justice, and goodness of God. Such, we repeat it, is the result of the doctrine of inherent immortality and an eternity of woe. From such a position, "Good Lord deliver" those who have fallen into it.

3. We have no controversy with our Br. on this point; for we do not believe, and never have believed, that any "sufferings," however protracted, could take away our sins, or that any "punishment," of whatever character, "could fit us for heaven." Here we are agreed.

4. Here is a grand assumption. It is, that it is utterly impossible for "God to annihilate the sinner;" for "if He could . . . He must exercise His power rather than to permit His dearly Beloved to expire upon the shameful cross."

Thus, according to the theology of "Zion's Herald," God created men, but it is a thing impossible for Him to annihilate them! He had almighty power in creating: yes, even "out of nothing," says theology; but when He had created man, He has no power to reduce him to "nothing;" and thus God ceases to be God; for a being whose power is so limited that he cannot reduce to the original elements anything he has created, is no God. "Zion's Herald" denies this power to God, the Maker of all things; for it says, "If God could, by a stroke of His power, annihilate the sinner . . . He must exercise His power," etc.; plainly affirming that He lacks power!

Here, it is not "the fool that saith in his heart, There is no God;" it is the wise, the intelligent, the pious "Zion's Herald" that saith it; for a God not almighty is no God at all, in the sense in which we call the Creator God. What has led our beloved and highly esteemed Br. of "Zion's Herald" into this labyrinth of atheism? His heart abhors the result as much as ours does; but his theory "drives" him there. His school has long charged us with "infidelity;" but hitherto, through grace, we have been preserved from the shoals and rocks of atheism; and we believe in that God who created the heavens, and the earth, with man upon it, and who is able to "annihilate" anything He has made, if He wills to do it, not excepting "the souls He has made." It is a self-evident truth that,

"He can create and He destroy."

Poor finite mortals, who fancy God has made them, but has not power to unmake or annihilate them, must have the opinion that they are themselves more than a match for their Creator. It is not strange, however, that such should be their conclusion, seeing they have been taught from the cradle that they are inherently immortal.

Let us see if the logic of "Zion's Herald" does not annihilate the theological hell, or the Almighty himself. It stands thus:

If God could annihilate the sinner by His power, He must exercise that power rather than permit His Son to expire on the cross:

But He did permit His Son thus to expire:

Therefore, He had not power to annihilate a creature He had made; and hence is not almighty. He is not the God of the Bible.

Again:

God brought Adam's posterity into existence under an "eternity of impending woe," which was for no personal sins of their own. He constituted them so that His power was not sufficient to annihilate them:

Then they must suffer "an eternity of woe," or God must, of necessity, provide a way to shift the responsibility of such an awful state from Himself on to His creatures: no other way could be devised but for God "to permit His dearly Beloved to expire on the shameful cross:"

Therefore, that "shameful" transaction was a necessity in which the theological God involved himself by the work of creation; or else the theological hell notion is a fable.

Till such a remedy was provided, Adam's posterity were blameless, because they could not possibly save themselves from the "impending woe" under which, by no volition of their own, they came into the world. Without a remedy provided, by availing themselves of which they could avoid "an eternity of woe," the whole blame lies on their Creator, if there is blame at all, and such a "hell" exists as "Zion's Herald" affirms.

Thus the article on which we comment makes it "necessary" for God to inflict on His Son "the shameful cross." The whole responsibility of "an eternity of impending woe," for Adam's children, must rest on their Creator till He has provided a way for them to avoid it, if they will; but no such way was opened till the Son of God—"the Lamb of God"—dies "on the shameful cross." Till that was done, the stain of inflicting "eternal woe" on the helpless creatures He had caused to come into existence, must rest on the theological God himself for giving them "immortal souls," which of necessity must exist eternally, with no possible method provided to escape the "orthodox hell;" and orthodoxy itself will not pretend that Adam's posterity could by any possible means have escaped from "an eternity of woe" unless their Creator had provided just such a remedy as He has.

Thus by their theory the Almighty is "annihilated" or is made powerless to vindicate His work of creation without subjecting His Son to just such horrors and death as the article in "Zion's Herald" speaks of.

We come to the conclusion that the God described by that article and the hell of it, are alike a fiction: an invention of ignorance and superstition, unknown to prophets, Jesus Christ, or His apostles; serving only the purpose of evil to the world and to the character of the true God.

5. To the sentiments of this sentence we respond a hearty approval.

6. Change the word "hell," in this sentence, to death—for "the wages of sin is death," Rom. vi., 23—and we agree with this, also, so far as the necessities of the perishing children of Adam are concerned; not because "an eternity of impending woe" was hanging over them; but because men were going out of life without hope of a future life—their whole nature was perishable; no element of deathlessness existed in it. It was not "eternal woe" that "demanded the atoning blood;" it was God's love for a perishing world that provided a way of future and eternal life, by means of the humiliation, death, and resurrection of His Son; and strange to tell, theologians have so magnified hell and its torments that they seem to place no importance on the resurrection of Christ. Not a word does "Zion's Herald's" article say of the resurrection of Christ—the great crowning work to open the way for man's redemption; without which His death itself would have been of no avail for our renemption from sin and death. Why this overlooking of the great event on which Apostles dwelt so much, while not one of them ever mention "an eternity of woe," or make use of any like expressions? The great Apostle to the Gentiles, in all his preaching and epistles, never uses the term hell, nor the term hades but once, and then in no such sense as theologians now employ it, and our translators made it grave in that place. 1 Cor. xv., 55.

7. We rather "think there is more poetry than truth" (as Dr. Bagnall, of the M. E. Church, once said of "one of our hymns") in this sentence. Christ raised from the dead, and standing in the Holy of Holies—even in heaven itself as our Mediator—"stands between" sinners and the execution of the death penalty; and from thence offers them eternal life; and remonstrates against their neglect by saying, "Why will ye die?" "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life." Life—eternal life—(is the great motive) made sure, to those who believe, by the promise and resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. It is not "a yawning hell," or "an eternity of woe," on which apostles dwelt; but a resurrection from the dead to immortality, incorruptibility by Christ, at the last trump.

8. We heartily join in this earnest appeal to the sinner.

9. Does this writer believe "Christ took upon Himself an eternity of woe, rather than" men "should experience that woe?" If so, will he tell us when that "eternity" ended, or is Christ still in it?

We believe that we have read in an old Book, somewhere, that "His soul was not left in hell." If so, He did not get into "an eternity of woe," unless eternity means "three days and three nights!" and if He escaped from hell after He was in it, it is certain there is a way out; and as "He took upon Himself the 'chastisement of our peace' rather than the sinner should experience that woe," it is certain the "chastisement" is not "an eternity of woe," whatever else it may be; i. e., using the word eternity in the popular sense. "Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures;" and "He was raised again from the dead," the third day, "for our justification;" Rom. iv., 25, and 1 Cor. xv., 3: so that those who believe in Him are to be delivered from the "hell" of death's dominion; not "an eternity of woe." Those who reject Christ, will remain in death's dominion, or "the congregation of the dead," endlessly. Prov. xxi., 16. Such is the doom of those who "will not come to Christ thatt hey may have life." God's love provided a way out of death's dominion, and Christ opened that way by His own death and resurrection; and has "the keys of death and hades." He only can open those gates; there is no other way out; there is no immortality short of a resurrection from the dead "at the last day."

"A MAN OF STRAW."

HAVING shown, last week, that the disuse or abandonment of the phrase "immortal soul" by the previous and present editors of the "Advent Herald," of Boston, is a mere ruse to cover a defeat, while they held to, or still hold to the thing which the phrase signifies, we will now proceed to show how they attempt to escape the plain sense of the text "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." John vi., 53, 54. Our readers will see that our respected friend, the present editor of the "Advent Herald" follows in the strain of Br. Litch in the dialogue we gave last week, in talking about "existence," as if we had ever held that the phrase "eternal life" meant "mere existence." That idea is "a man of straw," manufactured by the trio of editors of that paper to cover the nakedness of the thing they refuse to call by its right name. Says the present editor of the "Advent Herald," whom we will call Br. O., to save words:

We do not confound the "life" here spoken of with mere existence. Some of those who first heard Christ utter these words did not eat his flesh and drink his blood, yet they had existence. Wicked men before the flood existed on earth many centuries, yet they had "no life" in them in the sense of the text.

The first sentence is an insinuation that we, of the HERALD OF LIFE, do confound the "life" here spoken of with mere existence. If Br. O. has such a thought, we shall take pleasure in helping him out of his mistake. Did he ever think that life, whatever else it may include, necessarily, and first of all, includes, existence, living existence? "Life," then, in the text, includes such existence: but it includes something more—it includes unending existence, or life that is eternal.

That the term life is sometimes used in an accommodated or figurative sense is true, and so are all other terms; but when that is the case it is manifest that no other sense is consistent with the intent of the speaker. That wicked men in Christ's day and before the flood had existence, is true; but that they had eternal existence, even Br. O. may not find it so easy to prove; for the Saviour saith of those sinners in Noah's day, "The flood came and destroyed them all." Luke xvii., 27. It will not be so easy to prove they had eternal existence in the face of this testimony.

That our Lord, in John vi., 53, 54, was not talking of life in a figurative sense, the whole context proves; and there is no necessity for understanding his language in that sense unless it can be proved that natural men are now endowed with unending existence. That is a point never yet proved and never can be unless men are wiser than the revealing Spirit of God, and know more of a life hereafter than the Bible reveals. Will Br. O. pretend that the term dead, in this chapter, is used in a figurative sense? Jesus said to the Jews, ver. 49, "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness and are dead." Can any candid man put any other construction on this language than that which appears on its face? That of a literal state of death, cessation of conscious existence? And, in fact, does it not exclude them from a revival into life? Dr. Adam Clarke, in his comments on this text, says:

"It was an opinion of the Jews themselves, that their fathers who perished in the wilderness should never have a resurrection." On verse 39, Dr. C. says: "The Jews believed that the wicked should have no resurrection; and that the principle that led to the resurrection of the body in the righteous was the indwelling Spirit of God. This is positively asserted in the Shir Hashirim. See Schoetgen."

When our Lord addressed the Jews and said, "Your fathers," etc., "are dead," did he not plainly confirm their belief that those who died in the wilderness, under the judgment of God for their sins, were literally dead past a resurrection? He then adds: "This is the bread [I am that bread of life, ver. 48,] which came down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die:" not die as their fathers had done, but "I will raise him up at the last day." That is surely giving him literal life, and not a figurative one.

The use Br. O. has made of the term "life" in the text under consideration, necessitates a corresponding meaning to the terms "dead" and "not die;" and as he maintains all men are by nature in a figurative dead state (i. e., dead in sin), our Lord's words to the Jews amount to a declaration that if they eat of him they shall not die in a moral sense, when in fact they were already dead in that sense. Thus we have "confusion worse confounded."

Our Lord adds, "If any man eat of this bread he shall live forever," which shows in what sense he uses the term "life" in the text under consideration: it is clearly a life that is unending, or eternal life, which no man has without becoming a partaker of Christ, set forth by the figure of speech, "eat my flesh and drink my blood," which he after explains by saying, "The flesh profiteth nothing"—"It is the Spirit that quickeneth," etc.; and Peter responds, "Thou hast the words of eternal life."

That eternal life involves spiritual life, or the "life of God," is true; for no created being has eternal life, or an unending existence, without the "life of God" in him; that life only constitutes any man incorruptible, or undying-deathless; so that the man who is not "joined unto the Lord," having not the Spirit of God in him, is only mortal; and continuing in that condition will, sooner or later, return to the dust from which he was taken; his life or breath will be withdrawn by Him who gave it, and he "utterly perish in his own corruption"—"he has no life in him," no power to perpetuate life; "he is like the beasts that perish." 2 Pet. ii., 12; Psa. xlix., 12, 14, 20.

This "is so plainly taught, that all the sophistry of the synagogue of" editors, and other "erring good men, cannot overthrow it." This may seem strong language, but we have only quoted Br. O.'s words, where, speaking of those who have not "the life of God," he says:

The wicked have neither "salvation," "redemption," nor "life," nor have they a promise of being raised up "at the last day" of this dispensation, as the righteous have John vi., 39, 40, 44.; 1 Cor. xv., 23; 1 Thess iv., 16. But that they will be raised (though at a later period) is so plainly taught, that all the sophistry of the synagogue of Satan, and of erring good men cannot overthrow it.

We let this strong assumption pass for what it is worth, remarking that Br. O. and the rest of his school have to find a day after the "last day," and so add to, or "make void the words of God to establish their own traditions." Not one text in the Bible states that the wicked dead shall be "raised at a later period" than the righteous; not even the famous one so relied on in Rev. xx.; and that is the only one out of which even a pretence can be be made of a "later period" resurrection of the wicked dead. Truly, that must be a desperate cause which is founded on one text, and that saying not a word of the wicked dead.

If the wicked dead are raised into a living existence at all, they are raised in the same hour—"the hour"—in which the righteous are; and this "is so plainly taught, that all the sophistry of the synagogue of" editors in Christendom "cannot overthrow it." But Br. O. admits, only the righteous are to be raised "at the last day," yet adds, "of this dispensation."

Throughout the entire discourse, in John vi., Jesus speaks of the resurrection of none but those who believe in him; and says of such, "I will raise him up at the last day." Where will Br. O. get in "of this dispensation?" Jesus gives no hint of that kind. It is the resurrection of which he speaks, and says, it is "at the last day:" no qualification, as if there was another day, "time or season," for another revival of dead ones; that is a gratuitous assumption of wicked resurrectionists. Paul tells us it is "at the last trump . . . the dead are raised," and that "they are raised in glory." Is there another trump after "the last" in which somebody is to be raised otherwise than in glory?

But we do not wish to press Br. O. too much, lest his "intention" not "to be drawn into a newspaper war with this New York editor," might be changed so as to cause him to enter the conflict too soon for his amunition.

Now, Br. O., we assure you, though we have spoken somewhat plainly, we entertain only love and esteem for yourself, personally.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

1. "WHAT was the penality of the law from which Christ delivers us?"

ANS.—Death. Rom. vi., 23; John iii., 15.

2. "If Christ had not died, would the whole human race have been obliged to suffer the penalty eternally?"

ANS.—"As in Adam all die, so in Christ shall be made alive." 1 Cor. xv., 32. Hence we conclude that without Christ none of Adam's posterity would ever have seen life after dying: but now, by him, every child of Adam will have a resurrection—the character of which will depend upon the character of the individual himself.

We take the forgoing from the "Voice of the West," of June 1st. In the answer to the first question, we see no cause for dissent. In answering the second question, the text is imperfectly quoted; not intentionally, we presume. The conclusion of the "Voice" is two fold: 1, "Without Christ none of Adam's posterity would ever have seen life after dying." That conclusion is an undoubted truth with us. If so, who shall "see life after dying" now that Christ did come? 2, The "Voice" says, "every child of Adam will have a resurrection," etc. This is an inference from the text defectively quoted. The text is 1 Corth. xv., 22, and reads, "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."

Two or three suggestions naturally arise. All men by natural generation are in Adam: by that paternal relation death follows as a natural result. Are all men by re-generation in Christ? or does He stand in a paternal relation to all men, so that the resurrection life in Him flows through them as Adam's life flowed in his posterity? If Christ does not stand in the paternal, or re-generating relation to all men, as Adam did as a generator, then how does the "even so" affect the question at issue? We think the answer is simple and plain. Death and perish, in their primary sense, are synonymous terms. The "Voice" admits death would have been eternal but for Christ, and that none would ever have seen life after dying. Now that Christ has come, how is the case changed? Let the Son of God answer: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish," etc. John iii., 16.

Clearly, Christ does not change, or alter the condition of those who believe not: they "perish," or "death" abides on them as if no provision had ever been made for their redemption from death. A man must be in Christ by re-generation as he was in Adam by generation, or else he has no resurrection life in him; and the expression "even so" requires this construction, and will not admit of any other.

Paul is talking of those who have "fallen asleep in Christ"—having the new life principle in them. He is not talking of the other men who have only the life derived by natural generation. He distinguishes himself and fellow believers from them by saying, "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable;" verse 19: and in the previous verses had said, "if there is no resurrection . . . then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." But Christ's resurrection had changed the prospects of those in Him; "for as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." What all? Clearly those "all" who had or should "fall asleep in Christ:" none others. The whole chapter shows the apostle was speaking of the reliving of such only; for he goes on to tell us how they shall be made alive (we follow the Syriac and Wakefield): "They are sown in corruption; they are raised in incorruption. They are sown in dishonor; they are raised in glory. There is a body of the animal life, and there is a body of the spirit" . . . "the dead shall be raised incorruptible," etc.

Thus it is seen, that whatever may be said of the resurrection of the wicked dead elsewhere, not a word of it is found in 1 Corth. xv.; and the construction attempted to be forced upon the language of verse 22, by the advocates of such resurrection, conflicts with the apostle's entire argument and conclusions.

We have noticed the questions and answers, at the head of these remarks, in no spirit of hostility to any one, personally; but in love for the truth and a desire to vindicate the gospel from the idea, which inevitably results from the answer to the second question above, that the gospel brings in a hopeless state of horror and woe, second only to the notion of "eternal woe." Without Christ, according to the theory we oppose, the wicked would have enjoyed what there is of this life, and gone to a quiet and unbroken sleep in death. With Him, horrors untold are to follow, by a resurrection, and after an unknown period of hopeless sufferings they must die again.

P. S.—Eighteen years ago, before we embraced the doctrine of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, we wrote, and published in the "Bible Examiner," as follows:

Certain it is, that the resurrection of the wicked is not the subject of this chapter. It is the resurrection of those who have "fallen asleep in Christ" that Paul is speaking of throughout the chapter. The resurrection of the wicked is no part of his argument. He is speaking of those in Christ in distinction from "all" other "men:" see verse 19. He first shows the certainty of Christ's resurrection from many and infallible witnesses. This point settled, it follows inevitably that all the members of Christ's body will also come up from the dead, their union with Christ, or being in him, as certainly drawing after it life—eternal life—as their union with Adam the first inevitably draws after it death, or dissolution. Hence he says—"For since [or, by means of] man [viz: Adam the first] came death [upon all who were in him, viz: all men], by man [Adam the second, or Christ, shall come] also [or in like manner] the resurrection of the dead [who have "fallen asleep in Christ:" verse 18;] for [gar—for example] as in Adam [by being in union with Adam] all die, even so [in like manner, those] in Christ shall all be made alive."

This 22d verse is purely explanatory of the preceding; and as the preceding is entirely an argument relating to the resurrection of Christ and those who have "fallen asleep in him," we have no right to construe the Apostle's words to include the whole human family. It was not the Apostle's method, in any of his epistles, to illustrate any subject by a reference to the resurrection of the wicked, but the reverse. In 1 Thess. iv., 14, he speaks of the same subject thus: "If we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." Where did God bring Jesus from? Paul answers, Heb. xiii., 20, "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ," etc.

The subject then is clear God brought up Christ from the dead, and will just as certain bring up all that sleep in him. It is no more certain that we all die by being in Adam than it is that all who are in Christ will be made alive by that union, and die no more—"death" will have "no more dominion over" them, than it hath over the head of the body—viz: Christ. As "he dieth no more," so his members will die no more. How important and precious is Christ; and how indispensible is union with him to secure a resurrection to life eternal.

NOTE.—Since the foregoing was in type the "Prophetic Times" has come to hand, and we find in it an extract from remarks of "Rev. J. T. Berg, D. D.," on the text 1 Cor. xv., 22, in which he says:

"The phrase (en Christo), in Christ, is a technical term in Paul's writings, and always denotes the state of a believer." "I am justified in saying that Paul, in the course of his Epistles, uses these expressions not less than one hundred and twenty-three times; and in not a single passage, in which en Christo is used by him, does it mean anything but that which Paul indicates, when he says: 'If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature.' This is the key-text which opens the meaning in every instance."

Dr. Berg's testimony on this text is all the more valuable because a believer in the resurrection of the wicked. But this text can never by any impartial criticism be made to support the idea of their revival into life.

"THEY MAKE NO CONVERTS."

IT is often urged as a reason why the peculiar view advocated by believers in no future life to the impenitent is not true, that men are not converted to Christianity under the labors of those who hold that sentiment.

There may be an apparent reason for the above charge. If so, it arises from the following misapprehensions. First, it is possible that those who prefer this charge may be laboring under a misunderstanding as to what constitutes a genuine Christian conversion. While we have not the slightest objection to the bringing to our assistance, in the all-important work of saving men from death, any helps that will really push forward this work, still we do object to substituting anything, be that thing what it may, for the divine arrangement. If God has devised, and published to the world, a definite plan by which he designs to save lost men, no system or arrangement that ignores that plan can be successful in the accomplishment of the desired work.

No one thing is more clearly revealed in the holy Scriptures than this, that all genuine conversions are brought about through the direct instrumentality of divine truth.

Illustrative of this principle, we cite a few texts of holy writ. "Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth." James i., 18. "For in Christ Jesus I have begotten you through the gospel." 1 Cor. iv., 15. "Being born (begotten) again . . . by the word of God." 1 Peter i., 23. "Sanctify them through thy truth." John xvii., 17. "Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you." John xv., 3.

We have in these few quotations the direct and positive testimony of James, Peter, Paul, and Jesus, that genuine Christian conversion can never be reached except through the agency of truth.

No matter, then, how great an excitement may be got up through our efforts, if men are not brought to a knowledge of the truth there is not the slightest real evidence of genuine conversion. No matter how great may be our ecstacies, under the influence of that excitement, our happy feelings are no good evidence that we are Christians, unless we "rejoice in the truth." Now, we have known of an Advent preacher, who is a "noted revivalist," who in the work of "making converts," presents the anxious seats, invites people forward to take them and "get religion," and in that invitation uses language similar to the following: "We don't want to make Adventists of you; we don't want to make you believe as we do; but we want to make Christians of you." This amounts to saying that the truth of God, which he professes to believe, is of no importance whatever in the work of making men Christians. Here lies the misconception with our accusers. Did they see as we see, and as the Bible plainly teaches, that in the absence of truth there can be no such thing as gospel conversion, they would then know the reason why some men choose to "preach the word" rather than descend to the use of mere human machinery in an endeavor to add men to "our party." They would also learn the reason why so many of the converts they "make" endure for so short a time.

It is better to persuade one man to receive the truth of God in his heart, written there by the eternal Spirit, and thereby he become a genuine Christian, than by a system of hot-house sensationalism get forty men into a religious paroxysm who will forget it in a day, and like the sow that was washed, return to her wallowing in the mire.

A second cause for misapprehension on the part of our reprovers is this: our preachers, as a general thing, prefer to use their motive power in a legitimate effort in pushing forward the car of truth, rather than in blowing the trumpet of their own well doing. We choose not to load our paper down with the great achievements we have made at the expense of a commendable Christian modesty. And when we see a paper filled with what "I have done" in this place or that, whether it comes from the pen of the editor or any one else, we never mistake egotism for holy zeal in the cause of God.

When we read from one to three columns in a religious paper from the pen of one man, telling what mighty works do show forth themselves in him, and find a portion of those same "notes by the way" made up of bitter invectives, couched in coarse, vulgar language, against those who barely differ from him on this one point, to wit, the wicked dead will not be made alive from the dead for the sole purpose of making them dead, we conclude that if their converts are possessed of the same spirit that actuates the converter, they will need something of a more thorough nature, or at least of a better quality, done for them in order to fit them for a future life.

There are some among us who have labored in the gospel ministry for years in the past, and have seen very clear and hopeful conversions, and that, too, not a few, whose names have never once been seen appended to any article, written for any paper, telling what they had done.

A fair proportion of these conversions to God have been through the direct agency of preaching the great truth "future life only to them that believe," to be given at the second appearing of the great LIFE-GIVER.

If others choose to sound the trumpet of their own great and good doings, in order that it "may be seen of men" that they "make converts," we shall let them do so, and "have their reward." But our object shall be to so preach and practice the glorious truth, the gospel of Christ, that we may find favor with God in this present time, and an endless life in the earth made new.

WALKING IN CHRIST.

"As ye have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in him."—Col. ii., 6.

WHEN in the course of our investigations we have become convinced that certain tenets held by the different denominations of which we have been members are untrue, being out of harmony with the Bible, the only true standard by which we are to try all questions of a theological character, and have abandoned those positions or tenets for the truth as it is in Jesus, the text we have quoted above has often been urged as a reason why we should remain in the old position.

The intent for which it is quoted amounts to this, You having received Christ Jesus as a Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian, or what not, it is binding on you, according to this injunction of the apostle, to walk in Christ Jesus in the particular sectarian denomination of which you are a member.

There would be some plausibility in this application of the text if it could be proved that we have received Christ Jesus as Methodists, Baptists, etc. The most that can be claimed for these different organizations is, that each of them is only a part of a great whole, and that great whole, in the aggregate, is the church, or body of Christ. This being conceded, it legitimately follows that making a man a Baptist or any other ist, does not of necessity make him a Christian. In other words, if an individual can be a Christian and be a member of either of the so called evangelical churches, becoming a member of any particular theological organization does nothing whatever toward making men Christians. But we claim more than this, to wit, that no individual by getting into Christ was ever made a sectarian. We have in our younger days watched the progress of many religious excitements in different denominations, and where different denominations were united in a union effort, and we do not exaggerate when we say that in every case of real conversion to God, the subjects of that change, without one exception, had just as good fellowship for, loved Christians just as well, whether they were of one denomination or another, or whether they belonged to none at all. We have seen a large company of converts meet day after day, and week after week, and manifest, in all their religious intercourse with each other, that perfect oneness which the great Head of the church prayed might always exist among his followers. And at that time not one of them had connected him or herself with any religious sect or party.

We have watched this company until, under the lead of the recruiting agents from different sectarian encampments, the union has been broken, and this loving band separated into two, three, four, or more parties, as the case might be. How was it after this work of dividing had been consummated? We answer, if the whole thing did not generate into sectarian hate, which sometimes it did, the union was effectually broken, and Methodists loved Methodists, Baptists loved Baptists, Congregationalists loved Congregationalists; and just in proportion as this sectarian love increased, sectarian hatred and envy grew apace. We have seen more than one genuine revival brought to a sudden terminus by the bitter contention that arose about dividing the spoils of war.

The question arises, "Is Christ divided?" Is not this really saying, "I am of Paul, and I of Cephas, and I of Apollos?" Paul says all such people are carnal. God, then, has never chosen us to be members of any sectarian organization, be that organization simple or complex. The legitimate fruit of all ecclesiastical organizations upon its members is carnality. Some may escape this necessary consequence, but if there be spiritual members in any sectarian organization under heaven, their spirituality is not the result of holding that connection, but in spite of it, with a vast odds against them.

Another legitimate fruit of sectarian organism is to dwarf men in their faith. If we become a member of such a compact, everything beyond what "our creed" reads is, of course, heresy. Being heresy, any who transcend the limits of "our creed" must have visited on their heads all the horrors of ecclesiastical ostracism. No matter what name the organization has taken, there never yet was brought into ecclesiastical existence a single religious organized party, but has exercised intolerance to the extent of excluding from their particular fellowship all who in their estimation held heretical views, and would make those views public by talking them in their different assemblies.

This statement applies as strictly to Advent organizations as to any other. When this course is pursued, it is virtually claiming infallibility in matters pertaining to Christian faith.

With all these evidences before us, we remark that if, with respect to organized sectarian churches, we walk in Christ as we received him, we shall never accept a membership in any of them. We shall never bind our conscience with sectarian cords, but occupy a position where, unrestrained by any man or body of men, we can believe God for ourselves, and freely speak the truth we believe, with none to say to us, Thus far shalt thou talk and no more. We shall be ever found in the open field of investigation, obeying that positive injunction of the New Testament which commands us to "Grow in grace and in the knowledge of the truth." We shall be found in the path of the just, which "shineth more and more, even to the perfect day;" instead of graduating under the leading of sectarian apron-strings, though the apron be worn by "the youngest daughter;" we shall remain in the school of Christ until the day of immortality, when we shall no longer "see through a glass darkly," but enter on the maturity of perfected knowledge in a world where all the imperfections of this present age will be exchanged for the completed work of an immortal, glorified restitution. May we be ready.

ACTS XXI., 15.

"After three days we took up our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem."

UPON this verse Dean Trench remarks that "CARRIAGE is a constant word in the English of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries for baggage, being that which men carry, and not, as now, that which carries them."

AN EXTRACT.

Luke x., 17, 18. "And the seventy returned with joy, saying, Lord, even the demons are subject to us through thy name. And he said unto them, I beheld Satan as lightning falls from heaven."

UPON these words Dr. Lardner writes that they "cannot be taken literally: for by 'heaven' understand the supreme heaven, the place of the blessed: and it is allowed by all, that Satan, with his angels, was long before driven thence, and could have no access there. Nor can it be hereby intended, that Christ saw Satan fall like lightning from the upper region of the air: for that is a thing of no moment. The words therefore figuratively represent the speedy overthrow of error, falsehood, idolatry, and sin, by the preaching of the gospel, accompanied with mighty signs and wonders, done by the Apostles, and others, in the name of Jesus Christ."

PREPARATION FOR DEATH.

ON a day set apart for the celebration of some great event, how anxious are the people to get in time to the place appointed; and what earnestness may be traced in every countenance? And should not Christians watch, with at least equal solicitude, for the hour in which their Lord shall come, that they may not be ashamed before him? A heart deceived by sin may suggest many arguments against this holy earnestness, but they are the reasonings of folly. The language of Christ is express and continually urgent, "What I say unto you I say unto all, Watch." Almost every day affords an instance of some one hurried into eternity on a sudden. "You know not what hour our Lord doth come." Give me grace, O Lord, to live always as if I heard that solemn voice sounding continually in my ears, "Awake, ye dead, and come to judgment!" That so at length when the Bridegroom cometh, I may be found with my lamp burning, ready to go in with Him to the feast. Holy Spirit make and keep me ready for my Lord's glorious appearing! O Jesus, may I meet Thee with joy and holy triumph at Thy coming!—Bogatsky.

The above is but an illustration of an alarmingly wide spread tendency to make meaningless the teachings of the holy Scriptures. If death and the coming of Christ are equivalent terms, how unmeaning the language of Mary to Jesus: "Lord, if thou had'st been here my brother had not died." John xi., 32.

By what just law of interpretation can the warning of Jesus to "watchfulness, be applied to death? If the coming of the Bridegroom can be made to mean the event of death, then the first coming of Christ has the same meaning, and the record of his passion, may mean his coming; and thus the mind is confused in the use of Bible language, and we are left to conjecture what the sacred writers mean in their communications to us.

Why will not religious teachers imitate Paul, in "renouncing the hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth commending themselves to every man's conscience in the sight of God?" 2 Cor. iv, 2. Then they could truthfully say, as he did: "For we are not as many which deal deceitfully with the word of God, but as of sincerity, but as of God, in the sight of God speak we in Christ." 2 Cor. ii., 17.

FROM L. F. MOORE.

SOMERSVILLE, CONN., June 4, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I have for some time been investigating the question of "No Life out of Christ," and have finally come to the conclusion that there is none. I am now ready to defend the position and to stand to it.

In the fore part of last January, I wrote an article for the "Crisis," entitled "Truth." In it I said that I had failed to see some certain points discussed or met. The principal point in the article is made from Gal. iii., 13. "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law," etc. I endeavored to maintain that the law spoken of was the law of sin and death separate and distinct from the law in the Garden; but, upon consulting with some, I am informed that the apostle simply means, that Christ hath redeemed us from keeping the law of Moses, because by that we could not be justified. So this, my last stronghold, was completely destroyed, and I am left to the inevitable conclusion that there is No Life out of Christ. More anon. In hope of Life.

H. A. CROSS, Kalamazoo, Mich., writes: I am living so happy in the belief that I am to receive a future life through Christ, by a resurrection from the dead, and I feel so thankful that I ever investigated this blessed truth for myself, and that God has aided me by His blessed Spirit in searching for the truth, that I am very anxious to have this glorious gospel taught to all willing minds. I have many friends who are yet burdened with "immortal-soul-ism" and its associated errors, and I feel at times as if I could not bear to have them live under such delusions, and I am striving in one way and another to lead them to the truth as taught in the Scriptures. I would be glad to help you more by the aid of money, and shall do all I can. My prayer is that God may enable you to work on in spreading the truth, "There remaineth a rest for the people of God."

"I WILL SEE YOU AGAIN."

"I WILL see you again," says a dear friend, as he presses the hand of one in deep trial. "I will see you again, when it will be in my power to help you. Should I remain with you now it would not be so well for you, but in a little while I will see you again, and will relieve you from all this deep distress."

Thus said the great Bridegroom of the Church as he was about to leave her, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, that ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice; and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy." "I will see you again and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you."

These words, "I will see you again," are the hope of the sorrowing spouse of Christ in his "her hour" of "sorrow." They come with thrilling joy to her heart as she yearns for rest beyond this state of travail. "I will see you again;" how she dwells upon them and longs for their fulfilment. Your sister in the holy longing,

TENDERNESS.

WE may talk, says Nettleton, of the best means of doing good, but, after all, the greatest difficulty lies in doing it in a proper spirit. Speaking the truth in love, in meekness instructing those that oppose themselves, with the meekness and gentleness of Christ.

I have known anxious sinners drop the subject of religion in consequence of a preacher addressing them in an angry tone. I never was fit, says Payson, to say a word to a sinner except I had a broken heart myself, when I was subdued and melted into tenderness, and felt as though I had just received pardon to my own soul, and when my heart was full of tenderness and pity.

THE INFLUENCES OF SLEEP.

IN Dr. Bushnell's volume on the "Moral Influences of Dark Things," we find this truthful and suggestive passage: "After some years prejudices begin to be tired of being slept over. Jealousies rankle as long as they stay, but they get tired of staying; when we do not stay with them, but go to sleep over them. We cannot hate an enemy, save intermittently, but have to begin again every morning, which we have less and less appetite for and finally come to like that morning best that does not begin at all. Were it not for this arrangement our malignities might burn us up. But the taking away our consciousness is a kind of compulsory Sabbath or truce of God. No hatred burns in the unconscious man; no revenge or jealousy hovers on his face in that soft hour of oblivion. If he went to bed heated by an ugly conversation, if he was severe and bitter in his judgments, if all charities were scorched away by his fierce denunciations, he will rise cool and sweet as the morning, and the gentle cheer of his voice will show that he is clear of his bad humor and likes to have it known. A man must be next to a devil who wakes angry. After his unconscious Sabbath, he begins another day, and every day is Monday. How beautifully thus are we drawn by this kind economy of sleep to the exercise of all good dispositions. The acrid and sour ingredients of evil, the grudges, the wounds of feeling, the hypochondriac suspicions, the black torments of misanthropy, the morose fault-findings, are so far tempered and sweetened by God's gentle discipline of sleep, that we probably do not even conceive how demoniacally bitter they would be if no such kind interruptions broke their spell."

NOTICE.

THE Adventists of Providence, R. I., who desire a free gospel, have hired Wabossett Hall, No. 62 Wabossett st., where we invite all of God's servants who travel this way to give us a call and preach the gospel of the kingdom without regard to sect or party. Appointments may be sent to either of the committee, and brethren coming to the city from abroad can call upon either of the committee and find a home while they stay in the place.

We are poor, but will do what we can to help brethren on their way. The brethren who formerly worshipped at New Market Hall, meet with us, and we invite all who desire a free meeting to come in with us to worship the Lord of Hosts in spirit and in truth, and get ready for the coming of Christ in his kingdom.

GRACE GREENWOOD has sold her "Little Pilgrim" to Alfred L. Sewell & Co., Publishers of the "The Little Corporal," of Chicago. The Pilgrim has been published as a children's magazine for over fifteen years, and has been a popular juvenile, but will now stop "pilgrimaging" on his own account, and hereafter be an "aide" to the conquering Western Napoleon, The Little Corporal, the well deserved circulation of which was even before this addition larger than that of any other juvenile magazine in the world. Grace Greenwood still writes for it. The July number begins a new volume, and we advise our friends to send on to the publishers at once, one dollar, which is the price for one year, and give their children this unique, original magazine, which has no superior anywhere. Those who subscribe during June, will receive the June number extra.

BY MRS. L. R. K. BISHOP.

[Published by request.]

God bless him, aged, venerable saint!
  And hedge him round with truth, as hitherto.
Yea, and he shall be blessed, e'en to old age;
  Thy hand hath guided him, 'twill lead him through.

God of the patriarchs! deal gently now,
  Oh, smooth the path his aged feet must tread;
Let flowers of richest fragrance strew the way,
  And softest sunlight crown his reverend head.

Not yet, unclasp the helmet from his brow;
  Still let his sword first in the conflict be;
Only permit his gladdened heart to say,
  "I, and the children thou hast given me!"

Alone, in tears, he soweth the precious seed;
  Broadcast he scattered it in manhood's prime:
Now let him see the fields of golden grain,
  That promise countless sheaves at harvest time.

And when truth's honored champion is crowned,
  And the glad harvest shouting shall begin,
Unworthy now his sandals to unloose,

BOYS, YOU ARE WATCHED.

A GROUP of men, at the opening of the State legislature, were talking of the applicants for position in the various offices in the gift of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Of course, there were a good many applying, and there must be some disappointment falling somewhere; and they were canvassing the matter to make it as nearly right all around as possible.

There were two desiring the same place in the Senate chamber, both boys, verging into manhood—one the son of a high State official, the other the son of an officer who had died in the army in the late civil war. He had already performed the duties of the place he sought again.

This is the substance of remarks made, showing the truth of the assertion at the head of this article.

"Well, gentlemen, I think J—— ought to have this place, or a better one, if we can give it. He isn't a governor's son, and he hasn't any great friends to push him; but a boy who will do as he did at the last session—not spending his earnings on himself, never seen with a cigar in his mouth, or strutting along the street in dandy clothes, but quiet, and well-behaved, saving all his money and carrying it home and giving it to his mother—that boy, I say, deserves as good a place as we con give him." And so, though he had not that place he did get one as good, and probably better.

Now, boys, these words are for you. Nothing is more certain than, if this boy had given way to the temptation assailing those who are on the boundary line or the deba table ground between boyhood and manhood—if he had learned to smoke and been seen smoking, if he had strutted in stunning and flashy clothes, if he had been all that is so well understood as comprehended in the term "fast," if he had not honored his mother—a precious, praying mother at home—and been a quiet, modest, pure-minded, gentlemanly boy, he never could have secured the appointment that now enables him to help this mother again.

He did not know that he was watched particularly. Probably he was not. But men are unconsciously observing; if not with the purpose of influencing future conduct, yet future conduct is influenced, as in this case. The character earned by him by his simple, unaffected ways and dress, by his filial affection and faithfulness, stood him in good stead; and because those who had watched him approved of what they saw in him they help him all they can.—Selected.

THE GOLDEN KEY.

IT was a stormy December day, and Lucy's aunt was seated by the table at work. Lucy was perched in her favorite seat by the window, watching the soft white snow-flakes as they fluttered gracefully to the ground, covering with their fleecy mantle every rough, unsightly thing, and making the broad earth a scene of purity and beauty. She was so very quiet that her aunt at length looked up anxiously, and said, "What are you thinking of, my darling?" The thoughtful look passed from her bright face, and the sunny smile came back again as she threw herself in her aunt's arms and exclaimed, "I was thinking, aunty, that I have found a golden key that unlocks everybody's heart to me. Can you guess what it is, aunty?"

Her aunt smiled and shook her head.

"It is only one little word—'Please.' If I say, 'Please give me a piece of bread and butter, Nora,' she says, 'Yes, Miss,' and takes her hands out of the suds and goes and gets it at once. John says she is cross. But she is never cross to me. I think one reason is because I try not to vex her.

"Sometimes John says to her, 'Get my slippers instantly,' no matter what she is doing; and she answers back in loud and angry words; and John says she is the crossest person he ever saw. Don't you think, aunty, if John used the golden key she would be kind and pleasant to him, too?"

"Yes, my love, and if they would both remember that a 'soft answer turneth away wrath,' and act accordingly, I think there would very soon cease to be harsh words between them. There are few persons so thoroughly bad that they cannot be won by kindness. Even dumb animals are not insensible to its influence. If you should beat Fido, or speak sharply to him, do you think he would show the same affection for you that he now does? If my little girl will always keep in her possession the precious golden key which she has been so fortunate as to find thus early, she will never want friends, and, in trying to make those around her happy, will insure a never-failing source of happiness herself."

Dear young reader, do you not desire to secure this beautiful golden key which Lucy so prized, and whose magic influence made her happy and beloved?—Selected.

HOW ARE THE DEAD RAISED?

BY ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

"With what body do they come?" 1 Cor. xv., 35,

THE apostle accepts the position of teacher, and proposes for the man who learns a question—a very important one indeed—if the heathen ignorance of the divine plan is to be allowed to occupy a position in the discussion; but altogether, if the intelligent Christian idea of a resurrection through Christ, as the divine force, is to be taken into the account, that is the reason why the inspired man speaks so earnestly, and with seeming impatience, at least, with professional authority, when he replies, "Thou fool, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."

The question, in the first place, refers to power and manner: "How are the dead raised up?" In this, there could be no disagreement with Christians who were disposed to follow the Word. The heathen could, of course, see no power to do it. But it would not be thought a thing incredible with Christian men, that "God should raise the dead." Then the manner would be plainly a living of the man after he had been dead; and, consequently, a bodily form—a tangible existence. The force of this question will be seen if we consider that some disputed a literal resurrection in Paul's day. Some said it was all past. And if at the same time we remember that some now say that the resurrection is a spiritual thing; some again that a man is raised when he dies, and the many vagaries which befog the subject in the hands of worldly theologians, a learner might inquire, "How are they raised up?" and well might a professor, like the apostle, exclaim at the folly of such. Will they be the same class of beings then as now? and will they be properly referred to the same elements? "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die." Mark that the being must be dead to be quickened; and hence the resurrection of the dead is the living again of those who are dead. Then as the wheat is really dead in the ground before its future life in the blade and the ear, so the man is really dead before his future life; and that life must show him in his own identity.

All this being clear, the apostle cuts off all idea of germination, of atomic preservation—all keeping of an indestructible part—by answering the second question, as well as forever to give the quietus to the doctrine of the mortal resurrection of man. "With what body do they come?"

1. This presents, in the strongest possible light, the reality of their coming, and so, as one of old said, he will "see for himself, and not another." It will be the same man. They will come. As the apostle proceeds on this principle, with a certain class, this part of the argument is quite necessary; and with cavillers it may be important.

2. Now, with what body do they come? "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that shall be," and is—is the illustration employed by the great apostle to the Gentiles when presenting an answer to the great objection to his position. Well, we take it that there is no truth in the assertion that the body will be the same; that the man who was sown mortal will be raised mortal; Now, what could be plainer, "Thou sowest not the body that shall be." So you are out, or you will deny Paul the second time; for you denied him once when you said the dead should be raised corruptible, for he said they should be raised incorruptible. Now you deny what he says again by saying that they will have mortal bodies, for he says they will not.

It is a monstrous absurdity to hold that God will raise men from the dead in a mortal condition. I would ask how a man who holds such a view could complain of the "Immortal soul" theory!

THE PROMISED RETURN.

"I WILL come again, and receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also." John xiv., 3: the words of Jesus.

Another "word of promise" concerning the Church's "blessed hope." Orphaned pilgrims, dry your tears! Soon the morning hour will strike, and the sighs of a groaning and burthened creation be heard no more.

Earth's six thousand years of toil and sorrow are waning; the Millennial Sabbath is at hand. Jesus will soon be heard to repeat concerning all his sleeping saints, what he said of old regarding one of them: "I go to awake them out of sleep!"

Your beloved Lord's first coming was in humiliation and woe. His name was the "Man of Sorrows." He had to travel on, amid darkness and desertion, His blood-stained path. A chaplet of thorns was the only crown He bore. But soon He will come "the second time without sin unto salvation;" never again to leave His church, but to receive those who follow him in His cross, to be everlasting partakers with him in His crown. He may seem to tarry. External nature, in her unvarying and undeviating sequences, gives no indication of His approach. Centuries have elapsed since He uttered the promise, and still He lingers. The everlasting hills wear no streak of approaching dawn; we seem to listen in vain for the noise of His chariot wheels. "But the Lord is not slack concerning His promise." He gives you "this word" in addition to many others, as a keepsake—a pledge and guarantee for the certainty of His return. "I will come again."

Who can conceive all the surpassing blessedness connected with that advent? The Elder Brother's arrival to fetch the younger brethren home! The true Joseph revealing himself in unutterable tenderness to the brethren who were once estranged from him—"receiving them unto himself"—not satisfied with apportioning a kingdom for them, but as if all his own joys and bliss were intermingled with theirs. "Where I am," says He, "there you must be also." "Him that overcometh," says He again, "will I grant to sit with me on my throne."

Believer, can you now say with some of the holy transport of the apostle, "Whom having not seen, we love?" What must it be when you come to see Him "face to face," and that forever and ever? If you can tell of precious hours of communion in a sin-stricken, woe-begone world, with a treacherous heart and an imperfect or divided love, what must it be when you come, in a sinless, sorrowless state, with purified and renewed affections, to see the King in His beauty!

The letter of an absent brother, cheering and consolatory as it is, is a poor compensation for the joys of personal and visible communion. The absent Elder Brother on the throne speaks to you now only by His word and Spirit; soon you shall be admitted to his immediate fellowship, seeing Him "as He is"—He himself unfolding the wondrous chart of His providence and grace—leading you about from fountain to fountain among the living waters, and with his own gentle hand wiping the last lingering tear-drop from your eye.

Heaven an everlasting home with Jesus! "Where I am, there ye shall be also." He has appended a cheering postscript to this word, in which He has caused us to hope: "He which testifieth these things saith, surely I come quickly."—Selected by A. POWELL.

HE IS FAITHFUL THAT PROMISED.

"GOD is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all-sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good word and work." 2 Cor. ix., 8.

"All-sufficiency in all things!" Believer! surely thou art thoroughly furnished! Grace is no scanty thing, doled out in pittances. It is a glorious treasury, which the key of prayer can always unlock; but never empty. A fountain full, flowing ever flowing, *over*flowing. Mark these three alls in this precious promise. It is threefold link in a golden chain, let down from a throne of grace by a God of grace. All grace! all sufficiency! in all things!" and these to "abound." Oh, precious thought! My thoughts cannot impoverish that inexhaustible treasury of grace! Myriads are hourly hanging on it and drawing from it, and yet there is no diminution. Out of that fulness all we too may receive, and grace for grace! My soul, dost thou not love to dwell on that all-abounding grace? Thine own insufficiency in everything, met with an all-sufficiency in all things. Grace in all circumstances and situations, in all vicissitudes and changes, in all the varied phases of the Christian being. Grace in sunshine and storm—in health and in sickness—in life and in death. Grace for the old believer and the young believer—the tried believer and the weak believer.

Grace for duty, and grace in duty; grace to carry the joyous cup with a steady hand; grace to drink the bitter cup with an unmurmuring spirit; grace to have prosperity sanctified; grace to say, through tears, "Thy will be done!"

"Remember this word unto thy servant, upon which Thou hast caused me to hope."—Selected by A. POWELL.

FROM J. S. POTTER.

EAST BOSTON, MASS., May 20, 1869.

BR. STORRS: It has been sometime since I returned home from my campaign to Nova Scotia; but I have not been altogether idle, and the battle grows hotter and hotter along our lines; the enemy thinking to turn our right flank, but we expect victory.

The Campaign Documents keep moving, and they make quite an "uproar" in certain quarters; for they have nothing to meet the question with, unless they get hold of that "New discovery," your "Sound argument;" and without that, they do nothing but throw dust.

Now as to my mission to Nova-Scotia, I wish to make a note of some of the places that I was in, and spoke on the subject of a future life to the righteous alone, and that by a resurrection from the dead.

Shelburn and Birchtown, Shelburn Co. Spoke several times, and gave away some "Documents;" the truth has taken root, sprung up and gone to seed; and if any one wishes to beat the bush and scatter the seed, they can, until they fill the garden full. Praise the Lord.

Liverpool and Brookline, Queens Co.; New Dublin, New Germany, Lunenburg Co.; Port George, Port Williams, Phinny Cove, Bridgetown, Annapolis, Clement's Port, all in Annapolis Co.; Hillsborough, Smith's Cove, Digby Co. Besides the above-named places, in quite a number of way stations and other neighborhoods that I have not named, I sowed the seed of "No future life out of Christ;" and, with a few exceptions, the people treated me well, came out and listened attentively to the truths presented. I did not obtain many subscribers to the HERALD OF LIFE on account of the scarcity of money among the people: but I trust the truth will yet spring up and bring forth fruit to the glory of God.

I travelled from ten to eleven hundred miles, going and coming; and as Br. Swanesburg says, "Compassed sea and land;" scattered a large trunk full of the "Campaign Documents"—paid my own fare; for I had no "gentleman" to climb up the pulpit stairs, as at the Lowell Street chapel, (to be seen of men) and display a twenty dollar bill, and say the "Lord told him to give it to me," as was done when a certain man went to Shelburn and broke up the Baptist Church to form another sect, and sail under the banner of a paper which advocates a part of the eternal torment dogma, i. e., temporary torment, a mortal resurrection, and two deaths for the wages of sin, in contridaction to the word of God, which says, "The wages of sin is death," and it is "appointed unto man once to die."

I wish to put in here an extract of a letter from Br. Swanesburg to the "World's Crisis." It will tell which way the wind blows. Dated Shelburn, March 22d. He says:

"While looking over a number of what are called religious papers, and which are being sent out broadcast in the world, and while I see so many making such mighty efforts, compassing sea and land to get subscribers for the same; and not only so, but trying to promulgate doctrines which are not in accordance with the Bible, philosophy, or common sense, those things awaken me to a sense of my duty; and while I feel, and not only feel but know, that the Crisis is the best printed weekly in the world, and the best setter forth of good, sound Bible doctrines, and has but one exception in the world, and that is the blessed word of God itself, the question comes home to me, what are you doing to advance those truths it sets forth?"

1. The "religious papers" above spoken of, are the "HERALD OF LIFE," the Bible Examiner, and Campaign Documents, that I gave Br. S. Dear Br., there is none so blind as those that will not see.

2. "Compassing sea and land:" Why did you not quote the whole text, Matth. xiii., 15? or did your conscience smite you; Have any of the good brethren and sisters in Shelburn or Birchtown been made" the children of hell," because they have got hold of the true doctrine of the resurrection?

3. "Trying to promulgate doctrines which are not in accordance with the Bible, philosophy, or common sense; those things awaken me to a sense of my duty." Let me try your "philosophy." "Except a man is born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." According to the Saviour's language the man had been born once. Do you think he was begotten first, before he was born? "Yes," say you. Very well; when he is born again, do you think he will be born without first being begotten? Let Peter answer: "Hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." When is a man born again? You say at the resurrection. Have the wicked a lively hope of the resurrection? "No—but"—but, what, We will let Paul put the "buts" and ifs in: "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you."

Now, Br. S., do you really think that the wicked will be born again? If you do, it must be "vain philosophy;" for the philosophy of the Bible don't teach it. Don't you think those brethren and sisters that have received the doctrine of "No future life out of Christ," have got common sense?" And why did you not, with your "Bible philosophy, or common sense" overthrow the doctrine that I advocated the night we had a meeting at Br. Daggot's?

4. "Those things awaken me to a sense of my duty." I suppose after the Baptist church was broken up and you were making inroads in the Methodist church by preaching the "doctrines set forth by the Crisis," those things awakened the Methodists and Baptists to a sense of their duty, to cry, "mad dog." Now if you think it your "duty" to do the same thing, let me first tell you a little parable:

There was a mustard plant came up in a garden, and as soon as the old man saw it, he told his wife he was going to pull it up, but the wife opposed him, so there was nothing more said about it for some time: and as time ran on, the plant became quite a tree; then the old man made another move to have the plant pulled up; the wife opposed him again, giving as a reason, she wanted the mustard for table use. Meanwhile the tree kept growing until the blossoms appeared; then the old man got mad, but the old lady carried the day the third time. Soon it went to seed and got ripe. The old man went into the house in a great rage, and said, "Wife, I am going to pull up that plant, I won't have it in the garden, it will spread all over the lot." But the old woman would not yield. So the old man went out of the house in a rage, took his cane, and struck the mustard tree a heavy blow, and away went the seed all over the garden.

INTERPRETATION.—The good seed of the SECOND BIRTH, the dead being "raised incorruptible," and no future life to the wicked, has been sown in Nova Scotia; and although it may have been sown in weakness, God is able to raise it up in power.

Now, if any one wishes to give the tree a good thump, we are not afraid of the result for there will be friends raised up in every place to defend the truth; and if any mortal resurrectionist would like to go over the same ground, please call at Sister McRay's, "Birch town." She will be able to take care of any that might travel that way.

5. "What are you doing to advance those truths it (the "Crisis,") sets forth?" To this last point, I would say to you, as the apostle Paul said to his "dearly beloved son Timothy"—"Preach the word;" and after you have gone all through the Old Testament, then come to the New, and read Paul's fourteen epistles, and if he has said nothing about wicked dead men living again, then give it up, and preach as he did, "The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord." Rom. vi., 23. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v., 12. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him." John the Baptist.

Since writing the above I have been attacked in public by a man with Saul's harness on; it was too large for him. I would advise all such men to "tarry at Jericho until their beard grows" before they undertake to fire upon old soldiers.

FROM S. J. BRIMHALL.

MAPLETON, KANSAS, May 17, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Who among our Life preachers, who preach a whole gospel, including the sublime theme of "No Life out of Christ," with the glorious Restitution, can come to Kansas this summer and preach in this new field? Appeal after appeal comes to me, "Why don't you get some of your preachers out here; I want to hear on that subject?" Men of intellect and judgment say, they "can't believe the eternal torment doctrine, and I am about persuaded to believe nothing." Orthodoxy is at a low ebb. Such is the state of things here.

Kansas in regard to the Life views is one vast field of raw prairie; the ground has never been broken on that subject. But for a minister to come and preach a half dozen sermons, and return, would be to tear down what is already trying to live and leave nothing in its place. Even that would be better than nothing; but we want a man to preach and evangelize the State. He would be sustained; and we want one of whom the truth would not be ashamed. Kansas is settled with men who in the troubles of '56 cared for right regardless of life, and now they want a chance to care for Life eternal. Who will come? My address is, MAPLETON, Bourbon Co., Kansas.

WESLEY ON SCREAMING.

JOHN WESLEY, the father of Methodism, deprecated all straining of the voice in preaching. He wrote to the Rev. John King the following characteristic letter, so often quoted, dated July 28, 1775:

My Dear Brother: Always take advice or reproof as a favor; it is surest mark of love. I advised you once, and you took it as an affront; nevertheless, I will do it once more.

Scream no more, at the peril of your soul. God now warns you by me, whom he has set over you. Speak as earnestly as you can, but do not scream. Speak with all your heart, but with a moderate voice. It was said of our Lord, "He shall not cry." The word properly means, "He shall not scream." Herein be a follower of me, as I am of Christ. I often speak loud, often vehemently, but I never scream. I never strain myself; I dare not. I know it would be a sin against God and my own soul. Perhaps one reason why that good man, Thomas Walsh, yea, and John Manners, too, were in such grievous darkness before they died, was because they shortened their own lives.

O John, pray for an advisable and tractable temper. By nature you are far from it You are stubborn and headstrong. Your last letter was written in a very wrong spirit. If you cannot take advice from others, surely you might take it from your affectionate brother,

JOHN WESLEY.

ADVICE OF AN ACTRESS.

I WAS seated in the parlor of the hotel at B——, reading, when a lady hastily entered, and, addressing me, said, "What time shall you start for the theatre?" Then, glancing at my face, added "Excuse me, sir, I thought you were one of our company."

It was Miss ——, a celebrated actress, who was at the time an inmate of the house, and I said, pleasantly, "I never went to the theatre."

"What," she exclaimed, "have you even not heard Forrest, the great tragedian?"

"No," I replied, "I was taught by my parents to shun the drama. Some, however, whom I respect, say that I was wrongly educated in this matter, and that if I should once visit the theatre, I should see my error. You certainly know all about it, and I would like to ask your opinion. Would you advise me to attend?"

The tragedienne's countenance grew pale and haggard, as she answered, with an expression whose mournful seriousness haunted me long after, "Sir, if you have never been to the theatre, I advise you never to go!" and without another word she left the room.

I have thought since, in connection with her sad, weary look, of the touching wail of the English actor Robinson, uttered throughout his last illness, "O, my wasted and unprofitable life!" and I have wondered if the patrons of the stage ever consider that their amusement is purchased at the terrible cost of the peace of mind, and perhaps the eternal happiness of the performers they applaud; and if the young, when for the first time they go to the play-house, know how many famous actors and actresses have uttered earnest and heart-broken protests against the theatre.—Messenger.

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

ON all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY. — Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE VALUE OF BRIANS.

WORKING as an ordinary hand in a Philadelphia ship-yard, until within a few years, was a man named John L. Knowlton. His peculiarity was that, while others of his class were at the ale-houses, or indulging in jollification, he was incessantly engaged in studying upon mechanical combinations. One of his companions secured a poodle-dog, and spent six months in teaching the quadruped to execute a jig upon his hind legs. Knowlton spent the same period in discovering some method by which he could saw out ship timber in a bevelled form.

The first man taught his dog to dance—Knowlton, in the same time, discovered a mechanical combination that enabled him to do in two hours the work that would occupy a dozen men, by slow and laborious process an entire day. That saw is now in use in all the ship-yards of the country. It cuts a beam to a curved shape as quickly as an ordinary saw-mill saw rips up a straight plank.

Knowlton continued his experiments. He took no part in parades or target-shootings, and in a short time afterward he secured a patent for a machine that turns any material whatever into a perfectly spherical form. He sold a portion of his patent for a sum that is equivalent to a fortune. The machine was used for cleaning off cannon balls for the Government.

When the ball comes from the mould the surface is encrusted, and the rdinary process of smoothing it was slow and wearisome. This machine almost in an instant, and with mathematical accuracy, peels it to the surface of the metal, at the same time smoothing out any deviations from the perfect spheroidal form.

The same unassuming man has invented a boring-machine, that was tested in the presence of a number of scientific gentlemen. It bored at the rate of twenty-two inches an hour, through a block of granite, with a pressure of but three hundred pounds upon the drill. A gentleman present offered him ten thousand dollars upon the spot for a part interest in the invention, in Europe, and the offer was then accepted.

The moral of all this is that people who keep on studying are sure to achieve something. Mr. Knowlton does not consider himself by any means brilliant, but if once inspired with an idea, he pursues it until he forces it into tangible shape. If everybody would follow copy the world would be less filled with idlers and the streets with grumblers and malcontents.—Scientific American.

We copy the foregoing, second-hand, from "The Methodist." A short time since we commented on an article in "Zion's Herald," which scouted the idea that there could not be "thought without a brain." "The Methodist," by copying the foregoing article, seems to think "brains" are "valuable;" and as we have no evidence that they can be dispensed with in thinking, any other position is only a matter of speculation; a theory without proof, and incapable of proof. Revelation has made no such disclosure, and all experience is against such an assumption. We like the "moral" of the above article, and think if all men would use their own "brains" in studying the revelation God has given us, and not allow professional theologians to make them their workshop for the manufacture of traditions and immaterialisms, they would grow wise unto salvation faster than they do. Use your brain, and not let brainless speculators steal them away under the pretence that you can think "without a brain." Let the speculators teach "poodle-dogs to dance."

DEVILS, DEMONS, ETC.

AT this time we give Dr. Lardner's reply to the fourth objection.

"4. Obj. The fourth and last objection is, that our blessed Lord, if he did not countenance the common and prevailing opinion upon this head, does not appear to have opposed or dis ouraged it; which we may think he would have done if it was not right. For it might have been an useful work, and a benefit to mankind, to deliver them from wrong apprehensions upon this point.

"To which I answer: undoubtedly our blessed Lord knew the truth of the case, for he knew all things. But it does not follow that he was therefore obliged to speak his mind, or to correct every false and mistaken notion among the people whom he taught. Our Lord was concerned in the most important design; teaching the principles of true religion, and recommending them by works of mighty power and great goodness. When any afflicted cases were brought to him, it was sufficient to heal them, to whatever cause they were ascribed. It was expedient not to enter into any debate on that head; it might have diverted him from his main work.

"We do not observe, in the Old Testament, that it was customary for any prophet to instruct men in the things of nature. The people of the Jews, in the time of our Saviour, were generally free from idolatry; and as they considered the spirits, which they supposed sometimes to inflict distempers on men, to be 'evil and unclean,' there was no danger of their honoring and worshipping them. There was therefore no urgent necessity that he should interpose for correcting any misapprehensions concerning the causes of some indispositions and distempers.

"That our Lord studiuosly declined to concern himself with things foreign to the office of a prophet, or extraordinary messenger from heaven, may appear from two particular instances.

"One is at the beginning of the ninth chapter of St. John's gospel. 'And as Jesus passed by, he saw a man which was blind from his birth. And his disciples asked him, saying, Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind? Jesus answered, Neither hath this man sinned, nor his parents, but that the works of God should be made manifest in him.' Here the disciples give the Lord a fair occasion to say something about the philosophical notion of the pre-existence of the human soul; but our Lord declines that point, and only says that the blindness of this man was not owing to any sin of his own, or his parents.

"The other instance is in Luke xii., 13, 14: 'And one of the company said unto him, Master, speak to my brother, that he divide the inheritance with me. And he said unto him, Man, who made me a judge and a divider over you? And he said unto them, Take heed, and beware of covetousness,' and what follows. Here one comes to our Lord with a petition, and it may be thought to be very reasonable: for it cannot but be a good work to decide a cause truly, and with a just sentence, and to reconcile brethren. Nevertheless, our Lord absolutely rejects the proposal, as improper to be hearkened to by him. His work was to teach religion, to mortify earthly affections, to deliver men from covetousness, and to raise men's thoughts to things above. For such ends as these, he embraced the present, and all other occasions. But to interpose in particular differences among men, was not in his province.

"I take this to be a sufficient answer to the difficulty under consideration.

"But then here ariseth an objection against all that has been said in this and the two preceding discourses. For it may be said, if Christ confined his doctrine to the important truths and duties of religion, should not a preacher of the gospel do the same, and decline everything not expressly taught by Christ or his apostles?

"To which I answer, that in the course of this argument I have intimated over and over, that no particular sentiment concerning this point ought to be reckoned an article of religion. It is left undetermined by Christ and his apostles; and men may think of it as they find best, if they do but take care to maintain the supremacy of the divine government, and guard against undue fears and apprehensions of evil spirits. And having inculcated such observations and cautions as these, I nope no harm has been done in setting before you the different sentiments of learned, judicious, and pious interpreters of Scripture, concerning the case of those who, in the New Testament, are spoken of as having evil spirits.

"And having now finished the argument, I again declare (what no one can doubt the truth of), that it is more satisfactory to promote good works among men than to bring them over to any particular opinion. There is more pleasure in advancing the happiness of others than in raising a man's own reputation for skill in any branch of science. Humility is better than knowledge: a right disposition of heart is more valuable than right sentiments. At the same time it is a reasonable ambition to promote both knowledge and piety: the character of Christians then becomes complete. A love of truth, a thirst after knowledge, an inquisitive temper, seem to be inseparable concomitants of integrity. Such dispositions, therefore, may be fitly cherished and encouraged.

"Solomon says, that 'wisdom excelleth folly as far as light excelleth darkness.' 'That the soul be without knowledge, it is not good.' 'The heart of the prudent getteth knowledge, and the ear of the wise seeketh knowledge.' I, therefore take the liberty to conclude with that exhortation to you, which St. Paul gave to the Christians at Corinth, 'Brethren, be not children in understanding; howbeit, in malice be ye children, but in understanding be men.'"

—Sel. by F. H. BURBANK.

A REMARK of Professor Shepard, of Bangor, Me., needs often to be heeded in the Orient. "Young men," said he, "preach the duties. Often recur to the tables of the law, and dwell upon 'Thou shalt, and thou shalt not,' lest you fill the churches with converted scoundrels."

QUITE TOO WISE.

"Such are they that are heavenly."

A WRITER who insists on the word being so very plain upon the re-living of the wicked, and the importance of implicit faith, without question, where it is so plain, puts into this passage (1. Cor. xv., 48), in brackets,—"in the resurrection," which he assumes is the word, and asks, "Why not believe it."

Answer: It is not the word of God; that is impossible, for it takes the ground that neither Christ nor his saints are heavenly till the resurrection; also, that the saints of God (see verse 49) must bear the image of the earthy, after being raised from the dead, which shows it to be the gospel of "another," about A. D. 1860, rather than that of Jesus Christ, A. D. 30. Moreover, we might declare, if the above inference from the word (instead of the word itself) be correct, the resurrection is necessary to the image of the "earthly;" for it does not at all appear that they bare the image of the earthly before them, if they had it at that time. They certainly are spoken of as having it but once. If, then, they have it in the resurrection, they have it twice if they ever had it before; and they have it that they may die again, as we are told. So to die twice they must live twice, and bear the same image each time; for they have an image to correspond with their fate. But the word distinctly gives them the image of the earthly once, and (literally) death once. To say that men bear the image of the earthly in the resurrection is to deny that they are earthly now, and also to assume that Christ is earthly in the resurrection; for he declares that he is the resurrection. To assume that the sinner lives after he has died (and all agree that some millions of sinners have died as the penalty of sin), is to say that one representative man can give to the race the image of another representative man; for the race of Adam, the earthly man, are brought into existence by the laws of being established in him by the Almighty, who "hath life in himself;" and he is called a living soul. But the other man, who is the "heavenly," must have another race; and being a quickening spirit he must secure existence under direction of the Almighty by other laws ("law of the spirit of life"); therefore he cannot take the place of Adam; in fact, there is an impossibility of doing so. He cannot stand as the head of a mortal race! How should the heavenly give the image of the earthly? To say that Jesus raised some to mortal life does not touch this question, since, in this case, he did not assume to be the power or the author of the life (he only performed a miracle of power such as the prophets had done before him); but in the other case he does, and gives the truth to the world as a reason why the dead shall hear his voice; and that those who hear shall live, that the "Father hath given to the Son to have life in himself." He does not refer it to his power to do, but to the divine appointment in regard to a future life. Now, is that appointment for the life of a man, as a mortal being? A mortal life? Adamic life? An earthly image? Twice to displace The Christ from the gospel, and make the recovery from sin and death Adamic and earthly. To take away the resurrection of the dead as a saving work in God's economy is to take away the virtue of the atonement, and remove Christ as the necessary corner-stone in the plan of God. Christ, while on the earth, did some things that we may not fully fathom; yet they do not interfere with the process of the great purpose of the Almighty to save man from sin and death by Jesus Christ; much less do they conspire to take the victory from Christ's hands. If Christ should raise sinners to life, would he not revive sin? Would not he work against victory? Would he not revive the last enemy to kill him again?

One of the things Christ did which were incompatible with mortality, that would be as wonderful as the raising of a dead man to die again, or restoring him to life in a mortal state was going right out of sight, passing through the midst of them, when he was still a man' capable of being killed: also, he was forty days and forty nights without food, and lived; is this exhibition of his powers to interfere with his true position in the future world? Nay, verily!

A few words will suffice to show that the "earthy" is to be referred to this world; and that we are to expect nothing earthy in the world to come. The word of God to Adam, "Dust thou art, and to dust shalt thou return." "Adam begat a son in his own likeness." "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." "That which is born of the Spirit is spirit." "It is sown a natural body: it is raised a spiritual body."

Now to show that men belong to the Christ, who believe, and that he is heavenly, we have only to show what he says of the state, and of its result.

John ix., 28: "Ye know me, and know whence I am." "I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true." 29. "But I know him, for I am from him, and he hath sent me." Chap. viii., 23. "Ye are from beneath; I am from above. Ye are of this world; I am not of this world."

"Ye (the disciples) are not of this world, as I am not of this world." Because, as he is, so are we in this world." Now, if they have the spirit which makes them heavenly, transforming them to the divine image, they have a promise of a resurrection—a quickening of the vile body, to be fashioned like his glorious body: (is that earthly?) and eating of him, the promise is that they will be "raised up at the last day." Now, if there is a promise of a raising, at the last day, for wicked men, shall we be shown it? If there is a threat to that effect in the word ("at the last day"), our mortal resurrectionists have failed to show it.

But Jesus says that—"He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation, but is passed from death unto life."

The reason now appears why we said that it is not the word of God. It contradicts the plain testimony of the Holy Record, and we have hereby shown that contradiction. How much more glorious the gospel appears as revealing Christ as the author of all life in the future, and hence all that life is Christ-like—Divine.

W. S. CAMPBELL.

MATTHEW XXIV., 29, 30.

"Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken; and then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven."

IF you take this language literally, it refers to physical commotions in the natural world. If you take it in a figurative sense, then it refers to political disturbances among the nations of the earth, which are to precede the coming of Christ. It may be taken in either or in both senses. The two most important points to settle, in interpreting this verse are: What is meant by "the tribulation" here spoken of? and when is this tribulation to end?

Some persons, supposing that "the tribulation" of which our Saviour here speaks refers only to the horrors which attended and followed the destruction of Jerusalem, have looked for the fulfilment of the signs here mentioned in the calamities which then came upon the Jewish people.

That was undoubtedly the beginning of this tribulation, but not the end of it. How long that tribulation was to continue, we learn from the parallel passage in St. Luke xxi., 24, where we read: "And they shall fall by the edge of the sword, and shall be led away captive into all nations: and Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled." But the tribulation which began with Jerusalem's overthrow has run on, with the downtreading of that city and country by Gentile power, and will continue while Gentile power has sway there. Whenever Palestine, with its glorious capital, shall pass from under Gentile rule, and come in possession of the Jews again, then the event of which Jesus here speaks will have taken place. Then this long tribulation will have come to an end, and "immediately after this tribulation," the signs here spoken of will take place in rapid development.

Our Saviour then adds the parable of the figtree, in the 32d and 33d verses, in order to show that as the swelling buds of the trees are an infallible harbinger of the approach of summer, so his people, when they see these things begin to come to pass, may know that his kingdom is nigh at hand.

And then, in verse 34th, he adds: "Verily, I say unto you, this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled." A misapprehension in regard to this verse has done more to throw confusion over all attempts to interpret this chapter than anything else. For if you take it, as many do, to mean the generation living at the time when Jesus was speaking, you are obliged to explain the whole chapter as referring to the destruction of Jerusalem. Then there is nothing in it that bears on Christ's second coming; and this grand and sublime prophecy, whose stupendous developments have been solemnly unfolding through more than eighteen centuries, has all to be compressed within the narrow limits of about forty years. This carries absurdity on the face of it.

To avoid this difficulty, some would substitute the word nation for generation in this verse. This would make our Saviour declare that the Jews, as a distinct race or nation, should not cease to exist till the events here spoken of had taken place. The Greek word here used, gennea, would undoubtedly bear this construction, and the statement so made would be a truth, but I think not the truth intended to be taught here. For, if the Jewish nation, after being miraculously preserved until this period, were then to cease its existence as a distinct people, there would be great force in such a statement; but if they are never to pass away as a distinct nation—a peculiar people—if through the millennial age, and the everlasting age beyond it, as Isaiah says, "their seed and their name" are to "remain," and they are to continue "an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations," then there would be, to say the least of it, a feebleness about such a statement hardly in keeping with the character of the speaker, and the grandeur of the themes he is handling.

The only thoroughly satisfactory rendering of this verse I have yet seen is one which I first met with, more than twenty years ago, in a little book written by an eminent English clergyman, Rev. Alexander Dallas. It gave me intense delight then, because it did so much to remove the difficulty I had always before felt in attempting to interpret this chapter. And that feeling continues still. This writer states that the Greek word autee, the demonstrative pronoun, in our version translated "this," may, with equal propriety, be rendered that, or the same, and gives examples of places in which it is so rendered in the New Testament. Thus in Luke xvii., 34, we read: "And I tell you, in that night," etc., where in the original we have the very word which is here rendered "this." And in Matt. iii., 4, when describing the way in which John the Baptist began his mission, it says: "The same John had his raiment of camel's hair," etc. Here again the demonstrative pronoun rendered "this generation," in the passage before us is translated "the same John" in the other passage. Now just make this simple alteration in the rendering of this 34th verse; put "that generation," or "the same generation," instead of "this generation;" and consider our Saviour as speaking, not of the generation that was living when he delivered this prophecy, but of the generation that shall be living when the great sign of which he is speaking shall take place, and it is all plain enough. And thus, the solemn truth here taught is, that when Jerusalem shall cease to be trodden down of the Gentiles, and Israel's great tribulation be brought to a close, the stupendous events here spoken of, with the return of Christ from heaven, the raising of his dead people from their graves, the change and translation of those living, with the overthrow of his enemies, and the setting up of his kingdom in the earth, will all transpire within the ordinary limits assigned to human life. The same generation which witnessed the first act in this drama—so rapidly will the successive scenes follow each other—will witness the closing act also. Such, then, is the teaching of this solemn and instructive chapter.—Richard Newton, D. D.

ROMISH DESIGNS IN AMERICA.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

VERY many suppose that the increase of light in the past few centuries has essentially changed the character of Popery; that the ignorance and persecuting spirit which characterized the dark ages have given way to a purer faith, through the influence of Bible truth, and the increase of knowledge in the arts and sciences. But the truth is, we give so little attention to what Catholics say in this country, that we are in ignorance of their present character; and we are likely to remain so if we do not collect facts and carefully study history.

Any amount of testimony might be adduced to show that the character of Romanism is unchanged. Yet if any for a moment suppose that the Church of Rome is not in the nineteenth century what she was in the dark ages; that she is not opposed to the word of God, and will not persecute those who cherish it, if she had the power, I refer them to facts now published to the civilized world, and is part of history, in proof of their error:

On the 11th of January, 1837, the Emperor of Austria gave orders to five hundred of his subjects, living in the valley of Zellerthat—who had, by reading the Bible, become Protestants and thrown off the Papal yoke—that "they must return to the Church of Rome, or leave their fatherland. He would not tolerate any Protestant community on the Tyrol." They had been born and reared there. That was the place of their residence, where they pursued their peaceful vocation. The very year in which he gave the order, all of this devoted band were compelled to leave the homes of their youth, and the graves of their ancestors; and all because they had read the Scriptures, and had, by the teachings of the Spirit, renounced Antichrist, and broken the fetters of an oppressive hierarchy. If in this portion of authentic history we have not an evidence of the unchanged character of Romanism, of her hatred to the Bible, and her cruel, persecuting spirit, I ask, what kind of evidence you would deem sufficient to convince?

Romanism compelled by motives of policy, ceased a little from her work of blood; but she did not yield a principle; and what is more, all the wiles of the past ages have been quietly put in requisition to heal the wounds, which the beast has received. Every ingenuity that satan can invent is being put into force to render the system more powerful and terrific. Silently and incessantly she is laboring to accomplish ends of her own. Romanism is in earnest, desperate and wily. Being no part of catholic Christianity, it works for and by itself. An observing writer remarks: "Its meat would prove another's poison; another's victory would prove its death." Romanism is a system where science and ignorance, refinement and barbarism, wisdom and stupidity, taste and animalism, mistaken zeal and malignant enmity, sanctimoniously pour out their virulence against the gospel. Therefore, to be morally at peace with Rome would be a truce with sin and satan.

With these facts before us, we solicit the reader to look carefuly at the designs of Romanism in America.

In approaching this subject we do it not hastily. We have weighed this matter well, and approach it in the fear of God. From a close observation of Romanism for some time, we are forced to these conclusions; the spread of Romanism is one of the most alarming evils that threaten the religious liberties of our country. Romanism has assumed a position, and acquired an eminance in America, giving it a prominence and influence to which we can no longer be indifferent. In the results thus far gained, it has already surpassed the hopes of its friends, and far more than realized the fears of its opponents. What it designs, ought no longer to be a question among intelligent and honest men. There are but few who deny or even doubt that its extension is the most formidable peril by which our religious freedom is beset. The day cannot be far distant when the question will be brought forward to be decided, whether Christ or Antichrist shall be worshipped. The mass of our countrymen are no doubt thoroughly Protestant; but the danger is that, coming in unawares, and creeping toward supremacy with stealthy steps, it will crush our liberties, and do its work of death before resistence is made.

It is not necessary to stop here and point out the facts, that Romanism is persistently aiming at political power in this land; indeed it already possesses a large share of that power. Any one who does not recognize this fact, and the danger with which it threatens our institutions, is wilfully ignorant, or indifferent. Nor will I pause to show that the imported Romish vote is the element that gives it power. Romanism is kept strong by immigration. This immigration has been large in the past, and promises to be even larger in the future. Look at the facts. There are over four millions of Roman Catholics in America today—the subjects of a foreign prince, who can array on his side wealth, power, learning and numbers, that no other potentate can command. He can call to his aid the untold terrors of superstition, and persuade his followers that it is his prerogative to secure to them, on condition of their faithfulness and devotion to his service, all the joys of heaven, or all the terrors of perdition. Already, in large cities, it holds the balance of power; and who can tell but it may, whenever there comes an equal division of the great parties, hold it all over the country? All careful watchers of the signs of the times agree, and facts show, that the Papal Church is cunningly laying plans to eventually hold the controlling political power in America. No observant man can doubt this when he carefully studies the character and attitude of the Romish power in this land, or listens to its demands, or notices its expectations as they find utterance occasionally on the other side of the ocean.

[Concluded next week.]

FAITH.

ALTHOUGH repentance, grace, and a holy life are necessary, as well as faith, to salvation, yet it is by faith alone that we lay hold on Christ—appropriate him and accept him as our Saviour. It is by faith we enter into the way.

From the age of ten to twenty-four, I thought I was seeking God. At length I was ready to sink down in despair. What should I do? My trouble, I thought, was, that I had not repented so deeply as my sins required. My convictions were not pungent. I thought God never could have mercy on one whose heart was as hard as mine. Oh how I wanted to pour out a flood of tears at the Saviour's feet! At length I started to go away to the woods to pray to God for deeper convictions. I wanted to have conviction for a month, that would almost take my life. But as I was going, this thought came suddenly and very forcibly into my mind: "You are wishing to atone for your sins by your convictions, whereas Christ has already atoned for them; and what you have to do is to believe it."

What darkness I had been groping through for fourteen years, for the want of proper instructions! The Bible simply says, "Look unto me, and be saved." "Trust," "Rest," "Wait on the Lord." Oh listen; "Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." "Go thou, and do likewise."

Sectarianism.

A very apt writer on the subject of sectarianism once said—"I learned long ago that it is not with men we are at war, but with doctrines and sentiments. I do not therefore see any reason why we should act like the sons of Ishmael toward each other." A man embraces a false sentiment—what then? Is he therefore a hypocrite, a scoundrel, or a liar? Who of us do not hold some sentiments which may be wrong? Shall we therefore all fall on each other with words and acts of cruelty? What little Pope amongst us will start up and say, "I am right—you are all wrong?" Is not every man entitled to respect, love, kindness, and consideration? Will it reform any man to look at him with a countenance fraught with wrath and thunder? But the man is in a fatal error—what then? What will save him from his error? Will it make him see his error and our truth by appearing toward him unkind, vinegar-faced, and cloudy? Will turning him out of doors by treating him with such cold contempt that he cannot remain in our company, draw him any nearer to the truth and to Christ? This was not the policy of the Galilean. The enemies of Christ said before him, "This man receiveth sinners and eateth with them." Hear the reply of the Son of God to this charge: "They that are whole need no physician; but they that are sick."

One of the primary laws of reformation, both in doctrine and in practice, is association. Jesus came down from heaven that he might associate with men and reform them. It does not make us sinners to talk with, walk with, eat with, worship with sinners, of necessity. It does not make them saints to let them see us all shun them, and treat them with contempt. When will men learn that bigotry, sectarianism, coldness, contempt, stiffness, and reserve, are not attractive elements? When will men learn that they cannot scold, drive, frighten, or repulse human beings into truth? When shall we learn, if men are brought into truth at all, it will be done by association, love, plainness, frankness, kindness and argument?

Select a family of eight or ten members: one of the family embraces a fatal sentiment—fatal to the interests of the whole—what is to be done? When the hour of worship arrives, shall we, with cold contempt, show him he is unwelcome in the worshipping circle? Will that make him love our truth and our spirit more? Shall we refuse to walk with him to the place of true worship on Sunday, because he sometimes goes to a place of false worship? Will that make him love true or false worship more? Shall we treat him with haughty and scornful reserve when he wishes to take part in the worship? Will that incline him to go with us? Shall we not rather help him in all he does attempt right? Shall we not rather say "Amen!" when he does say the truth? And when we do say "Nay! Nay!" say it like Christians, and not like savages.

But I know well the sentiments of the community on these points. Here is the creed of the sectarian community: "Go with us, or we go against you." "Help build my church, or I want nothing to do with you." "Be somebody, or nobody." This creed is not universal—there are many honorable exceptions to it. May we not hope the exceptions will multiply.

Feeding on Husks.

The church may retain all orthodox doctrines—yet reject Christ as fully as the Papacy has, which indeed holds the doctrine of salvation by Christ in its creed as tenaciously as any Protestant organization does. We have come to give little prominence to the new birth. An intellectual belief attended with labor and sacrifice pecuniarily is what is desired by all; add proselytes; outward prosperity; forsake those sins that are not conducive to respectability; do not steal, but drive close bargains; do not fight, but contend for our creed and sect to the bitter end; do not make poisonous drinks, but raise barley and hops expressly for them; do not add spirituous liquors, but keep popular bitters, and put your property into some one else's hands to rent it more profitably for saloons and drinking-houses; do not take usury for your ill-gotten gains, but manage to get full as much as the law will allow; although Christ said: Lend—not expecting to receive again.

Faith works by love and purifies the heart. Fountains flow, you do not have to pump them. A Christian—cannot help working, and he loves every man; his enemies are his friends—he will have it so—he is like Christ, or has made a mistake in taking his name. There is no power in the gospel when God's people deny its teachings, in their lives. We mock the poor sinner, he sees nothing in us to desire, no remedy, as we call it, for the malady of the soul. The church are in trouble, seeking after pleasure in the world, wanting its emoluments and striving as much after them as any worldling—we are indeed captives in a strange land, trying to fill our belly with the husks that the swinish worldlings eat.

Shall we return to our father's house where there is bread enough and to spare. I. T.

—The Advance.

A Welsh clergyman applied to his diocesan for a living. The Bishop promised him one, but as the clergyman was taking his leave, he expressed hopes that his lordship would out send him into the interior of the principality, as his wife could not speak Welsh. "Your wife, sir!" said the bishop, "what has your wife to do with it? She does not preach, does she?" "No, my lord," said the parson, "but she lectures."

Romanism and Protestantism.

Some persons are alarmed at the apparent gain of Romanism in this country, while many Protestants seem to think there is no great cause of alarm from it. Some of our Methodist friends treat the idea of its gaining the ascendency here as an impossibility.

We do not sympathize with either view from their standpoint. Protestantism is a power against Romanism in its support of free institutions; but it is weak against it in its theology. Both parties are based on theological notions so exactly alike that their antagonism may be overcome by the strong professions of Romanism for free institutions, so that the popular current may turn toward it; especially as formality increases among Protestants, and the people become impregnated with the idea of Romanism's superior exterior, and a less regard for spirituality.

The danger lies in their oneness in what both bodies regard as essentials in their theology, and the evident effort by Protestants to keep up with Romanists in fine churches and outward pomp and show, instead of relying on the simple faith and power of the gospel. It has come to be much a contest for the most brilliant and attractive outside appearances.

Both parties, however, have a rival which they have begotten by their common theology of an inherent spiritual nature in man, that is deathless. That doctrine, after having been promulgated by them for centuries, has at length culminated in "Spiritism," which is sweeping like a flood over Christendom, and neither Romanism or Protestantism perceives that this is the viper they have nourished and brought up, and which bids fair to overtop them both.

Here lies the real danger in this country and throughout Christendom. The monster has so linked itself in the ground work of both Romanists and Protestants, i. e., in "inherent immortality," that it is impossible for either body to stop its inroads among them; and if time continues many years, it will inevitably swallow them both up; they have no power of resistance from their theological standpoint; and they are both determined to maintain that standpoint at all hazards.

That Romanism should stand there is not wonderful, for it is the life-blood of their whole system: purgatory and their whole frame work of saint worship would go to ruin together if it is once established that all future life depends on the resurrection from the dead "at the last day." But why Protestants, who profess such opposition to Romanism, should hold so persistently to a dogma that has wrought such ruin to Bible truth, is marvellous indeed. They seem to be enslaved to Romish traditions to an extent that it seems impossible to reconcile with their high professions of respect for "private judgment," and "the Bible as the only rule of faith and practice."

Why is this yielding to, and suffering themselves to be plunged down into the gulf of "Spiritism" by a doctrine which is not once named in the Bible? They can as soon find "purgatory" there as "immortal soul" or "deathless spirit," and yet they cling to these stupendous assumptions as if they were written on every page of the Book of God! Why is this? Before they will abandon this unscriptural notion, must there be a "rebellion" against the professors of religion in Christendom that shall appal all hearts by its overwhelming power? and must our sons and daughters be sacrificed in the conflict that is to arise when "Spiritism declares open war on God, the Bible, and on all pure religion? O that Protestants would open their eyes to this coming struggle, and see what has prepared the way for this war. Would they arrest the flood before they are swallowed up by it, let them gird on the gospel truth of life future only through Christ, and by the resurrection "at the last day."

This powerful weapon they now refuse to use, and mock at us who do. Perhaps they will mock on; but through grace our skirts shall be clear when the mighty clashing of the war breaks on Christendom; and come it will: the hosts are gathering day by day. Spiritism is gaining strength, much as we all despise it; Protestants and Romanists are united in doing the work of feeding this monster dragon with their dogma of inherent immortality, or the deathlessness of the soul. We have done what we could to arrest this work, and shall still work on while God permits; yet we fear, in regard to most Protestants, it will be said as it was to Ezekiel, "The house of Israel will not hearken unto thee, for they will not hearken unto me." Ezk. iii. 7. The word of God has been set aside to make way for the traditions of men; and those traditions are, like all other bad habits, so interwoven in the minds of men, that he who attempts to remove them must expect to be set at naught by such as live by dealing out the destructive ingredients, such as "immortal souls—deathless spirits—going to heaven at death—purgatory—worshipping of saints," and the innumerable notions growing out of these inventions of men, setting aside the resurrection of the dead, or making it of little or no importance, while the Bible places it, next to Christ himself, of the first importance, without which even the dead "in Christ are perished."

"The man is thought a knave or fool,
Or bigot plotting crime,
Who, for the advancement of his kind,
Is wiser than his time.
For him the hemlock shall distil,
For him the axe be bared,
For him the gibbet shall be built,
For him the stake prepared;
Him shall the scorn and wrath of men
Pursue with deadly aim;
And malice, envy, spite and lies,
Shall desecrate his name.
But truth shall conquer at the last,
For round and round we run,
And ever the right comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

Consecration to Christ.

No Christian should entertain any other idea of his relation to Christ than that of a wife to a husband. All that such a relation implies exists where we have truly become united to Christ; and no other union should satisfy any of us who wish truly to be Christians. The thought of such a relation to Christ, and acting with a deep sense that it really exists, is a state of mind to be valued above all worldly honor, wealth, or pleasure: it is a source of enjoyment so permanent, so exalted, so satisfying, that its possessor must feel that he lives above the world while he is in it. How should we feel it to be our highest joy to please our Lord, and have His smiles in return.

We take the following article from the "American Presbyterian." It expresses our views of the subject, and we hope all our readers will be profited by it:

Purity of Soul.

To come somewhere near right in the ordinary relations of life is the highest moral aspiration of the great mass of men. If they keep clear of open transgressions, if they do not sink into the slough of filth and drunkenness, if they overreach their neighbor only by methods not reckoned exactly disreputable, they think themselves entitled to a quiet conscience. There are, alas, multitudes of professing Christian people who allow themselves in various degrees of guilty conformity to the world, who yield habitually to the power of covetousness and the love of ease, whose secret living is far below the plainest standard of duty, who seem, almost as truly as the class above described, to fail utterly of understanding the breadth of moral obligation and the extent of the claim made by divine love and divine law upon the soul.

I am jealous over you, says Paul to the Corinthians, for I have espoused you to one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ. By thus crowding into one sentence the three ideas of jealousy, espousal, and virginal chastity, he makes a powerful impression of the exalted and delicate nature of Christian obligation. True chastity, and true fidelity in these intimate relations, involve a certain sensitiveness to evil and a shrinking from its remotest approaches. They would be nothing less than completely stainless. The thought of the smallest blemish is intolerable. Indeed the very idea and almost the possibility of unfaithfulness is shut out of the life of the happily married. It is a monster that lies quite beyond their calm and untroubled horizon.

Such, too, is the proper mental state of the renewed soul toward the Saviour. Chaste fidelity is the true type of his experience. He must aim at an inward delicacy of nature, His conscience must be healthfully and keenly alive to every form and degree of sin. He must turn from it as something shocking, polluting, disgraceful, as a stain upon his purity, as a breach of his holiest relations. The chaste soul is intolerant of the least stain. It would rather die than be soiled. Life is not to be weighed against honor and purity and fidelity. Therefore died the martyrs when they might have lived by pronouncing words which, on the lips of their own persecutors, were a mere form. They would not seem to tolerate a stain upon their fidelity to Christ.

Chasteness of soul in our relations to Christ is too little prized, too easily lost, too feebly longed after. How many and deep are the stains upon our bridal robes that should be so white and clean! Conformity to the world, following after its fashions and amusements, seeking its filthy lucre, grovelling for its honors, pampering of self, shrinking from the cross, putting human methods and observances and dependences proudly in the place of Christ, indulging in fears and doubts instead of taking Him simply at His word—it is in such ways that our minds, through the subtlety of the serpent, are beguiled and corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ.

And what soul breathes heavenward a perpetual prayer for this chasteness of spirit? Who is filled with inexpressible longings for this great gift which only the Infinite Spirit, whose name is Holy, can bestow upon fallen man? Who sees and feels that the only right view of evil is that which shrinks from it as a deadly pollution and abomination; which holds no parley with it; which is jealous of its least approaches? Who echoes the beatitude of the Saviour as containing the sum of all his hopes: "Blessed are the pure in heart; for they shall see God?"

Our Lord's Return.

No event can so interest the real lover of Jesus as that of His return from heaven. This however depends much on the faith possessed in regard to a future life. If the person expects to go to heaven at death, that person cannot feel the importance of Christ's return as the lover of Jesus who looks only to the resurrection for a future life.

In Dr. Macduff's sweet Memories of Olivet there is a chapter on "the joyful return of the disciples across the Mount to Jerusalem," after the angels had assured them that this same Jesus whom they had seen ascend would so return. The following are the words of comfort and warning in the closing paragraphs:

"Church of God! drawing ever nearer to this solemn event, 'why stand ye gazing,' why stand ye lingering? Christian, why loiter on the mountain top? Tarry not—squander not your precious moments. Who can tell how soon again the Heavenly gates may be opened for the descent of your enthroned Lord? Go, go! trim your lamps! put oil into your vessels, 'He cometh—He cometh to judge the earth!' 'That same Jesus shall so come!' The apostles, when they heard this, folded not their arms in indifference and sloth. They went forthwith with stout, bold hearts, to do their work manfully in the Church and the world. They would long, doubtless, for that blessed moment of reunion, when they could exclaim, 'Lo! this is our God, we have waited for Him.' But they knew that the best waiting for Him was working for Him—waiting by patient suffering, or working by active duty. 'Who,' asks the Psalmist in that beautiful ascension-psalm, where the gates are summoned to lift up their heads that the King of Glory may enter in—'who shall ascend into the hill of the Lord, or who shall stand in His holy place?' He answers, 'He that hath clean hands and a pure heart; who hath not lifted up his soul unto vanity nor sworn deceitfully.' 'If ye, then, be risen with Christ seek those things that are above, where Christ sitteth at the right hand of God.' Be assured there is nothing that will so raise you above the world, as the elevating consciousness that you are partakers of the endless life of your living Redeemer; that your lives are now hid with Christ in God, and that when Christ who is your life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory. Seek often to climb, by faith, these steeps of Olivet, and remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how He said, 'A little while and ye shall not see me, and again a little while and ye shall see me.' That first 'little while' will soon be over—the little while of the Church's widowhood, mourning her absent Lord. But the great while when 'we shall see Him,' is every day drawing nearer. Every hour is giving fresh emphasis to the words, 'Yet a little while and He that shall come, will come, and will not tarry.' Remember it is 'to them also that look for him, He shall appear the second time, without sin unto salvation.' The assembled Jewish worshippers looked for the re-appearance of their High Priest, when He was ministering in the Holy of Holies. They waited anxiously in the outer porch to see the veiling curtain drawn, and the Intercessor of the nation come forth, to pour upon the multitude, with outstretched hands, the old benediction, 'The Lord bless thee, and keep thee: the Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace.' Num. vi, 24–26. Not till then, were the imposing services of that high day of Hebrew festival completed. Do we (of this gospel day) see through the type? Are we on the outlook for our reappearing High Priest, coming forth from the heavenly Presence to stand (who knows but it may be literally again) on the height of Olivet, and, with the same outstrethed hands of love, to say to the waiting myriads of His expectant Church, 'Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world?' 'Are we thus looking for that blessed hope?' It was a gladdening sound to the Jewish multitudes in their temple area, when they heard the sound of the silver bells on the hem of their high priest's garment, giving intimation of his approach:—'Blessed are they who know the joyful sound.' 'Blessed are those servants who, when their Lord cometh, shall be found watching!'"—Pp. 352–4.

Christianity is one thing, Popery another. Christianity must no more be made answerable for its counterfeits than its emblem, gold. It is one of the arts of hell to confound truth with hypocrisy. Real Christianity is that wisdom from above which is "first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, without hypocrisy." But if, under this holy name, a bold harlot come forward in heathen attire, affecting the pomp, secularity, tyranny, and idolatry of pagan superstition, what wonder if she adopts its cruelty also?—Cecil.

Mount Zion Christ's Throne.

The following is an extract from an article by H. McDiarmid, in reply to an opponent (by the name of "Anderson," we suppose), who, it seems, thought the idea of Christ's reign on earth, personally, was not to be "endured." The extract is from a discussion in the Christian Standard, on the King-ship of Christ. McDiarmid says:

"The earth claims Mount Zion eternally. When Jesus and the Jerusalem above come down, he will reign on Mount Zion in Jerusalem, over Israel his redeemed. Then, 'find where the heavenly Jerusalem is, and Mount Zion is found.' They are not together now, Jesus is not in Zion, but in heaven; we repeat, Mount Zion literally and figuratively belongs to the earth as it is, and as it will be. It has never been taken up. He who says it has, must bring the proof. Paul, feeling that the Christian is linked with all the good things present and to come, associated with God and all the holy ones in the universe living and dead, with a strong faith that brings the future near, grasping the inheritance of the saints before the judgment day, exclaims—'Ye are come to Mount Zion and the city of the living God,' etc. Heb. xii., 22. Not that they had literally come to the city, or the Mount, for they, like the good of olden days, looked for a city which hath foundations. Paul, and all who are Christ's, will be saved at his coming, and will come to Mount Zion, a mountain in Palestine, having Christ for their king and the new earth for their inheritance. Glorious things are spoken of Zion. A new heaven, a new earth, a new city, Zion redeemed, the Lord King over all the earth! If these glorious things can not be 'endured,' who can wonder that Jesus, crucified between two thieves on a cross, is a stumbling-block and rock of offense to thousands? 'Endured!' My soul leaps for joy, anticipating the day when the Lord who was once crowned with thorns, will come 'on the throne of his glory,' and 'will reign in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, before his ancients, gloriously.' 'Far be it from thee, Lord,' said Peter. 'Cannot be endured,' says Anderson. But in spite of Peter, the Lord went up to Jerusalem to die; and in spite of Anderson, he will come to Jerusalem to reign on the holy hill."

An Old Pilgrim.

The following letter we take from the "Voice of the West." It is from one we knew well twenty-five years ago, but have heard nothing from him for years past, and do not now know his residence. We always loved his spirit, it was so child-like and Christ-like. We are glad to know he has held on his way, looking and longing for the return of our Lord from heaven. The thoughts he utters in this communication may well be pondered. He speaks as follows:

The theme of the Lord's coming should be dwelt on only by those who, like Abraham, are the friends and companions of God. How comforting it is to know that the Lord has taken you nearer to his heart and is there keeping you. This is the best of all to know. How sad to reflect that so many undertake to teach God's mind and to speak of the terrors of God's wrath on the one hand and of His grace in Jesus Christ on the other, who themselves seem such utter strangers to his fear, whose consciences fail to respond to the teachings of the New Testament, and whose hearts are evidently so destitute of that peace and joy the fruit of Christian faith.

Most Christians are living under the law while their ears are constantly greeted with the precious doctrine of justification by faith in Christ. Ask them on what they depend for salvation, and the reply probably will be, Upon the blood. And yet forsooth they really are resting on good frames of mind, good attainments in knowledge, good deeds of some sort; at least these are partly their grounds of justification. No wonder such have to confess as did a neighbor across the way, who has just joined the church—"The hardest thing I ever undertook is to live the life of a Christian." Tell me is this the testimony of one living under the law or under grace.

My dear brother, preach and write about Christ, first of all. Seek grace from God that you may be the means of showing Christians themselves that it is faith alone that justifies—that in Christ they have died unto the law—that they are now married to Christ in order that they may "bring forth fruit unto God." Your message of the Lord's coming will not be welcome to legalists or to worldlings. The backslidden condition of the Church is the great barrier to reception of all such solemn truths as God has called you to proclaim. Nothing but fervent love for Jesus will make your tidings sweet. Where love is cold, your gospel will prove an intruder. Where the heart has not turned away from its first love, you will find your message most blessed.

I cannot tell you of anything very encouraging in these parts. The doctrine of the Lord's coming is, I fear, now no more agreeable to the ears of many, than when God gave us grace to declare it twenty years ago or more. Multitudes then turned away from the truth, and settled down into dreams of a millennium in the future, to be brought about by human agencies; by the spread of Bibles, by sending forth of missionaries, by societies for the suppression of intemperance, slavery, and the like. Seeing gigantic evils in the way of the progress of the gospel, they say these must be removed ere the gospel can triumph.

The world, the civil arm, essays to extinguish these evils; we will join them in the labor. And so the church becomes the servant of the world; and Christians become mixed up in politics. The preacher converts the pulpit into a political rostrum, and the meeting-houses witness to subjects and scenes such as one expects only where the worship of God is not known; stamping and hissing take the place of confessions and praises. A professed minister to a church of Christ gravely tells his people, that he has a "notion to deliver a sermon next Lord's day on the doctrine of States' rights." A "notion!" Well said! As a minister of Christ he has a "notion!" What knows he of being prompted by the Holy Spirit to preach, or of looking to God for his message?

From all this the way is straight to the battle-field; the heavenly citizenship is forgotten and denied, and the church vanishes out of sight under the cloud which the passions of men have raised to suppress some real or fancied evil, or to bring about some selfish ends. I tell you my brother we are fast reaching the very position indicated in the words of a distinguished teacher of youth in this State, to me a few days ago, "The —— party is a church, every school is a church!" The idea seems to be any and everything that looks to man's temporal alleviation, is a church." "Therefore come all ye of every stripe of religious faith; yes, come doubters and atheists even. Your heads may be a little wrong, but you ne'er mind for that; you have the theory in you. You want to relieve and ennoble the race. That is enough! We greet you into our circle! Come join hands with us in this great work and away with man's wickedness, God's mercy in the church; away with songs and prayers; give us room to work. We will do God's work!"

Should time continue many years, Br. H., you will see more than one Theodore Parker, and count more than one such assembly as now fills the Music Hall in Boston. Well, we must expect all this evil, and all the madness of the hour should not surprise us, or rob us of our peace in God. But all the confusion of the world and the ruin of the church shall only awaken in us yet more vehement, cries—"How long, O Lord?"

The Expected Antichrist.

We thought possibly that in Napoleon III. might be developed the personal Antichrist. But it was some fifteen years since. Every move of that personage since has tended to weaken such thought till we have abandoned it. The following notice of the man we take from an exchange. We trust his end is not far off. But we wait to see.

Napoleon's Face.—The most tired face in Europe, after Bismarck's. A face which seems perpetually working into ripples of unrest, with now and then a great wave of calm fluttering across it, majestic, tremendous—gone! A face which you may see only once, and never forget; which crystallizes in the memory like those strange figures seen in dreams. Savagely practical, and intensely human, without being in the least humane. Like that of all great men, the side view of it is the most imposing. Here and there quivers a repulsive nerve, as witness those at the corners of the eyes, where wrinkles now proclaim Time's sway. It is very hard to see much of the old Cæsaric type, even in the medals, where the fictitious laurel crown graces the brow. This is a man of expedients, subtile, always ready to clinch a thought rapidly with a deed; given to mistakes, and therefore constantly watchful—too alert to be pleasant. The sunshine never softens the face, costume never heightens it. The sombre Luxembourg palace were far more fitting as his residence, than the ornamented and cheery Tuileries. The face would show best in a dim apartment, where the weak lines would be lost in protecting shade, and the queer gleam of the eyes might better show forth. There is a perpetual over night air about it; the brain seems to weigh heavily, to need more natural, instead of unnatural stimulus, continually; the eyes in the daylight tell of a burdened, anxious, stricken soul which always braves its way, but never nobly asserts it. It is a face of make-shifts, of bargains; in no case, under no inspirations, one of earnest principle. It tells of severe labor, of much dissipation; it speaks very little of the vexations, the imprisonments, the adventures before the arrival at the throne; but rather of the anxieties, the risks of maintaining the seat upon that throne. Not one whit would it blanch on the scaffold; not one muscle would it move at the sight of a barricade, until the triumph came. The soul which looks from the eyes contends to the bitter extreme for material aggrandizement, and the body, like Cataline's, knows no limit to endurance of every kind, so long as hope endures. No sudden blow could crush this face to earth; only persistent battling of superior force can turn it from the foe. It is incapable of fright; rarely sensitive, in public, to emotion; always speaks more of the love of power than of real power itself. The hidden force is not fully expressed upon the lips; but craftiness is written there by a master hand, which never yet struck a false line.

Do not affect humility. The moment humility is spoken of by him that has it, that moment it is gone. It is like those delicate things which dissolve the instant they are touched. You may seek out the violet; it does not, like the poppy, thrust itself upon your notice. The moment humility tells you, "I am here," there is an end to it.

Walking in Christ.—No. 2.

"As ye have received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk ye in Him." Paul.

When we as a people embraced the doctrine of the speedy personal advent of Christ, and made it a distinct feature in our public ministrations, this text was again quoted as a reason why we should maintain our former connection with the particular religious denominations of which we were members, even at the expense of compromising our honest convictions of what we deemed to be truth. But the question arises, how did we receive Christ with relation to his second coming? We do not ask what were our feelings after having become indoctrinated in the particular tenets of "our church;" but what direction did our sympathies take, with respect to this matter, when first we received Christ Jesus the Lord?

In asking this question my mind is taken back to scenes which I very often witnessed in my boyhood days. In those early times I was very often in religious excitements, as a spectator; and looking back to that time I can now realize, and believe that in them were many cases of genuine Christian conversion. It was customary for those who were candidates for church membership to relate their Christian experience before receiving baptism. Many indeed were the instances where young converts, not only expressed an ardenet love for our great high priest, and elder brother, but spoke of an earnest desire to see him, and live forever in his presence. The remark was often made, "I felt, when first I found peace, as though I would be glad to die, because I would then go and be with Jesus." This was the condition of mind into which genuine conversion always brought those who experienced that change then, and so it must be still.

When therefore we "received Christ Jesus the Lord," if the work was real, we all, without one exception, received him in "a love of his appearing." And how could it be otherwise? If that change called conversion, when accomplished, is simply "Christ in us the hope of Glory"—"Christ dwelling in our hearts by faith"—how can it be otherwise, than that we shall desire his personal, actual presence? It is on this principle that Paul declares there is a crown laid up for all who love his appearing. Every one of us then, who do really "receive Christ Jesus the Lord," with us it will be a matter of rejoicing and comfort to know that him whom our soul loveth is coming to receive us unto himself, as certainly as every effect will follow its cause. If, therefore, we do walk in Christ Jesus as we have received him, we shall be in a frame of mind that will constantly lead us to most anxiously desire the glorious appearing of our loving Lord. There is no surer evidence of a want of genuine Christian piety in the churches of the present day, than the fact that they, as bodies, have no desire for the appearing of our Lord. And in this matter it makes no difference by what name we are called, if we find in our hearts a desire for the day of Jesus Christ to be put far away, it is an unmistakable evidence that, whatever may have been our spiritual condition in days gone by, we are now unprepared for a future life—that if we have received Christ Jesus the Lord in the past, we have left our first love, and are destitute of all real evidence, that we are sealed for an endless life.

And this condition of heart does not depend upon the amount of truth we may hold theoretically. It is true, indeed, that in the absence of all truth there can be no genuine conversion. But barely one proposition of truth received through the Holy Spirit will accomplish the work. Consequently, John has said, "He that believeth that Jesus is the Christ is born (begotten) of God." There is saving and sanctifying power in every item of God's great system of truth; but none of us will learn it all at once. If however we receive one item in, and through the energy of God's spirit it will get us into Christ. It will give us "the mind of Christ." Having the mind of Christ, we shall be glad to know he is coming on the principle of intuition. This change brings us where, to an extent at least, we are possessed of the same spiritual or divine nature of our elder brother, and his Father and ours; consequently, so far as we are made partakers of that nature, we shall feel its drawings, movings and impulses. As the magnet is attracted toward the pole, so shall we, in our affections, be drawn toward Christ. And so far as our affections, take hold on Christ, we shall have begotton in us an uncontrollable desire to see his face, and be with him forever. There is a plausibility in supposing that we may, while in ignorance, believing that we go to be with Christ at death, become indifferent to the great fact of his second advent. This would be perfectly natural. But we, having learned that no reward will be given us, till the day of his appearing, that if Christ does not come and raise his saints, they are perished, and death is an eternal sleep, how wondrously inconsistent with our professions of truth, that so few among us are earnestly desiring the day of Jesus Christ. And how convincingly evident is the great lack among Adventists, at the present time, of this earnest love for Christ's appearing, that they, too, as a body are losing the spirit of deep-toned piety, for which, in the early years of our experience, as a people, they were so much noted. How is the most fine gold become dim. But there is still a little remnant among those who have named the name of Christ, who, with the groaning creation, are longing for the day of glory. Who desire, more than anything this world can give, to see the dawning of that better morning, when "a King shall reign in righteousness" and peace forever. From their deepest feelings, and yearnings of heart, they are praying, day after day, "thy kingdom come." And the prayer will be answered. For eighteen hundred years their cry for deliverance has been going up, and it has entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabbaoth, and at God's appointed time it will come. Let our hearts be comforted with the thought, yes, weary pilgrim, rest will come at last.

May we all be ready to meet him when he comes, and enter on a life of peace and joy that shall never end.

S. W. Bishop.

At Keyport, N. J.

On the thirteenth of last month we moved from Oceanport to this place, which will be our post-office address for the present. A sense of duty in our Master's service prompted us to the change.

Our relations with the church in Oceanport were, in the main, in the sweetest bonds of Christian fellowship; as well also with the church near Eatontown, but two miles away. In both places we have enjoyed many precious hours through the grace of God; and in this removal we have this solace for any heaviness that may come from the privation of frequent meeting with loved ones, both in the flesh and in the Lord: that we can drive to them in two hours and a half; beside having in this place the society of the tried and true, who wait for the coming of our Lord and King.

For near two months past my strength has been low; too low to write or speak; but for a few days past am better: thanks to a merciful Father, and thanks, also, to many who have prayed for my recovery. We still crave the prayers of the friends of Jesus.

THE TENT.

As to the tent: am pleased to see so much interest expressed concerning it in the Herald of Life. The tent is wholly dedicated to the Lord, and trust through prayer it will be used to His praise while time remains.

Am led to add a word which experience has taught: that it is difficult to pitch the tent in a place where there is not a believer to obtain a parcel of ground.

The people at once get the idea, that in is a sort of a travelling show, ostensibly to do good; but really to make money: that therefore there will be a gathering of the roughs, that houses will be damaged and fences destroyed; so they begin to set a price to cover contingencies, or consult their pious neighbors as to the propriety of having such a doctrine preached in that community: and if you get a place other than behind the horse-sheds, it is because there is yet left some ability to discern the image of Jesus; some true toleration and Christian benevolence.

We suggest, therefore, that those who want help of this kind, who can procure, through their local influence, a spot of ground and obtain lumber, should let their wants be known through the Herald, or as they please; then the question will be, Can it be done?

Those who have no means with which to pay, or entertain, need not hesitate; only let the wants of your locality be known and the rest will be provided; for, it is in just such places that the tent can be used to the best advantage.

An Inconsistency.

The Rev. Samuel T. Spear, D. D., in an article on "The Intermediate State" in a late Independent, after maintaining the popular view to the best of his ability, in concluding remarks:

"We further say, so far as we can see, the Bible never makes the question a specialty; and that when it does refer to the period involved, its light is simply that general light which eqally applies to the whole after-life of the soul."

Now here is a candid confession that the Bible does not make this doctrine a speciality (which statement however we cannot fully endorse); but the popular preaching of the day scarcely takes anything else in the future into account. The intermediate state extends from death to "the general resurrection," which is placed indefinitely in the future—the longer the period the more popular: and of those eternal joys and heavenly scenes which the Bible only mentions as commencing with the resurrection, we hear nothing, except as the realization is transferred to the death of believers.

Here is an inconsistency which should lead our candid Orthodox friends to seriously consider whether they are doing right in interpreting and applying the Scriptures as they do: whether it is not a great wrong done, to assert and teach as Dr. Spear declares he does, that salvation "involves perfect holiness and perfect happiness, commencing with death, and extending onward forever, including the intermediate state, and all other states in the endless life of the soul."

Now the Scriptures make the resurrection and judgment the crisis of this world, which the above popular teaching denies, substituting therefor individual crises, occuring at the death of each human being, and making the judgment and resurrection of no conceivable account. It is equivalent to arraigning creation for foolishness, for its groaning and travailing in pain, waiting for the redemption of the body; when its better employment would be rejoicing at the continual dissolution of bodies. It is building upon two or three doubtful and strongly (we think successfully) contested passages a theory which subverts and pervets a vast deal of plainly literal, and easy-to-be-understood Scripture.

How can Christian teachers go on applying promises which the Scriptures mention only in connection with the resurrection, to man in death, before the resurrection, on the strength of the Saviour's words to the thief, and two expressions of Paul, even allowing for the sake of argument that these do prove a conscious intermediate state? There is no further revelation of the conditions or scenes of that state: and the application to it of the promises relating to the resurrection and restitution is entirely unwarrantable.

We repeat, there is an inconsistency here that should awaken our "Orthodox" friends to a re-examination of the subject. Let them either make death the resurrection, or else give up the conscious intermediate state.—Voice of the West.

Faith With Roots.

The only faith which is good for anything is that which abides firm and clear in storm and sunshine; nay, which is firmer and clearer because of exposure to storm and tempest. The faith which is born of fair weather, and dies under rough winds, is not a true and saving faith. There are many persons, who, when they hear the word of God, receive it with joy, and for a while believe; but they have no root of faith in themselves, and so, in time of temptation, they fall away from their confidence in God. Such a faith is good for nothing. What the believer in Christ needs is a faith with roots.

We were once called to assist in transplanting some young elm trees from their native swamp. Before the work began, we supposed it would be very easy; but, on attempting to take up a small tree, we found that its roots not only extended outward to a great distance beyond the trunk, but they struck downward, and entwined themselves around every object beneath the surface so tenaciously that it was next to impossible to detach them. A tree with such roots, instead of being blown down by windy tempests, would only be more firmly rooted.

What we need is a faith with roots that twine and intertwine about the divine mercy as revealed in Christ; roots that cannot be detached or loosened by storms of trial, but with every such storm will get a firmer hold on God in Christ.—Zion's Herald.

Christian Earnestness.

John Knoy, who prayed, "Lord give me Scotland, or I die!" has been dead almost two hundred yeas; yet all Scotland feels his power still. Such earnestness is not soon forgotten.

George Müller began his work teaching one orphan child thirty-five years ago. He now has a church of nine hundred members, forty of whom go out every Sabbath afternoon and preach to ten thousand people around Bristol. He has also established missions abroad. When he needs money he asks God, and it comes.

A gentleman in Dublin, who is no talker, but has great wealth, keeps eight printing presses going, printing tracts, many of which he writes himself in seven different languages, and thus he imparts gospel truth to multitudes.

A butcher in London, and a Christian only seven years, began telling others what God had done for him, and the result was their salvation. He now has a chapel that holds fifteen hundred, and has six hundred members. He has a large business, but preaches five nights in a week in the streets, in halls, and in other places in the city.

A Mr. Carter, who labors, among London thieves, burglars and pickpockets, has gathered a church of one thousand eight hundred members. His wife instructs one thousand six hundred mothers, meeting four hundred at a time, who without her labors would receive no religious instruction at all.

These instances show what men may do when fully consecrated to the work. Were all professors thus earnest, how glorious would be the result!

Triumphing in Christ.

"Now thanks be unto God, who always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savor of his knowledge by us in every place." 2 Cor. ii, 14.

When Paul gives thanks to God, "who always causeth us to triumph in Christ," 2 Cor. ii., 14, the word employed refers not to success in the conflict, but to the triumphal honors with which a victorious general and his army were welcomed home from the scene of their achievements. In the triumph of the Captain of our salvation, believers may be regarded, first, as trophies of the love which has conquered them and conquered for them; and second, as the admiring friends and comrades who swell the Conqueror's train and share His honors.

In the former view of the place of believers in the triumphal procession, they are not, like the captives of earthly warfare, dragged along reluctantly, in galling and shameful fetters. They are willing captives, drawn by the sweet constraint of love; like that of the woman who stood behind Him weeping tears of joy to wash the feet which she kissed, and breaking the alabaster box of very precious ointment to anoint them, amid the scorn of proud Pharisees, loving much because much had been forgiven. Eternally it will be their joy to be trophies of His victory, and the king-priests will account it more blessed to cast their crowns at His feet than even to wear them by His side.

In the latter view of the place of believers, as the admiring friends and followers of the Conqueror, when they consider the glory of His victory and remember that the enemies which He overcame were theirs, and that theirs are the fruits of His victory, they may well forget the dust and heat of the march and the derision of the city of destruction, through the streets of which the procession holds its way. We delight to think of the Church in its progress through the centuries as the train of Christ's triumph. Still more we delight to think of the gathering together at last of all who form the long line, like the crowd gathered around the Roman general at the Capitol, to be welcomed to feast with him and to accompany him home; but with this difference, that we shall not, as they did, part with him at the door of his dwelling, but shall go in with Him to go no more out for ever. Meanwhile the line often seems thin and scattered, dust-covered and wayworn; but every heart beats with love to the Conqueror who has gone up with shouts of victory. The advanced head of the procession is already out of sight, and we in this day are bringing up the rear. The way may seem long and rugged; mocking enemies may deride the pageant whose glory carnal eyes cannot see; malignant enemies may endeavor to break the line—vainly, for divine power maintains its unity, and still, "thanks be to God who always causeth us to triumph in Christ," we are marching on, not to the grave, but to the meeting-place where the almighty Victor himself will welcome the gathered celebrants of all ages, a mighty multitude which no man can number, to the feast of eternal joys. Patience, comrades, we are almost there.—Anonymous.

Br. Storrs: Please say, in your excellent paper of Biblical information, that I have just returned from a three weeks tour to Council Bluff vicinity, where we know of only three who believe anything of Israel's hope. With them and a few others, we held several conversations upon the great truths which those believe who maintain that God has promised life from the dead to all those who obey His requirements; even if it be to "offer up his son" as Abraham did. We are to obey the truth as given through prophets, Christ and His apostles. We think our labor had some good effect, in leading to a more clear knowledge of bible truths. Br. and Sr. Smith, of Council Bluffs, in his wagon took myself and wife to Cuning City, Neb., where we spoke to attentive audiences several times. The audiences were small, but very attentive, which always makes up for lack of numbers. Ten or eleven in this place have become obedient to the faith, and are determined to walk in the Lord Jesus as they have received him. There are a few more who will do the same after learning more about it. While there are so few of the faith, to be remembered by them as liberally as we were, in both places, encourages us to go forward and "defy the armies of the aliens." Lord grant that they may stand in the day of the Lord.

Meeting at Wolf River, Kansas.

We have appointed Thursday, Aug. 12th, to commence a meeting at Wolf River, Doniphon Co., Kansas, eight miles west of Troy, the terminus of the St. Joe, and Denver Railroad, to hold over the 3d just day. This will be the third annual meeting of the believers in the upper Missouri River region. We earnestly desire all who can, to be there from East Kansas, West Missouri, West Iowa, and East Nebraska. There will be some tents on the ground. Come to stay a week. What ministers of the "one faith" will attend? Let us live in the "one faith, one spirit, one baptism," that we may be in the "one Lord, one hope, and one God," who is "all in all."

St. Paul, Minn., June 3, 1869.

Br. Storrs: The selected article in the Herald on Shrinking from Christ's Coming, interested me much; but one important feature for confidence in my own experience, and as I understand the gospel plan, I do not see clearly presented. The believing heart that understandingly prays, "Come Lord Jesus, come quickly," should not and does not, I think, shrink from its realities. The strong ground for confidence is, that he is not accepted through any merit of his own; for he has none; but with that perfect righteousness wrought out by the Son of God.

In reviewing the past, how unsatisfying our best efforts. What could we present to the eye of Omniscience as meritorious, while the righteousness we may wear is perfect in purity, without spot or wrinkle? We may test it ever so much, and not a stain spot can be found within its sacred folds. Perfect in justice, Jesus has fulfilled the law; our iniquities are pardoned; therefore there is now no condemnation: perfect in power, which was wrought in Christ when He was raised from the dead; and from whom neither life or death, things present or to come can separate; perfect in love; God so loved us that this robe was provided; perfect in durability and unchangeableness, eternal Life being its crowning glory. It is ours to wear; yet we cannot wear it with the soiled garments of worldly conformity. With what confidence we may array ourselves thus by a living sacrifice, trusting it will prove a perfect passport to the favor of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming and kingdom.

With this view, how much stronger may be our confidence, than if we could review a blameless life. There would be in it some wickedness, some uncertainty; while that which is ours to wear has no defects. O, the wonderful wisdom, power and love that provided such vestments—the raiment of the King's Son, all glorious within, and invites me and you, dear readers of the Herald, to adorn ourselves without money and without price. O, the peace that attends such adorning! The glitter of earth and its turmoil disturbs it not, although like an earthquake shock, it flows serene as ever. It is the peace of Jesus. Then with unfaltering faith know that Jesus, having loved his own, will love them until he comes and carries them triumphantly through every trial that may precede or attend his coming. Then let the petition continually ascend without shrinking, "Thy kingdom come," and "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven."

From Sister S. M. Earl.

Albany, N. Y., June, 1869.

Br. Storrs: I thought I would like to write you, and tell you that I am growing in the light and knowledge of God's word; and how it comforts me to know that I am a child of God; for He does manifest Himself to me as He does not unto the world. When I look back on my past life, and think what I was—so dark, knew nothing of God, nor Jesus, nor his word—then I can say, The light of the glorious gospel has shone into my heart to bring me to the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus; for He says, He is the Life, Truth, and the Way to all that desire it with all their hearts. And how He hears the prayer of faith! He loves simple faith in Him, and to have us come as little children go to their father: they believe that He will give them what they ask for, because they have never learned to doubt him. That is the way to go to our Father in heaven; believing that He is faithful to his word. It is so easy for me to believe, because I have been taught of God alone, by His Spirit; and I do feel that I have the light of His precious word. The Bible is a lamp and light to His people, and they ought to prize it highly. It is my meat and drink. He does shine on the word; and I hope that what I here relate may encourage the dear brothers and sisters scattered abroad.

Sister Wood had here a very dear friend, who has been sick a long time, and all the doctors pronounced it heart disease in the worst form, and said that she might drop dead at any moment—said they could not help her. Sister Wood said to her, "Can you not exercise faith in Jesus? You know that He restored my eyes; and you know that I am hearing much better."

She answered, "Yes, I can." Then Sister Wood knelt down and prayed, and God gave her an assurance of faith that He would heal her; and she told her she would sleep good that night, and all the week. Sister Wood went to see a brother in our church; a man of strong faith, and we prayed for her. She was so feeble that she could only sit up a few minutes at a time; but in one week she was so restored to health as to go off to Maine, to her father's. You know her father: he takes the Herald; his name is Jacob Littlehale. I believe that if we would rely on God and His word, in sincerity, He would hear us. I hope that all the afflicted will do so. He will heal them all.

Now this is true, every word. God will honor those that will honor His word; and I do not believe that God wants us to be sickly and feeble. I bless God that I have realized these things; and what a wonder to her friends! They do not know what to think. They said to her, "I guess you was so glad to have your sisters come that it made you well." But she replied, "No, the Lord has done it, and He shall have the glory." I know that none but God could do it, and He shall have all the glory. I praise Him for letting me into the liberty of the glorious gospel. I want others to have the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. How blessed to trust in Him. He is a sure foundation—the Rock to build upon: it is firm, and nothing can prevail against it. What a refuge at all times. How glad I am that my life is hid with Christ in God. Bless His holy name.

Henry J. Brumer, Nazareth, Pa., writes: I send two dollars to renew my subscription to the Herald of Life, and one dollar for tracts. I thank you and Br. Ronthaler for the light I have received through your paper. I was born and brought up a Moravian. I never could see the great point why and wherefore God created man, and His intentions concerning him as I now see it. I confess that I now think more and see more of God than ever before. I think the Life views are gaining some in our town. From your brother in Christ.

Note by the Editor.—It would give us much pleasure to visit Bangor, as you and the friends there request; but we see no way open to do so as long as our labors continue as they are and have been on the Herald of Life. We long, sometimes, to visit places where we have never proclaimed the Life views; but are reconciled to the deprivation from a belief that, at present, we are where our Lord and Master would have us to be.

The Stolen Sermon.

A minister had been preaching one evening in a village at some distance from his home, when on his return he was stopped by a footpad, who presented a pistol and demanded his money. The minister allowed him to take his watch and money; and the thief feeling some papers in his pocket took them also away with him, saying, that for anything he knew, there might be bank-notes among them. These papers were, however, manuscript sermons, written out at length in a fair and legible hand. Some months afterward, a respectable man called upon the same minister, recalled to his recollection the robbery, stated that he was the robber, restored the watch and a sum of money equivalent to that which he had taken away, and stated the cause of his making restitution was, that upon looking over the papers he found a sermon with the words, "Thou shalt not steal." The singularity of this circumstance induced him to read it; and the impression produced upon him by its warnings was so powerful that he abandoned his profligate course, became an altered man—devoted himself to industrious labor, and took the earliest opportunity of restoring the property he had stolen.

Christ's Attractiveness.

The character of Christ is attractive. The more closely we study it, the more its beautiful qualities stand out in full relief before us. His divine greatness appears in this fact. A sublime work of God in nature grows upon us as we continue to contemplate it. Those who visit Niagara are at first almost always disappointed. But as they begin to take in all the features of the wondrous scene, its grandeur impresses them more strongly, and when they have filled their minds with the sublimities of the mighty river in its awful plunge, they are disappointed only in the consciousness of being utterly unable to express the emotions which crowd upon them. In a way like this the character of Christ affects us the more carefully we examine it. His is a perfect humanity, in which a wonderful purity, gentleness and feminine delicacy are combined with great firmness and manly dignity. He had a womanly tenderness, but no weakness which in a man would be unbecoming. We find that he never shrank from contact with a manly world, and whenever he went among the busy crowds he was a man among them, commanding their attention at once, never suffering from their contempt, however much he may have been exposed to their wicked enmity. He went, for instance, into the temple among the greedy money-changers, and they quailed before his indignation. It is hard for a good man to command the respect of a villainous crowd. Christ did.

Christ's attraction is not a mere rhetorical figment; it is a fact. The love of Christ impresses people. He makes sick beds easier, binds up the wounds of hearts distressed by sorrow, and soothes those who have laid dear hopes away in the tomb. His cross asserts its real and permanent value in all the great crises of our busy lives as well as in the common duties of ordinary days. All the sweetness that there can be in a good soul are in him. As winds from spice islands blow over deserts, burnt up and fever-stricken, so the love of Christ wafted from his cross, bears a saving fragrance to a wretched, dying world.

We should aim to feel, as deeply as we may, these attractions of the once shameful, but now glorious cross. Jesus must be to us not a faded name of history, a dead fact of the past, but a living God strong to redeem. Over all who know him at all as he is, he has this power.

"No fable old, nor mythic lore,
Nor dream of bards and seers,
No dead fact stranded on the shore
Of the oblivious years;

But warm, sweet, tender; even yet
A present help is he;
And faith has still its Olivet,
And loves its Galilee.

By-and-By.

There's a little mischief-making
Elfin, who is ever nigh,
Thwarting every undertaking,
And his name is By-and-By.
"What we ought to do this minute
Will be better done," he'll cry,
If to-morrow we begin it;
"Put it off," says By-and-By.

Those who heed his treacherous wooing
Will his faithless guidance rue;
What we always put off doing,
Clearly we shall never do;
We shall reach what we endeavor,
If on Now we more rely;
But unto the realms of Never Leads the Pilot By-and-By.

Children's Department.

The Bottom of the Barrel.

In a city in Virginia, in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-four, I knew a young mother who, with her four little boys, was living in great poverty. They were the wife and children of a Confederate soldier, and his pay was their only means of subsistence.

Five persons to be fed and clothed out of the pay of a private in the Confederate ranks, in eighteen hundred and sixty-four! None but those who lived there then can fully understand what utter destitution this implies. Twelve dollars a month, when provisions stood at such prices that I fear it would bring discredit upon all my statements, were I to record them!

This little family had not always known want. The mother, educated and brought up in comfort, had married a clerk in the dry goods business, who, as he prospered in life, had been able to set up for himself, and thus had maintained his family in comfortable ease. But the call had come to give up all this, and turn his back upon "wife, children and home," and he had obeyed it.

Their pleasant little dwelling had to be exchanged for two small rooms in a large and dreary habitation, occupied by several other families equally unfortunate. The mother could do nothing to add to their little funds, not only because her time and strength were taxed with the sole care of four very little children, but because she was afflicted with an infirmity of the eyes. Thus her remarkable skill and ingenuity in the use of her needle were rendered unavailing.

Here was a helpless little brood indeed, but He who hears the young ravens when they cry, spread over them his shielding wings. Among these four little boys there was one whose infant trust in the love and goodness of his Heavenly Father shone like a fixed star. When his mother's heart was ready to break with the weight of want and woe, his little voice was always ready to sooth, and cheer her with the lessons of faith learned from her own lips. He seemed a little comforter sent from Heaven to bid her keep up heart and hope. Sore was her need of one. As the meal would go down in the barrel, down would go the mother's heart—sinking, sinking. But this little cherub with his clear, bright faith, took note of the fact that the barrel was no sooner emptied than by some means or other, it was supplied again.

One day he sat and pondered over this, until a thought flashed into his mind like a ray of light from heaven. "Mamma," said the little one, with a face all aglow, "I think God hears when we scrape the bottom of the barrel!"

I do not know how this childish utterance may affect others, but I cannot write it without tears—not tears of compassion simply for such pitiful poverty, but tears of gratitude for such beautiful faith, tears of delight in the tender poetry of the unconscious babe.

Yes, little one, you are right. Through all the mighty music of heaven, swelling up in sublime chorus from the innumerable multitude, that little dreary sound of earthly need has reached the ear of Infinite pity. He has heard and he will relieve.

I have taken up this little note of triumph and sounded it on, hoping it may reach other ears besides those of the mother to whom it was first uttered—that it may cheer other weary hearts besides hers.

When all the springs of comfort seem to fail, think not, O fainting pilgrim, that you are forgotten in your need, for as surely as there is a God in heaven, "He will hear when you scrape the bottom of the barrel!"—The Advance.

"I'll Keep my Eyes Shut."

A writer in "The Young Pilgrim", tells this incident:—

"Little Henry had been quite sick. When he was slowly recovering, and just able to be up and about the room, he was left alone a short time, when his sister came in, eating a piece of cake. Henry's mother had told him he must eat nothing but what she gave him, and that it would not be safe for him to have what the other children did, till he was tronger.

"His appetite was coming back: the cake looked inviting; he wanted very much to take a bit of it, and his sister would gladly have given it to him. What did he do?

"'Jennie,' said he, 'you must run right out of the room, away from me with that cake; and I'll keep my eyes shut while you go, so that I sha'n't want it.'

"Wasn't that a good way for a boy of seven years to get out of temptation? I think so. And, when I heard of it, I thought that there are a great many times when children, and grown people too if they would remember little Henry's way, would escape from sin and from trouble."

The Boy with a Straw Hat.

A crippled beggar was striving to pick up some old clothes that had been thrown from a window, when a crowd of rude boys gathered about him, mimicking his awkward movements, and hooting at his helplessness and rags. Presently a noble little fellow came up, pushing through the crowd, helping the poor crippled man to pick up his gifts, and placed them in a bundle. Then slipping a piece of silver into his hands, he was running away, when a voice far above him said: "Little boy with a straw hat, look up!" A lady leaning from an upper window said earnestly: "God bless you, my little fellow! God will bless you for that!" As he walked along, he thought how glad he had made his own heart by doing good. He thought of the poor beggar's grateful look; of the old lady's smile and her approval; and last and better than all, he could almost hear his Heavenly Father whispering: "Blessed are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy."

He was a noble boy and had true courage. He was not afraid of being laughed at because he helped a poor beggar.

Christian Humility.

"But I say, through the grace given unto me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think: but to think soberly, according as God hath dealt to every man the measure of faith." Rom. xii., 3.

Christian humility is a most excellent grace. Especially does it appear as a lustrous ornament in the character of him who is professedly called of God to preach the gospel of the meek and lowly Jesus. It is a feeling that springs up intuitively in the heart of every man who is really taught by the Spirit and word of God. When, therefore, we hold intercourse with men who profess to be called by an holy calling, who, forgetful of the injunction of inspired Paul, contained in the above text, bend nearly all their efforts to a systematized arrangement of self-exaltation, we not only feel sad over the great injury they are doing to themselves, but we are sorry for the harm their course will do to the cause of God. Our lot has been cast with a few men in the course of our theological career, who, seemingly, would rather that the cause of truth should remain at a stand still, than that it should go forward by any other effort than their own. Such men have mistaken selfishness for christianity, and a desire for personal elevation for a love for real work of God. Did their influence stop with themselves it would not leave so much and so great evil in its train. Such men are often possessed of great tact in currying favor with those of whom they wish to make tools to bring about the end to which all their efforts tend, and these people being possessed of acknowledged goodness of heart, influence others, and the car of God's truth is so loaded with human expediency, that the efforts of those who have only the God of their fellow men at heart are almost entirely neutralized, and the cause of God languishes into dead formality, and man-worship. These men are very often flippant, possessed of a vast volubility of wordiness, which is mistaken by some for great smartness and keenness of perception, and the question is often asked how can any but a good man talk as he talks? forgetting that even monkeys and apes can chatter with almost deafening rapidity. They generally have good memories, and a peculiar faculty for coining other men's thoughts into their discoursings, and the multitude with gaping wonder are astonished at their profundity; forgetting that parrots even can repeat what they hear others say. Such men are very egotistic, and they manage to impress on the minds of the credulous the idea that they are of so much importance that the cause of God can hardly live without them. If you follow on the track of such men, you seldom hear anything about what they preached, but they preached. No doubt they did, and preached more of themselves than of Christ.

Every minister of Jesus Christ, who is such in truth, and is faithful to the holy calling whereunto he is called, will always be calling the minds of those to whom he ministers in holy things, away from himself to God, and Christ, and eternal truth. When the opposite course is pursued that man had much better, if he places any value on the spiritual condition of the church, stay at home, and on his knees before God wrestle in earnest prayer, till he shall find grace to enable him "not to think more highly of himself than he ought to think."

Brotherly love should always, it is true, be nourished and strengthened into an abundant growth, but real Christian charity will lead us to "love one another" because we see in each other the impress of the divine image. All else is "carnal," and tendeth only to death. When we keep constantly before our minds the fact of our own frailty, our entire dependence upon a loving God, for all in us that is truly good, we shall be very far from thinking very highly of ourselves.

In all our efforts, of a religious character, we should seek only to please the great Husbandman that has thrust us into the vineyard. The question then will never be asked "what will the people think of me in the effort?" but what will please my heavenly Father, and do the people good, unto eternal life?

May God enable us each to seek the injunction of the apostle always, then when the humble few shall be changed to an incorruptible life, at the soon coming of our great Life-giver, we shall be exalted to be equal to the angels, and be constituted children of God in the future, endless age of glory and immortality.

S. W. Bishop.

The Old Testament the Arbiter of Doctrines.

The whole of Christendom have fallen into the mistake that the New Testament must arbitrate the Old, and that the New has a supplement of doctrines and duties. The effect is to make the Old Testament nugatory, or to supersede it altogether. It is rarely appealed to by those claiming to be orthodox, for authority. It is so little thought of, that the divine authorities of earth have divorced it from the New, and the New from it; and thus put asunder what God hath joined together. True, they have done it ignorantly and unwittingly.

In my experience as a preacher, I found in two instances the parish Bibles were as good as new in the Old Testament; but the New soiled, torn, and leaves out of place by reason of the more frequent use and vehement pounding. These cases were not exceptions, but the rule in the history of church Bibles long used.

Now such a slight of "Moses and the prophets" is not to be tolerated, and needs to be corrected. Let us look at this matter in the light of the Scriptures themselves.

1. Jesus, our Lord and Saviour, and the Apostles deferred to the Old Testament, and they were ministers of the New. That is as "strong as two points of the law." Take a few instances in their teachings.

Premising (and this must be remembered) that when our Lord and his apostles spoke of the Scriptures, the New Testament was not included; for not a line of it was written until after the death and resurrection of our Lord. And when the apostles wrote, commending the Scriptures and enforcing them, and saying various things of them, they did not include the New Testament. So much is so true and so easy seen, that nobody of fair intellect and information will think of disputing it.

Then to the sayings of our Lord, "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they that testify of me." John v., 39. "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures," etc. "And beginning at Moses, and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." Luke xxiv., 27. "While he opened to us the Scriptures:" verse 32. This is a notable text. "And the Scriptures cannot be broken," John x., 35. Neither can they be superseded or substituted.

Remarks: Had our Lord taught anything contrary to the Scriptures, or added to their doctrines or ethics, He would have given just occasion for his rejection. See his vindication John v., 46. But his language was "How readest thou?" "They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them." . . . "If they will not hear these, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." Luke xvi., 31.

2. The Apostles. "And Paul, as his manner was went into them, and three Sabbath days reasoned with them out of the Scriptures: opining and alleging that Christ must needs have suffered and risen again from the dead; and that this Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ. Acts xvii., 23.

There were some, as a result of this effort, who went to searching the Scriptures, and that daily, to see for themselves "if these things were so." These were said to be the more noble for their pains. It does not appear from this record that these Bereans had even the suspicion that the Scriptures were in the least defective in quality or quantity.

There was one Apollos, instructed in the way of the Lord. The same was mighty in the Scriptures; for he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was the Christ. Acts xviii., 24–28.

Paul again, and a notable passage, "Now to him, that is of power to establish you according to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ: according to the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, but now is made manifest, and by the Scriptures of the prophets, according to the commandment of the everlasting God, made known unto all nations, for the obedience of faith." Rom. xvi., 26. This apostle declares, also, that he "kept nothing back that was profitable," and "shunned not to declare all the counsel of God." Notice, "kept nothing back," and "declared all the counsel of God." And "saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come." The same has written, "that the Scriptures were able to make you wise unto salvation." And "profitable for doctrine" as well as "righteousness, for reproof and correction, that the man of God might be perfect;" and yet more: furnished, "Thoroughly furnished unto all good works." 2 Tim. iii., 17. Peter says (in effect) that they are more reliable than his testimony, though an eye witness. 2 Pet. i., 19, 21.

3. As a most valid reason why we should defer to the prophets has been premised, and it will bear repeating, viz. that the sayings of our Lord and his apostles, about the use and efficacy of the Scriptures, were chiefly spoken before the New Testament was written. If some were afterward, their allusion is always to the Old Testament, even in Paul's exhortation to Timothy, where he says, "preach the word." No new gospel. The New Testament has no new ideas of the Kingdom of the life to come, of rewards, of judgment, of man's nature, of faith, of practice, or of his destiny; and so of all the rest.

But what means all this talk about the dispensation of the Spirit? There is much transcendental talk that nobody can understand, and concerns nobody.

The new dispensation is a refinement upon the old, as a readable book is better for use than forms of type: as substances are better than shadows. But even this refined condition, is not peculiar to our dispensation. The best spirits before our Lord's day, or first advent, had more of the reality of our dispensation than any body or people since, except our Lord and his disciples. Enoch walked with God, and was translated by faith. Noah was perfect, and in close sympathy with the Lord. Abraham believed like a saint of God. Elijah and Elisha were filled with God, and wrought stupendous miracles. The prophets all anticipated our dispensation. Read Heb. xi. Please do it. What is more, the faith was theirs. Jude says, it was delivered unto them: and that we should earnestly contend for it; not in stitute another, as the habit and practice of our time is.

How like a mistake to, intrust this glorious, splendid dispensation with the exotic gentiles, who have no aptness but for vanity, idolatry and humbug. Such a vision as I have, of the abuse perpetrated upon this dispensation; which was set in motion under the auspices of signs, wonders and demonstrations of the spirit, by the hands of the mighty Son of God, followed by the inspired, flaming apostles, I am overwhelmed: my emotions enervate me; I reel under the pressure: the truth on paper would damage my subject. But, my brethren will go into a moment's retrospect with me.

The blessed gospel was corrupted in the first century: by the third it was quite another thing, and soon after extinguished by the decrees of councils, and "the faith" of Christ was made a penal offence by the edicts of kings, and is so to-day, in fact, as much as it was then, and through long centuries in form. O, for a mission of power against the abusers of our holy faith; or the kingdom, and the revelation of our dear Saviour, the ever blessed son of God!

It is plain that all this perversion of the gospel, that we complain of, and the failure of this dispensation—if not the dispensation a failure—the failure of every reformation that has succeeded, is because of the determination to make the New Testament teach differently from the Old. As the matter now stands, the New is made to contradict everything of doctrine in the Old. The Old says, "The earth hath he given to the children of men." The New is made to teach that "the good go to heaven." The Old declares of prophets, patriarchs, and kings, that they were gathered to their fathers—slept with their fathers."—"fell asleep," and so on. The New is made to teach that deceased saints are wide awake in heaven, and looking after other people's salvation and business. The Old has a promise of an incorruptible inheritance on earth, and the kingdom under the whole heaven; and the New, of course, is full of the same. Yet by this apostate age, the New is made to contradict it flatly; to dispute the Old and contradict itself; and many other lateral abuses are perpetrated upon the blessed Scriptures.

But some one will ask, What of the New Testament? Very much of it, to those who venerate the Old; but it does not amount to much with those who ignore the Old and over-ride its authority by the dogmas of councils, etc.

The New very properly is a unit with the Old. Its relation has the sacredness and oneness of a "Helpmeet;" not a dictator or usurper of prerogatives, which nature, custom, law and grace, will not allow in a helpmeet. The two Testaments are believed to be represented in Rev. xi., there called God's "two witnesses." If witnesses, their value and sole importance consists in their uniform and perfect agreement in their testimony. This leads to another thought. The very style of antagonists they stood up against through the dark ages have been detailed down to these times, still making the witness necessary.

Spiritualistic Pretensions.

Spiritualism proposes to supplant and uproot Christianity and substitute in its place the worship of demons. Among other questions put to the spirits at the "Banner of Light" office in Boston, and their answer, as published in the "Banner" for April 10th, 1869, is the following:

"Ques. Is Spiritualism, as a religion, to supplant Christianity?

"Ans. Spiritualism, as a religion, I believe, is to supplant Christianity. The era of the Christian religion is passing away, changing. It will lose nothing of its life, nothing of that which the world of mind has need of, but it will part with its dross and become absorbed in the newer and more perfect."

The spirits, through their mediums, are making a most persistent effort to destroy the influence of the Bible and the Christian religion.

We are aware that some think we magnify the present and coming influence of spiritualism; but we are sure if they knew all we know about its workings, they would think us quite moderate in what we say about it. The final conflict of principles and doctrines—truth and error, Christ and Belial—we are satisfied will be between all of the true followers of Christ, from every denomination, on one side, while their antagonists will comprise the Spiritualists, embracing the great mass of the people, including a host of mere nominal professors of religion on the other side. It will be a conflict—already begun—between the true and the false, light and darkness, God and the Devil. Activity is seen everywhere in the ranks of Satan, while the most of Christ's professed children appear to be asleep. Is it not time to heed the warning to "watch!" Are not the "perils" sufficient to keep us awake? Christian soldier, gird on thine armor for the conflict. This is a time when every Christian should be able to give a Bible reason for his hope.

The Bible informs us that "the spirits of devils [demons] working miracles" are to "go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." Rev. xvi., 14. The next event, in connection with this work of demons, when they may seem to be successful in their plans, is the coming of Christ. At the time when the people generally will have given up the idea that Christ is ever coming personally, he says: "Behold I come as a thief." Rev. xvi., 15. Though warned as in the days of Noah and Lot, the most of the people will have no more expectation of the personal advent of Jesus, than had the antediluvians of the coming flood, or the Sodomites of their destruction when they gathered about the house of Lot, the night before they were destroyed by fire and brimstone.

Again we say, awake, and gird on your armor, and be ready to meet the great foe under all circumstances. Let cowards flee, but let every true child of Jesus be bravely bold for the right, if he stands alone in the conflict. Victory is sure to all true Christian soldiers. But lovers of the world, and those who conform to it and seek its friendship and honors, and chase after its silly, ungodly fashions, must not expect to stand when the hour of trial comes. He who will bow and submit to what is wrong, to secure popularity, is unworthy of eternal life with the pure and the holy, who have denied themselves of "ungodliness and worldly lusts." He who will not bear the cross has no reason to hope for the crown. Said Jesus: "Whosoever doth not bear his cross, and come after me, he cannot be my disciple." Luke xiv., 27.—Selected.

Seeing Ghosts.

I recently conversed with a clergyman's wife, who affirmed that she had positively seen her deceased friends, in a disembodied state, with her natural eye. I asked the privilege of cross-questioning her, which was granted, with the following result:

That you saw something I will not deny; but did you see with your natural eye, or with the eye of your imagination intensified?

"I saw the spirit of my own sister with my natural eye."

Are you sure that you did not see her with the eye of imagination?

"I am sure there was no imagination about it; I saw her with my own literal eyes."

Then I have a few more questions to ask. Did you see her in the daytime, or at night?

"At night, about nine o'clock."

Out of doors, or in a house?

"In a meeting-house, at a prayer-meeting."

What was your posture at the time—standing or sitting?

"I was kneeling in a pew."

Were your eyes open or closed?

"My eyes were shut."

Can you see objects with your natural eyes shut, only by the eye of imagination?

"I certainly saw her, and knew her, too."

"Can you tell one person from another with your eyes closed?

"I could see her plainly."

Can an immaterial being be seen more easily than a material one, with the natural eye, unaided by imagination?

"I saw her; it wasn't imagination either—I knew her."

Well, did she appear in a state of nudity, or did she have on some kind of clothing?

"She wore a long, beautiful flowing robe."

Now that robe was either literal or imaginary; and you can't see a literal robe with your eyes shut, if you try all day; so you certainly saw the robe with the eye of imagination; and if you saw the robe with the eye of imagination, its wearer, which was seen at the same time, was seen on the same principle, for you did not see it with two sets of eyes. The eye of imagination can see just as plainly with the natural eye closed, as with it open; but the natural eye must be open in order to see either robes or persons. The eye of imagination intensified sees many things when the natural eye is not closed.

Judge Edmonds, the Spiritualist says: "I have seen spirits clothed apparently in their every-day dress, in grave-clothes, and in the habiliments of the spirit-world, but never saw one without clothing." Yes, Judge, "apparently," not really; else where do they get this clothing? Do they shear sheep, card wool, spin yarn, weave cloth, and hire spirit-tailors to make garments in the spirit-world, for the millions? Or do they steal them from us? If the clothing is only "apparently" such, then the spirits that wear it may be only "apparently" such, as the one is seen as really as the other. What the "habiliments of the spirit-world" are, we are not told—but as the Judge can "see material objects through" the ghosts, clothing included, all being 'transparent," we can't see the need of any clothing, as it is no concealment, and too thin to keep them warm, being made out of moonshine, or something similar.—Wm. Sheldon, Voice of the West.

Beef Tea Better than Whisky.

"Zion's Herald" relates a case of one who became so low as to need the use of stimulants. These the physician prescribed. The patient got better rapidly, and the doctor was congratulating him on the favorable result of his prescription, when his self-satisfaction was marred by the information that the whisky was untouched, and that beef tea was the cause of the cure. The patient was a sensible man, and was the cause of the doctor becoming one also, for the latter gave testimony in a convention afterward, that beef tea might much better, ordinarily, be prescribed where alcohol now is.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE NON-RESURRECTION QUESTION.

A REVIEW BY ELDER W. S. CAMPBELL.

ELD. L. C. COLLINS has issued a tract on the above question, which I desire to notice.

Having formerly been acquainted with this most estimable brother—a member of the same Methodist Conference for a time, and an associate in the early preaching of the Advent doctrine—I hailed with joy his return to the ranks of those he seemed in some sense to leave, after the first great work in the spread of the Advent truth.

I have ever had a great regard for Br. C. as a gentleman and a Christian. This is not in the least lessened by finding that we differ in theological doctrines; nor, I trust, will our fellowship be in the least degree neutralized by this dissension. I am more than happy that my old fellow-laborer is sound on the question of immortality as the gift of God in Christ. God speed in divine study.

The first grand assumption of the tract is, that "God's providence makes no distinction in this life;" and from this the conclusion is drawn that "sin is positively to be punished." We do not deny that actual transgression will be positively punished.

It might appear equally unreasonable to a man who believes in eternal torment that one should ever hold that a man could be rewarded according to the deeds done in the body, and still be destroyed in a few hours; for, if destroyed by fire, it would not take long to effect the result.

It is made a great objection to the doctrine of the destruction of the wicked that the wicked get so little by it that really it is of no great account—it need not be feared! Br. Collins sees no way in which the wicked are punished in which the righteous are not involved equally, and the one class punished equally with the other, if the wicked dead rise not. I am sorry he does not see it; but I fear the great trouble is the still confounding of punishment with torment: this the Bible does not do.

He will see it in a short time. A man who, like Br. Collins, is in the trail of truth, will overtake that blessed inculcation that torment is not the mode of the God of mercy in punishment. There is no necessity of torment in punishment. At the same time, the righteous are in the Word said to suffer afflictions and to endure chastening. But Br. Collins has so recently ignored the doctrine that punishment means suffering, that we should wonder that so soon he should have fallen back to the old line of remark to refute a position which he will find, by every mode of attack, is perfectly impregnable.

Br. Collins believes the word. Now, when the word says so plainly, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment," we learn, by examination, that they will not live forever in torment, but will be destroyed in the punishment. The punishment being unlimited, the suffering, of necessity, being limited by the capacity of a finite being to endure. All this is right; everlasting punishment means an everlasting condition. But here, in his tract, we are told not only that the righteous and the wicked suffer "Just as actually," the one as the other, but the argument from Providence (always true, in a degree, at least, and the only one used in the Old Testament), we are told makes even the righteous suffer punishment in this life. This argument—a posteriori—makes the righteous man, who is enduring his trials, even persecutions, for Christ's sake, the greater sinner; and, consequently, unrighteous, because God might choose to inflict suffering upon the sinner in the present life for his sins. This would be equal to the assertion that the argument from Providence removes all distinctions in moral character and action; and because we cannot see how God can regulate those actions or establish the rule for them and the penalty of violation, unless he torment men after they are dead.

Br. C., we repeat, believes the word. Now, the word says, "The wages of sin is death." But the believer in eternal torment says it is not dying, it is a life in torment after death. Now, we know, or we suppose we know, what the penalty is by what we read, and we read that death is the punishment of sin. How will my brother dare say that it is not; but living a short time after death, or dying after death?

We also know that all that we find of the moral condition of men is established by the rule—the character and the consequence—by the word. Does the word present any such invariable condition of the righteous and the wicked in this life as Br. C. uses on which to base a conclusion that the wicked will live, i. e., because they must have a life to come in which to suffer enough to die? Not at all.

Read: "Godliness is profitable unto all things, having the promise of the life that now is and that which is to come." As to the "good things"—"No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly."

Need any man be told that promises of good to the righteous, and threatenings of evil against the wicked, for this life, abound in the word of God?

As to the conscience, that is another matter. I do not know that a man will suffer in his feelings according to his sins, or that the punishment is anywhere made dependent on the susceptibility in the sinner to find impressions. What we claim is, that God will do as he has said with the sinner: not that he works with his feelings. I hope he will not suffer torment in his feelings, unless it will do him or some one else good; and it will not after he is condemned and the good justified. "God is love." Afflictions are not meted out to the righteous except it be for good. And all the inflictions upon the wicked must be for good to somebody.

It is freely admitted in the tract "that death is the penalty of sin." Very well; what follows? Will the penalty be sufficient? Will it be doubled? How much more than the penalty will God inflict? It will be contended that the penalty will not be less than the published, threatened infliction. With equal truth, it must not be more, we say. "But it cannot be natural death." Why not? I know nothing of these distinctions of death, thus so freely spoken of in the Bible. Do you? "If the righteous were all translated, then it would be manifestly clear." But how would it be any more clear than the change into immortality makes it, when the promise is of a life to come? If the state of the future is one of resurrection (and it is, as Br. C. believes, and as Paul teaches), what matters it whether they are translated or raised? They will not be raised and then changed! (Does Br. C. believe they will?) The time is nothing, if the dead sleep, as the writer of the tract believes. "Death reigned from Adam to Moses" (not from "Moses till now." Not "a common grave for the good," if we believe Christ), "over them that had not sinned."

I should as soon stop here as to stop where our brother does; and then, by stopping there, we have the statement that those not under sin were under death, which is what the mortal resurrectionists advocate, that they may plead the justice of God requires the life of the sinner to come back, i. e., justice to the sinner, because he was under death, but not under sin, i. e., not to blame for it. Great idea, that. But Br. C. does not believe so. The text he really needs, in his argument, is, "after the similitude of Adam's transgression"—the whole text.

They had sinned, but not in the same manner that Adam did. The condition was different, but they had sinned, else death could not have had dominion over them. But now the relief comes at last. "Who is the figure of him that was to come?" and herein is the ground of judgment. Adam was the figure of Christ. The two Adams came in to make condition and salvation. Does not the one condemn and the other justify, or save? Our brother, I think, amazingly mistakes when he says that death reigns over men till the general resurrection. Christ is "the resurrection and the life." In the one Adam is death and condemnation; in the other Adam, is life and salvation; but the second develops the condition. The sinner's death is seen in Christ. If he is an Adam, it must be so: and Adam was the figure of him. The "reward" and the "doom" will be determined by the "resurrection" by Christ.

Death is now stated to be an infliction on the sinners, and it is said must be entirely distinct from anything visited upon the righteous. Well, then, on all Adam's posterity it is a condition, and not a penalty, is it? Suppose, now, that God makes it a penalty in the continuance? "But I cannot see it!" Well, God says "death" and the tormentist says, we "cannot see it: it is living." Admitting that the penalty is not visited upon the righteous, does it follow that the penalty upon the sinner is anything different, more or less than God has so plainly stated, "The soul that sinneth, it shall die?" Can it any more than die under that sentence? "The wicked shall be turned into hell" (sheol), the grave, destruction. It might be a punishment in this life, by which it is ended, if it means the grave: also, "shall be cut off," and "consume," and "perish?" If a man has no life in Christ, and goes to corruption, as he certainly does when he dies, he will perish in his own corruption, utterly. These threatenings, some of them, are fulfilled when the sinner dies, and he "goes down quick into hell," "never to see the light."

The infliction is made the application of the penalty often in the word.

The prophet who disobeyed the word in going back to eat with the old prophet who lied, was killed as a penalty; and many instances appear. "But this was special." No matter, it is the same death; the "same penalty;" and as the righteous die, the nature of the penalty is the very same in both cases. But the manner is different; one is a violent death; the other a natural one. Very well. The continued death of the sinner is in a manner determined in the wisdom of the Almighty; the violence upon death, in the case of the righteous, in the wisdom of God in Christ, is another manifestation, but the same death. It is assumed that the penalty must be entirely distinct from anything visited on the righteous. Well, this visiting may be the hinge on which the whole thing turns; for God does not visit death on the saints, unless it be in such cases as Moses', who needed a little wholesome discipline just then; and God, to keep him out of the land, told him to die.

Take care for your axiom, brother. But the blessings upon the righteous are entirely distinct, including the being "raised up at the last day." Alas for the tract that the gospel makes its positive consist in blessings, not cursings.

To pass under the law for the punishment of sin, without finding Christ there, would be to kill the whole; and by Christ, only, the righteous will pass out; first by justification, then by resurrection. Amen. Leave the duration to the word. What says the law of the nature of the punishment, my brother?

Again! What must be, is what is stated; and what men say, they think, must go for what it is worth. Does my brother see any position for Christ in the 7th paragraph of his essay? Indeed, the terrible wrath to be visited on the wicked will not come nigh the righteous; but this Old Testament quoting refers to violent death, which was a penalty; while natural death did not stand so. Yet it was the same condition. "If ye live after the flesh ye shall die." Our dear brother says, "this cannot mean natural death: must mean the second." Well, well, what is the Second? Here, is the very question to be determined. "Saved out of it," or "from it." Will it be saved out of it, or from it? If the second death should prove to be symbolical, and mean a condition of extinction, or death without any remembrance, they would die "any way." Not as they would die else.

To escape from a thing that we are in, would be a blessing secured by the Spirit. We are in natural death, my brother. Now, Jesus says that the believer "shall not taste of death"—"is passed from death into life," and "shall not come into condemnation." It is also plain that Jesus did "not come into the world to destroy men's lives;" but "that whosoever should believe should be saved." Here is your position. Again, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins [condition]; and where I am ye cannot come" [punishment].

No difficulty here, brother. Take the word with Christ in it and all is plain.

The use of terms not found in Scripture gives the brother, who refers them to his opponents, the occasion to say that a distinction is made where the Bible and reason make none. But the assertion is, nevertheless, unscriptural that the righteous have as fully passed under the power of death, and that they see corruption, as the wicked, while the true scriptural idea of the law of sin and death is admitted.

1st. Christ, who should come into this assertion (but does not), died without seeing corruption, and it was not possible that he should be holden of death. If victory over death is attained through Him, then the saints, like Him, will not be holden of it. And 2d. Paul says, the other law, of the spirit of life, hath made him free from the law of sin and death. 3. They have not "perished alike." Nor will the future action of God, or the future condition of man be necessary to the distinction. The distinction will then appear (at the resurrection); it is already made.

"If the dead rise not, then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished"—The wicked are perished already; and the saints will "also perish," if they are not raised from the dead. There is, in this, a distinction, all based on character, which is known to God, and which will give character to the resurrection, rather than be determined by it. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord." No one, that I know of, believes that the spirit clings to dust. Yet, by promise, it is true that the Spirit of God is the resurrection power by which to place the child of God in the world to come. But if "the same Almighty power will be required to raise the one as the other," the "Almighty power" must come upon the sinner, by the Spirit; for that is the Almighty power specified; hence the promise of the Spirit, for this purpose, is not designed for the righteous alone, but the wicked also; and still farther, the sinner has the promise of the Spirit to bring him to the world to come.

"The resurrection cannot come from any germ." It is not properly a re-creation; but it is literally applied to man's re-living. But if death be "an extinction of life"—"perfect and complete"—how can life come again without the exercise of creative energy? "He hath given to the Son to have life in himself." "He quickeneth whom he will." He said he would quicken the saints, "raising them up at the last day;" but He again said, the wicked "shall not see life." If you find fault with this last quotation please notice this, "I am the resurrection . . . he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. [What of a dead sinner?] He that liveth and believeth shall never die." Death is an entire negation of life.

The tract assures us that the "sleep in Christ is an assurance of a resurrection to eternal life." But the figure of sleep is, he says, "a proof of the resurrection of all men." If the sleep is in Christ, and the resurrection is in him, and by him, where is the hope for the sinner? "Your life is hid with Christ in God. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear," etc. Those who sleep out of Christ, must take the chances of being thus out of him (in death), and will sleep a perpetual sleep. But not to insist on any such passage, the power of his resurrection is to be obtained by seeking; Without it, the death is unbroken.

"The Spirit [of God] returneth to God who gave it." What is the consequence? Destruction. "Thou turnest man to destruction, and sayest return [to dust] ye children of men." Once in destruction, how will they get out, but by a power specially appointed for the result? Such is Christ's power to raise the saints. But this is the end of the wicked.

"Whose end is destruction." "Everlasting destruction."

SAYINGS OF MARTIN LUTHER.

"WHAT is our sleep," he said, "but a kind of death? And what is death itself but a night sleep? In sleep all weariness is laid aside, and we become cheerful again, and rise in the morning, fresh and well. So shall we awake from our graves in the last day, as though we had only slept a night, and bathe our eyes and rise fresh and well.

"I shall rise," he said, "and converse with you again. This finger, on which is this ring, shall be given to me again. All must be restored. God will create new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness. There all will be pure rapture and joy. Those heavens and that will be no dry, barren sand. When a man is happy, a tree, a nosegay, a flower, can give him gladness. Heaven and earth will be renewed, and we who believe shall be everywhere at home. Here it is not so; we are driven hither and thither, that we may have to sigh for that heavenly fatherland."

"When Christ causes the trumpet to peal at the last day, all will come forth like the insects which in winter lie as dead, but when the sun comes, awake to life again; or as the birds who lie all the winter, hidden in the clefts of the rocks, or in hollow banks by the riverside, yet live again in the spring."

"We are not to stay here, and we shall be dearly welcome by him to whom we go, and I hope that when I shall see you clothed in white raiment, washed in the blood of the Lamb, and shall see you even at the elbow of our dearest Lord and Redeemer, and a crown upon your head, and following our Lamb and lovely Lord whithersoever he goeth, you will think nothing of these days, and you will rejoice and your joy no man taketh from you. And it is certain that there is not much sand to run in your Lord's sand-glass, and that day is at hand, and, till then, your Lord in this life is giving you some little feasts. It is true that you see him not now as you will see him then. Your well-beloved standeth now behind the wall, looking out at the window, and you see but little of his face—then you shall see his face and all the Savior—a long, and high, and broad Lord Jesus—the most lovely person among the children of men. O joy of joys! that our souls know there is such a great supper preparing for us."

"When we shall come home and enter to the possession of our Brother's fair kingdom, and our heads shall find the weight of the crown of glory, and when we shall look back to pains and sufferings, then shall we see life and sorrow to be one step or stride from a prison to glory, and that our little inch of time-suffering is not worthy of our first night's welcome home to heaven."

"Happy are they who are found watching. Our sand-glass is not so long that we need to weary. Time will eat away and root out our woes and sorrows. Our heaven is in the bud and growing up to a harvest. Why, then, should we not follow on, seeing our span-length of time will come to an inch."

"God may indeed call some especially to forsake father and mother, and wife and children, and all things for his dearer love. But when he calls to such destinies, it is by the plain voice of Providence, or by the bitter call of persecution, and then the martyr's or the apostle's solitary path is as much the lowly, simple path of obedience as the mother's or the child's. The crown of the martyr is cocsecrated by the same holy oil which anoints the head of the bride, the mother, or the child—the consecration of love and of obedience. There is none other. All that is not duty is sin; all that is not obedience is disobedience; all that is not of love is of self; and self, crowned with thorns in a cloister, is as selfish as self crowned with ivy at a revel."

ROMISH DESIGNS IN AMERICA.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

[Concluded from last week.]

STERN facts drive us to the conclusion that Romanism in America is a conspiracy. We weigh well our words, and know whereof we affirm. As proof, we will present some evidence from their own ranks. Dr. Brownson, long the editor of the only literary periodical in this country devoted to Romish interest, thus speaks:

"It (the Romish church) is now firmly established in this country. Our countrymen (Americans) may be grieved that it is so; but it is useless for them to kick against the decrees of Almighty God. They have had an open field and fair play for Protestantism. Here (in America) Protestantism has had free scope, has reigned without a rival, and proved what she could do, and that her best was evil: for the good she boasts is not hers. A new day is dawning on this land; a new chapter is about to open in our history; and the (Romish) church is to assume her rightful position and influence. Ours (this country) shall become consecrated ground (to Romanism) and here shall be established. Our (American) hills and valleys shall yet echo to the convent bell. No matter who is alarmed, or what leagues are formed, this is to be a Catholic country. And from Maine to Georgia, from the broad Atlantic to the broader Pacific, the clean sacrifice (of the Mass) is to be offered for the quick and the dead."

Such is their boast, open and defiant. Let this be fixed upon the reader's mind. Rome will make good her boast, if she can; and be assured of one thing, she will leave no means untried in order to succeed. She will bring Fenianism to her service, or anything, but what she will consummate her plans. If she once comes in power here—obtains the supremacy—she would curse all she touched.

Still there are other facts which it would be well to bear in mind. The Romish Society at Lyons, France, for propagating the Faith, laments that Protestantism has gained the ascendency here, and declares that "the Catholic church can never abandon the invaded territory." For twenty-eight years this Society has been sending money to the Romish Bishops of this country. In four years it sent the enormons sum of $612,656. How much money has flowed into this country for like purpose, we cannot tell. Even English Romanists have contributed to like schemes. Their zeal and hope are thus expressed by Mr. Morton: "The policy of this Society is to embody the Papal population together in the West. It aims at throwing a majority into the great Valley (of the Mississippi), and then control the destiny of the United States."

But we hear the plan uttered nearer home, under our very ears. The Duke of Richmond, once Governor of the Canadas, in a speech at Montreal, said: "The Government of the United States ought not to stand, and it will not stand; it will be destroyed by subversion, and not by conquest. The plan is this: to stand over the surplus population of Europe. They will go over with foreign views and feelings, and in course of time rise and subvert the Government. The church of Rome has a design upon that country. Popery will in time be the established religion of that country. To aid in this, many of the princes and sovereigns of Europe are concurring."

With these facts before us (and many more might be produced) we are not in ignorance of their designs and operations. They will conquer by subversion. See with what zeal and energy they gather the Protestant children into their schools, where they train them up in the Catholic faith; thus they are subverting the rising generation to the interests of Romanism. These facts are alarming in themselves. Their schools are increasing all the while; and they have so far obtained control of our Legislatures as to get the public money appropriated to their support.

Protestants of America—friends of religious freedom—open your eyes to these facts. The monster will soon have his grasp upon your throat. Do you say there is no cause for apprehension; that we are sounding a false alarm? His "Holiness," the Pope, will not view it in this light. Said one who knew, over twenty years ago: "His plans are deeply laid; his emissaries are secretly and effectually laboring, with the most untiring zeal, to accomplish his purposes. It is time that Protestants awake, and fully understand the danger to which they are exposed?

What shall we do? Shall we lull ourselves to sleep with millennial songs, while our enemies are preparing for our destruction? Shall we, the regal descendants of the pilgrims, who fled from tyranny and oppression; who planted religious liberty in the wilds of America; who watered it with their tears, and invoked the blessing of God upon it with their prayers—shall we submit to the galling chains of bondage and oppression? No; God forbid! No; we have heard enough of the horrors of Popery, of its infernal power, and the blood of slaughtered innocents, to do this. Before we will renounce that King who so soon will reign over this broad domain, in glory and splendor, we will enter the list as did our forefathers, who wore their lives away in Papal dungeons, or died for their Master at the stake. Whatever comes, let us stand up for Jesus. If we ever reign with him, we shall have to come up out of great tribulations. Rev. vii., 14. "Here is the patience and the faith of the saints." COMMUNION WITH CHRIST.

I THINK you will acknowledge that it is easier to serve than it is to commune. You will have observed that Joshua never grew weary when he was fighting with the Amalekites. It was hard work, but he did not get his arm weakened at it. But when Moses was on the top of the mountain in prayer he had to have two others to hold his hands up. So it is with us. The more spiritual the exercise, the sooner the soul tires of it. We could keep on preaching better than we could keep on praying, and it is easier to pray in public than it is to pray in secret; and let me say, that even in secret, it is easier to pray aloud than it is to sit still in your communion with Christ in the solemn silence of the soul. The choicest fruits are generally the hardest to rear. and the most spiritual engagements are the most difficult for us to manage. Beloved, we ought to have an eye to this, we ought to take care that we do not neglect these merely external things, which are good enough in themselves, these outward attending to ordinances, and sermons, and so on; but we ought also to take care that while we remember these in their proper places, we do not let these things crowd out better things, but see to it that we get to Christ, and do enjoy living, personal fellowship with him.

Communion with Christ is the most precious thing, and once lost, I do not care what you did in the time when you ought to have been communing with Christ, you may have won coppers, but you have lost sovereigns; for many have earned pence, but they have lost diamonds. For your own sake, and for the sake of those whom you would bless, you must see to it that sitting at the Saviour's feet is not neglected, even though it be under the specious pretext of waiting upon him. The first thing for our soul's health, the first thing for his glory, and the first thing for our own usefulness, is to keep ourselves in perpetual communion with the Lord Jesus, and to see that the vital spirituality of our religion is maintained, over and above everything else in the world.—Spurgeon.

DR. CHALMERS ON INFIDELITY.

"THE truth of Christianity," says Dr. Chalmers, "is neither more nor less than the truth of certain facts that have been handed down to us by the testimony of reporters. Let the historical evidences on which it rests be made to pass in review, and become the subject of sober, inductive examination; let the question be decided by a patient and fair inquiry; let the enemies of our faith show the world that their infidelity rests on higher grounds than a stale invective against the jugglery of priests, or the pertinence of a flippant witticism; let them bring along with them the spirit of cool and candid reflection, an anxiety after truth, and a ready submission to evidence. How little do they think, as they strut along in the pride of their infidel philosophy, how little of the spirit and temper of true philosophy is in them—of the humble, cautious spirit which Bacon taught, and on which Newton rests the immortality of his genius!

"There is a puppyism in infidelity for which I have no patience. I thought that now-a-days both gentlemen and philosophers would have been ashamed of it! At the commencement of the last century one had some credit in sporting the language of unbelief and infidelity—for they were supported by the countenance of Shaftesbury and Bolingbroke, who, in addition to their being peers of the realm, had a sufficient acquaintance with their mother tongue. But infidelity, like every other fashion, has had its day; and since the masterly and triumphant defences of our English divines, it has been generally abandoned by the superior and more enlightened classes of society, and, to use the words of an Oxford Professor, 'is now rarely to be heard but in the language of blackguards.'

"I revere Christianity, not because it is the religion of my fathers—I revere it, not because it is the established religion of my country—I revere it, not because it brings to me the emoluments of office; but I revere it because it is built on the solid foundation of impregnable argument; because it has improved the world by the lessons of an ennobling morality, and because, by the animating prospects it holds out, it alleviates the sorrows of our final departure hence, and cheers the gloomy desolation of the grave."

The Revolution in Cuba.

Our readers, from the secular papers, all know there is a revolution going on in the island of Cuba against the rule of Spain. Information as to its leaders, which is desirable, will be found in the following, article which we take from "Zion's Herald:"

THE CUBAN LEADERS.

For more than three years past, the whole island has been covered with a net-work of secret patriotic organizations among the Creoles and blacks, analogous to the loyal Union leagues of this country. These societies have met by stealth, had constant intercommunication, been organized into a grand executive head, been drilled to arms, circulated information and secret orders, had proclamations prepared, and were ready for a simultaneous rising; in fact had set a grand expedition in motion before the revolution in Spain took place. They can hardly be said to have taken advantage of that, for this revolution would have occurred, or been attempted, had Spain remained quiet. It is doubtful if the home revolution has aided the Cuban cause. Isabella was a weaker foe than the Provisional Government. Printed copies of the proclamations since announced were in New York six months before the outbreak in Spain. The insurrectionary movement had two distinct and independent origins, one internal, under Cespedes, an eminent Creole lawyer and jurist in Cuba; and another external, under Don Manuel Quesada, among the expatriated Cubans from Mew York to Mexico. Nobler men never led a nobler cause. Quesada is a native of Puerto Principe, of a noble family, and immensely wealthy. From patriotic motives he joined the attempt of Lopez to liberate Cuba, and was compelled to flee from his country. He has devoted his life to fighting Spain. In South America he has fought for the emancipation of the South American republics. Under Juarez he served as a major. general in the Mexican army, and won seven military honors for success against the élite of the French veterans. He is no adventurer, but a pure-minded veteran patriot, who has devoted his life to the expulsion of Spain from American soil. He has had in view every moment, for twenty years, the deliverance of his country. The disagreements between the insurgent leaders, which weakened their power at the first, resulted from the two separate organizations. These have now entirely and harmoniously coalesced, and form one movement. Cespedes resigns the military direction to the veteran Quesada, and becomes the civil head of the insurrectionary government. Quesada has a force of 7,000 to 10,000 men under his command, who are fast becoming a veteran army. The insurgent forces, numbering in all about 25,000, are under his direction. It must be remembered that he is on his native soil, and knows every mountain and defile in that lofty range.

It will go hard with the Spaniards before they succeed in driving Quesada from the field. The patriot leaders have laid a noble moral foundation for their success. All the slaves are to be emancipated and made citizens, with full power of suffrage, holding office, etc.

Perfect religious equality is proclaimed, and will be maintained. The most advanced common school systems in the United States will be immediately set in operation, if the rebellion succeeds It will succeed, most undoubtedly. There are millions of Cuban gold at its service in the United States and in Mexico.

The entire moral power of the United States and our Government is in favor of it.

Its success is the cause of liberty and justice, a part of the cause of humanity the world over. The cause of humanity is the cause of God.

The Separation to Come.

At a late meeting of the Church Mission Society in Liverpool, Dr. McNeile delivered an address, closing with the following remarks:

We believe that, first of all, there is a fearful separation to come, that the tares are to be gathered out and burned. We believe that the first great event before the personal appearing of our Lord will be the fulfilling of all those separations described in his parable, and that the world is ripe for that, and not for conversion. The apostasy is ripe for that. There is a falling away from the faith everywhere. There seems to be no power to rouse the spirit of men on behalf of spiritual things. There seems to be a deadness over the public mind for everything that does not affect the material enjoyment of life or the possessions of life. This is an unwholesome state of things. My dear friends, cry to him, who alone can do it, to increase your faith, and let me ask you, in all seriousness, one after another, this night to take a sheet of paper and write down solemnly, as before your Heavenly Father, what truth is there of which you are so certain, and the importance of which you feel so great, and that then relieved, you would desire, under his help, to proceed to lose your life rather than lose it; realize the fact and strengthen the spring it begins in the heart; it extends to those nearest, and widens as it goes, until it embraces the world in its anxiety to do good. Oh, keep the spring strong within your own souls, and keep the expression of it pure, according to the word of God.

We have somewhere met with the statement that a bluff old farmer once said: "If a man professes to serve the Lord, I like to see him do it when he measures onions, as well as when he hollos, 'Glory, hallelujah.'" The principles of the gospel of Christ belong to the farm, the workshop and the family circle, as well as to the church and the Sunday-school.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, JUNE 23, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Legitimate Result.

The doctrine of inherent immortality legitimately leads to atheism. This is the heaviest charge we have ever made against it. Is it true? Some will indignantly throw down this paper, and turn away with contempt. But why not hear before you judge?

In our issue of June 9th, we gave an article from "Zion's Herald," in which the writer said, "If God could annihilate the sinner He must exercise His power rather than to permit His dearly Beloved to expire upon the shameful cross."

Is not such a statement a clear affirmation that God has not power to put the sinner out of a living existence? If God has not power to annihilate him, then the sinner lives independent of God's power, and in spite of it. If so, then it follows that God cannot inflict pain on the sinner; for all pain is an encroachment on the life principle. But if the life principle can be encroached on at all, the continued encroachment will, in time, extinguish life, and annihilation would be the result, which the doctrine of inherent immortality says God cannot accomplish. Then it follows, that He cannot inflict pain at all upon the sinner: for if his life principle cannot be encroached on so as to produce annihilation of life, for the same reason it cannot be encroached on at all, and punishment is just as impossible as annihilation. What follows? Man has independent life, and no being can deprive him of it, nor cause him pain: the theological God cannot, and hence is no God. If, then, there is no God that can annihilate man, there is no other God than man himself, and atheism is the legitimate result, and pantheism is inevitable.

We charge the doctrine of inherent immortality, or deathlessness, as being atheistic in its legitimate tendency, and as being the parent of Pantheism, Spiritism, Universalism, and of various other corruptions.

To Our Readers.

We have labored, day and night, for years, to take from your pathway those doctrinal errors which hide from men's minds the beauty and glory of the character of the God of the Bible and his love for a perishing world. We have endeavored to present Him in that light in his character and government that should win your hearts to his love and service, and to draw you to love and confide in him who is the "brightness of God's glory and the express image of his person;" who, by his humiliation and death, having become the "propiation for our sins," God has "raised from the dead for our justification" unto life, that we "should not perish, but have everlasting life," through faith in him as "the way, the truth, and the life."

From many of you we have had expressions of joy and gratitude that might satisfy us if we only looked to yonr deliverance from bewildering and destructive traditions and doctrinal errors. This deliverance, great as it is, can be profitable to none of us, in the end, only as it shall lead us to love God better, and prize our Lord Jesus more, and to consecrate ourselves more entirely to the service of God in Christ. To this end it is essential that we have the indwelling of the Holy Spirit of God. If that dwells not in us, in its living power, we cannot be "partakers of the Divine nature," or have any Scriptnral assurance that we shall ever "attain unto the resurrection from the dead." Without this indwelling Spirit we do but "hold the truth in unrighteousness;" knowing what is essential to a future life, and yet neglecting to seek for and receive into our hearts the only agent that can ever "quicken our mortal bodies."

We would admonish ourself, and beseech all our readers not to rest in mental knowledge of what truth is, but strive by unfeigned faith in Christ to come into such deep and intimate union and communion with Him that our experience shall assure us that we have "Christ formed in us the hope of glory," and that "our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ."

Let none of us be content to "have a name to live" while we are in bondage to death; and in bondage to it we are, and shall be, unless we have the Spirit of God dwelling in us which "raised up Christ from the dead." We profess to believe there is no other way out of death but by that Spirit. Our Lord has told us that our Father in heaven is more ready to give his Holy Spirit to those who ask him than we are to give good gifts to our children. We are, therefore, utterly inexcusable if we live without such daily intercourse with God in Christ as shall give us the assurance that the Spirit of God has a controlling power over all our thoughts, tempers, words, and actions.

There is too much at stake, personally, for us to live without an assurance of the presence of God's Spirit, and his word ruling in us. Paul calls our attention to the fact that we are saved by "the renewing of the Holy Spirit, which he (God) shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ our Life-giver." This gift Jesus calls "The Comforter; whom," saith he, "I will send unto you from the Father." Blessed promise. May we all know, by our experiences, the truth of Jesus' words, "He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you." By it may we be "guided into all truth," that we may be witnesses of the answer to Jesus' prayer, "Father, sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth." Thus shall we be "living epistles" for Christ, "known and read of all men." Let us "hold fast to sound doctrine" and "words;" but let these cause us earnestly to seek for the experience of their saving power in our hearts and lives.

God has given us an amount of his truth which sometimes amazes us, and for which we ought daily to praise him; but let our praise take that practical form of obedience and submission to him in all things, which will do more to please him and honor his name than any boast of knowledge, however true it may be in itself.

The Life and Advent Union.

The next anniversary of the "Union" will be held on Thursday, September 2, in Springfield, Mass. We hope all our friends, far and near, who can possibly be present, will not fail to be there. The meeting this year will, probably, be one of the most important that we have ever held; and all who can aid in our work we shall be pleased to see, that we may consult together, and devise means for greater efficiency in the glorious cause of truth which we have been called of God to advance, as we firmly believe. Let us all so far forecast in our affairs as to give the time necessary for this anniversary.

"The National Advent Camp-meeting" is to be held at the same place, commencing August 28th, and to be continued till Sept. 6th. Many from all parts of the country will meet at that time.

A Fearful Sign.

The literature and education of these days is one of the most fearful signs of the times in which we live. Surely it is no time to be indifferent to these things. Man has ever been seeking to "be as God;" or, to be his own God. Self-worship is the crying sin of our times. In other words, "manhood" exaltation is the prevailing spirit of our times. If there is not to be a personal antichrist in the future, there may be a confederate one, which will be no less a scourge to Christendom. On the subject of such a development, and the causes that lead to it, we published, some years since, an extract from an English tract, and re-produce it now for a voice of warning to all. Read and ponder it well. It is as follows:

The most fearful and ominous sign of the approach of Antichrist, is to be seen in the Protestant Literature of the day. Here even Popery itself seems to be outdone. The world is deluged with novelists and periodicals, from the hands of professing Protestants, many of whom make it their avowed object to advance the wellfare of mankind and all of whom boast of the progress of civilization. Yet when we examine these writers more accurately, we shall find them preparing the public mind for the reception of all the subtleties of Antichrist. The Tractarians are circulating their feeble but showy volumes, written purposely to attract and captivate the young and the romantic; casting some of the gorgeous light of the Roman Church over the ceremonies and institutions of Protestantism; throwing all spiritual things into the background of their picture, and bringing forward the priest, the baptismal font, and the decorated altar as the central group; throwing upon them all their light—giving them their warmest coloring—and fixing the eyes of the rising generation upon external rites and trivial ordinances, for the purpose of withdrawing them from spiritual objects. This has always been one of the artifices of an Antichristian Church; and if we look to general literature, we shall find it calling forth all the passions and energies of the Antichristian confederacy. One class of writers have taken up the horrible and ghastly school of the French romance, as their favorite model. Such men as Ainsworth and Bulwer, with a great deal of popular cleverness, but no real genius, have borrowed the manner of Parisian authors, and, like all other imitators, they have done still worse than the original inventors. A frightful medley of felons, assassins, profligates, and madmen crowd their pages—their scenes and characters are worked up to an intensity of force, as if human life were a perpetual fever, and atrocity the only occupation of great men. This felon literature—this heroism of the gallows, seems the grand object of all their exhibitions; carried out by means of situations in which no man was ever placed—sufferings such as were never endured—and villanies which in real life occupied an age, raked together in the fictitious history of an hour. Such vile literature as this must harden and brutalize every reader. It makes atrocity become a necessary excitement, and thus prepares the hearts of thousands for welcoming whatever horror or confusion may be poured forth upon the world.

Another class of writers have adopted the school of burlesque and ridicule. With them, everything human, and some things divine, are the groundwork of some jest, or some sportive sarcasm; nothing can occur among men, not even war and famine, but it gives rise to some humorous scene, or is made the subject of some lively caricature. The effect of this is equally pernicious, though in an opposite way—for, as the "atrocious school" hardens the heart to deeds of blood, so the "school of burlesque" hardens it into universal indifference. Each is equally a sign of the debasement of literature. It proves that we have drained off the old racy wine of the intellect, and are now compelled to revel upon the dregs. And each of them is equally a cause as well as a sign of approaching evil. For let the great Antichristian confederacy be once formed with an Antichrist at its head—let the world be once broken up by revolution and confusion, and where shall we find the multitudes who now take delight in these publications? Can we doubt where? The disciples of the "atrocious school" will join the movement with delight, for they will then hope to see actually, in real life, those terrible deeds, and those tempestuous characters, which they have so long read of, and admired, in the pages of romance. The disciples of the "school of burlesque" will join the same movement as a laughable diversion, as offering an exercise for their wit. Or they will stand carelessly aside to satirize all parties, and allow themselves to be crushed into perdition, while they think that all is but a jest! The Protestant, as well as the Popish world, is filled with multitudes of such persons—they are increasing as our literature is spread abroad: and every one of such is a fit proselyte ready made for Antichrist.

The last subject at present is that of general Protestant Education. It may be thought that the universal rage for education at the present day, especially in Protestant countries, must, by degrees, convert the world. But if so, we fully believe that it will only convert and prepare the world for the reign of Antichrist. The character of Antichrist is not that of a madman like Alexander, or a tyrant like Nero, but it is that of a Substitute for God. The very essence of the Antichristian confederacy is the substitute of human wisdom and human virtue, in place of divine, as the means of producing the greatest happiness and of renovating the world. It is the general movement of the world, in a state of self-adoration and self-dependence, toward imaginary and impossible perfection. It is this which will give birth to the Antichristian confederacy; and it is this very movement which, at the present day, forms the pride and glory of all our liberal publications. And can our system of Protestant education counteract and defeat this movement? On the contrary, it will hasten it onward! The whole object of our general education is power and worldly prosperity. Every branch of art and science—every faculty of the human mind—all the progress of society is trained in the one direction—to increase the power of man in the outward material world—to acquire wealth—to promote commercial enterprise—to perfect the refinements of luxury—to ward off the pains and hardships of life, and to make the earth a sensual material paradise to some, and a theatre of scientific vanity and display to others. The most admired and envied man is he who, by some clever scheme, or some happy invention, can acquire a name in the scientific world, or secure the largest amount of wealth. And the young are educated, and the old are hardened into one monotonous sensation (for passion is too honorable a word), and that sensation is—material prosperity, and the deification of the human intellect. Can such education restore the world to God? And our religious education is not to be trusted. Enter a parochial school, and what do you find? Catechisms learned by rote—texts of Scripture repeated as a task—mechanical exactness—spiritual neglect—quickness and good memory rewarded and admired—military regularity enforced, as if our spiritual enemies were an army of soldiers, to be conquered by superior tactics, and by military discipline! But the education of the heart utterly forgotten—the mighty tide of the passions left to roll on beneath, until the foundations of society are undermined, while the surface looks secure and stable. The education of the heart (we repeat) is unknown! and children are converted into machines, which are either dull or elastic, according to their metal, but nine-tenths of which are unconscious of spiritual life. Some, indeed, will be converted, . . . but the great majority are only hardened and made insolent by this mechanical education.

We must now conclude: and as the substance of the last two numbers, we leave it to the consideration of every reader, whether the world can be regenerated and converted even by Protestantism itself, while the Protestant Church has been already corrupted and converted by the world. To us it appears evident, that the present movement of mankind is almost universally toward one point—the self perfection of man, and the substitution of the human intellect for God. And this must quickly end in the dethronement of the Deity, and the establishment of Antichrist, until the Day of Vengeance shall have arrived.

The Satisfaction by Christ.

How did Christ satisfy the claims of the law? is a question often pressed by the infidel, and too often overlooked by the Christian. My reply is, By leaving unmolested in its grasp whatever it claimed. Law is justice; and an attempt to take from it is either an act of injustice, or supposes the law unjust; and a proposed purchase would be met by contempt.

Christ, by his death, demonstrated the justness of the law to man; and by his resurrection, life is manifested, or brought to light. Without the death and resurrection of our Saviour, we could have had no conception of a future life; but let us bear in mind that it is "the spirit of life in Christ Jesus that frees us from the law of sin and death." Our Saviour gave to the law precisely what it claimed of us; and what he gave remains under it; and the spirit quickened Him. Paul became reconciled to God by the death of His Son, and yielded the remainder of his carnal life to the law, and, by faith in Christ, laid hold "of the Spirit of life;" and the life that he afterward "lived in the flesh was by the faith of the Son of God." That nature which our Saviour held in common with us, He gave to the law, and retains only the Spirit; and after Paul had yielded his carnal nature to the law, of course, he did not retain it. The nature of Paul, after his conversion, is the same as our Saviour's after His resurrection. Paul, the persecutor, is dead; but Paul, the preacher, will never die; he sleeps in Jesus. If our Saviour had not been quickened by the Spirit, He must have remained in the tomb; and if we do not lay hold of the same spirit the tomb must be our eternal home. Surely, "man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish."

Br. Storrs, the above I have written for the Herald. I have just laid hold of the great principles of "Life from the dead through Christ only." The light broke into my mind from the principles laid down in Gal. ii., 19, 20. I have not intended to borrow ideas from any man, hut simply wrote what I see; and if it is worth inserting in our paper, do so; if not, throw it one side.

J. M. Chaffee.

Zumbrota, Minn., June, 1869.

Remarks by the Editor.—How any unbiased mind, sincerely desiring to know the truth, and that only, can come to any other conclusion than Br. Chaffee has come to, seems to us impossible. Yet we know the power of prejudice where the mind has been petrified, from our childhood up, with the falsehood of inherent immortality; and we are led to abandon the roots and branches of that upas whose poisonous sap has corrupted every branch of theology, with the utmost difficulty; yet the truth must and will yet destroy that corrupting tree which has so long dishonored God, and wrapped in impenetrable mystery the death of Christ, as no man living can see how we are redeemed by Christ, or the law is satisfied so that man can be saved, if the soul is immortal and its penalty is eternal torment.

One expression in Br. C.'s remarks may need modification or explanation: it is, that "The nature of Paul, after his conversion, is the same as our Saviour's after His resurrection." That Paul, by his conversion, became a partaker of the "same nature" is true; but it was only embryotically, not yet perfectly established, or permanently developed; for he saith, "I keep my body under, and bring it into subjection; lest that, by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway." 1 Cor. ix., 27. But a man must be a partaker of "the same nature of Jesus after His resurrection," or the law holds all the life we have, and a resurrection is impossible. When the law has taken the animal life, that life is never restored: it is "the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus," and that only, that can "make us free from the law of sin and death." Rom. viii., 2, 11, 13.

Prevalence of Crime.

This subject, simply in itself considered, is so uninviting we deem it proper to remark that our occasional allusions to it do not transpire because we have any love for that kind of work, nor because we desire to induce our readers to a contemplation so harrowing, but as one of the signs of the times it is not without interest to all vigilant watchers of passing events. Such a prominence has it assumed that we frequently hear people who know nothing of its being a peculiarity of the "last times" express astonishment at the wonderful, abounding and fearful increase of evil.

From a New York morning journal, issued Saturday, 19th inst., we select the following:

"Suicide of a woman, by taking Paris green; another of a woman by taking poison of some other kind; Homicide in Harlem; desperate attempt to kill at Throg's Neck; a bold and successful operation by bank thieves in open day; a woman beaten to death by her husband; probable homicide in Brooklyn; an old lady killed by her sons; three or four children poisoned to death by their mother; a disgraceful prize-fight near the city; extensive frauds; a woman convicted of murder and sentenced to be hung; a murder in Newark; a suicide by drowning, and another by hanging."

This would seem quite enough for one morning's report; but it is exclusive of persons found floating in our rivers, and who came to their death no one knows how, but such as will not and cannot tell, and thefts, brawls, burglaries and desertions too numerous to mention. Evangelical Christians, so-called, are in the habit of devoting one week in each year to prayer for the conversion of the world. Would it not be well to make it two weeks, or two months, even? Of course, it would have no weight with God in inclining him to make void the word He has spoken; but it might result in religionists of the more popular school being brought to a knowledge of the truth respecting the present continuance, but final destruction of evil in every form. Said our blessed Lord, at the end of the world: The angels shall come forth, and sever the wicked from among the just; and shall cast them into a furnace of fire." Are the wicked cast into the fire for the purpose of tormenting them? Hear the reply of Jesus: "Let both (wheat and tares) grow together until the harvest; and in the time of the harvest I will say to the reapers, gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them." When tares are burned in the fire they are destroyed. Beyond this time of burning the revelator saw "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, blessing and honor, and glory, and power be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb for ever and ever. What follows then? Why, that wickedness will continue unto the coming of Christ, and will then be destroyed forever. God hasten the time. But it may be asked, Are we to do nothing for the conversion of our fellow creatures? Most assuredly we are to do something. We are to labor earnestly, consistently, intelligently. We are not either, as individuals or as organizations, to spend a thousand dollars, for instance, to gratify "the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life," by the erection of magnificent, costly churches, from which the poor are excluded, to every ten dollars that we devote to the dissemination of truth and sending the gospel glad-tidings to the poor, the ignorant and degraded. We are not to beg hard-earned money and then spend it in endeavors to convert the heathen, while the same amount judiciously expended will bring to the knowledge of the glorious gospel truth, and direct in the way of life ten times as many here in our own land where vice of every description and grade flourishes as it does not in heathen lands. We are to engage and continue in careful and prayerful study of the inspired word that we may be intelligent dispensers of truth, teaching nothing but what is in harmony with the revealed character of God; for so shall we the more perfectly glorify Him, reaching a far greater measure of sucess in winning souls to Christ. Let Christians beware alike of lavishing upon worldly folly and, wilfully ignorant or unmindful of God's designs, seeking the accomplishment of what is not in the order of providence. Trust in the Lord, for He alone can rightly direct our efforts.

Death-Bed Repentance.

A certain American physician, whose piety led him to attend to the spiritual as well as the physical welfare of his patients, stated that he had known a hundred or more instances in his practice of persons who, in prospect of death, had been hopefully converted, but had subsequently been restored to health. Out of them all he did not know of more than three who devoted themselves to the service of Christ after their recovery, or gave any evidence of genuine conversion.

A minister of some eminence and large experience once said, "in all the visits I have paid to the sick during the course of a long ministry, I never met with one who was not previously serious, that ever recovered from what was supposed the brink of death, who afterward performed his vows, and became religious, notwithstanding the very great appearance there was in their favor when they thought they could not recover."

The testimony of these witnesses is not unlike that of other observers in this matter, and doubtless fairly represents the facts in the case. To two classes of people, the facts teach importrnt lessons. A terrible warning to the impenitent, for they know not what hour may close their day of grace. Having no love for Him who "so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life," they rest their expectation of a future existence either on the belief that God will save all, regardless of character, or on the safety of death-bed repentance. Opposed to the former, as we believe, stands the word of God; while against the latter, almost all experience relating to it testifies that hope, however seemingly strong, inspired under such circumstances, is false and illusory. To all who labor to convert sinners to Christ, they teach, or should teach, the unreliability of conversions effected through the agency of the future torment theory. Fear of punishment is not a worthy motive to obedience, and obedience based upon it will always be short-lived. True discipleship commences in love; is rooted and grounded in love, works the works of love, and finishes in love. It is all love; fear, except to do evil, having no part in it. Surely truth is more valuable than error, infinitely better every way. Why, then, will professed lovers of it persist in teaching error instead? Why?

The Tent Project.

West Abington, Mass., June 14, 1869.

Br. Storrs: Br. E. Wolcott is unable to go out with his tent personally. Some of us feel willing to go with it, if the means can be provided and there is a necessity for it; but equally willing not to go, if no necessity exists, for there is work enough to do. Yet there is an interest in going to new places, and speaking "all the words of this life," in the ears of the multitude, that I love.

But I do not altogether like Br. Hanford's suggestion. To go into new places is the great object, yet some places, which have been "burnt over" by other preaching, might be found quite new as a field for the "Life views." There are new places where much good can be done if we can find means to hold meetings with the tent.

Having spoken with Brn. Clapp, Olmsted and Clark, of the church in Hartford, Conn., about getting Br. Wolcott's tent for a meeting at Warehouse Point or Windsor Locks, about the first of August, I would now say to them, that I have had no further correspondence with Br. Wolcott; and those brethren should address him on the subject in season to make the arrangement, if the meeting is to be held, as I have no time to attend to it. I want the tent, if it comes out, to go to some one or two old places where the life views are needed with a power to set the truth home to every heart. Let us have out-door meetings if we can. I am ready to make any sacrifice I possibly can for the cause.

If we have our convention at Springfield, we shall need the Tent there.

I am sure that nothing will be done by the Camp-meeting Committee that will either require us to withdraw it, or make it an object to do so. The suggestions of the R. I. Conference will not be acted upon this season, in all human probability. I think it is fair to presume that a camp-meeting, or a large tent-meeting will be held by the "Life believers," somewhere in Massachusetts, later than the Springfield Camp-meeting.

I present to the readers of the Herald, a review of Br. Collins's Tract on the "Resurrection of the Wicked." I will endeavor not to be tedious.

Wesley's Request of the Officer.

John Wesley, having to travel some distance in a stage-coach, fell in with a pleasant tempered, well-informed officer. His conversation was sprightly and entertaining, but frequently mingled with oaths. When they were about to take the next stage, Mr. Wesley took the officer aside, and after expressing the pleasure he had enjoyed in his company, told him he was thereby encouraged to ask of him a very great favor. "I would take a pleasure in obliging you," said the officer, "and I am sure you will not make an unreasonable request." "Then," said Mr. Wesley, "as we have to travel together some time, I beg that if I should so far forget myself as to swear, you will kindly reprove me." The officer immediately saw the motive and felt the force of the request, and smiling, said, "None but Mr. Wesley could have conceived a reproof in such a manner.—Selected.

False Prophets.

Thus did Jesus forewarn His followers; and never, perhaps, was there a time when men were more given to the idea of their special inspiration to be some great one than in these days. Some fancy they are no less a personage than "that prophet like unto Moses," and their dupes go off in ecstacies at the idea, and swallow whatever such utter, apparently with the fear that "every soul which will not hear" such pretenders "shall be destroyed from among the people." It is painful to witness such blasphemous assumptions from persons who, on other subjects, appear rational.

The latest development of this monomania that has come to our notice, is by a certain "Dr." in a Western State. His pamphlet has been sent us. It is dedicated "To the Inhabitants of Earth," and is entitled, "Philosophy, Prophecy, and Vision." The author says in his "Introduction:"

Having, for the past seventeen years, under the divine influence of the departed, been shown and taught many things which are new in philosophy and astronomy, which will shortly come to pass, and designed by them that I should, while in this sphere, fully write out and publish in book form to the world; and feeling that it may be some little time yet before I shall be able to do so, the angels have shown me the following vision, which they wish me to publish now.

Like other false prophets, he is taught by some other spirits than the Spirit of God; though, unlike most of them, he proclaims his teachers to be "departed," and "angels;" by which he probably means merely the departed ghosts of dead men. His devotion to these angels reminds us strongly of the language of Paul—"Let no man beguile you of your reward in . . . worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind." Col. ii., 18.

We have long since been satisfied that "Spiritism" is the offspring of the "fleshly mind;" and the more any one is brought under its influence, the more animal they become. As a curiosity, and to let our readers see what a diseased brain can produce, we give the "Vision" entire. The reader is not to suppose when Christ is spoken of in it, that Jesus is intended; or that when the "Lord" is mentioned, it is the God of the Bible: evidently, this person has no faith in such a God. He has given time definite enough to satisfy any seekers after it; though a little too far ahead to please some. Here is

THE VISION.

On the 26th of August, 1867, at half-past two in the morning, while I lay in my bed, at the back part of my office, in a calm, wakeful state, an angel appeared to me who wished to show me things shortly to come to pass, and give me the precise time when they should come.

He says: Behold, and observe well what I am about to show you; write it down and proclaim it unto the people.

I looked, and I beheld the Last Days, when our present time should end and a new system of time begin. It seemed that my vision covered the whole world at one glance.

It seemed that a new planet had been born into the solar system from the Sun, and that the extreme heat from the rays of the sun had charged the face of our earth very positive; and that our earth was being repelled much farther from the sun; and that the starry heavens were fleeing away, no more to be seen as at present, as our earth passed away and left them.

The positive state of the earth threw up into the air its vapors, which produced a very thick, murky atmosphere, so much so that the sun was darkened, and the moon looked as red as blood.

I stood speechless in his presence, as the awful panorama passed before my eyes. An awful trembling shook the earth from centre to circumference. Earthquakes rent the earth in divers places, almost continually. Bursting volcanoes spouted high in the air, with melted lava from the bowels of the earth, while the ashes from the craters filled the air. Sweeping tornados passed over the earth in divers places, filling the air with huge fragments of debris matter. Many buildings fell to the ground, and many large bodies of water changed their location, caused by the upheaval of the earth where they were. And the icebergs of the North melted away. An immense volume of lava was poured out of the earth in Australia, flowing westward—part upon the sea and part upon the land—destroying about ninety thousand inhabitants. The immense heat which ascended from this lake of fire scattered and broke a belt of nebulous matter, which now surrounds this earth, which has been collecting since our moon was formed; and the hot and fiery ends of this belt were quickly repelled from each other, and rolled apart around this circle and came together, on the opposite side from where it broke, which was negative, causing a great noise, and it formed another moon to this planet. And our present moon was repelled further off from the earth until it looked only about one-half as large as usual; and its brightness was increased two-fold; and as the younger moon passed betwixt it and this earth, the strong currents of the elements set it into a rolling motion, and its positive face, now to the earth, was attracted to the south.

The inhabitants of our earth were frantic, and screaming, praying and calling upon God to save them from the awful wrath of his judgments. Terrible blackness covered the earth, and horrible despair, past all description, enshrouded every countenance. Many died of fright, some from falling buildings, some from tornadoes, and many were drowned by the changing waters; but a portion were better prepared for this awful day, and stood, as it were, calmly waiting for it to pass by, having had foreknowledge of this great event and its effects upon the earth. Their smiling faces were turned heavenward, and praised the angels for giving them strength for this awful hour.

I shuddered as I beheld, and made efforts to speak. The angel then turned to me and said: Now, for the first time on this planet, shall the true time be given for this great and terrible day of the Lord to appear. For it hath not been wise that this revelation should have been made before. And it shall begin in twenty-one years and five months from this day. On the twenty-sixth day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-nine (1889). And it shall last twenty-one days of terrible, yea, most terrible excitement. Then the heavens shall begin to clear, and your atmosphere to grow more pure, until, in a short time, the New Heavens, and the New and renovated Earth shall appear purified, and fitted for the Celestial Reign. When Christ's new government shall descend from Heaven and reign triumphantly upon the earth, as it shall previously be given through chosen vessels. But before all this, great changes shall come over the inhabitants of your earth; governments and kingdoms shall fall to rise no more; while new and better governments shall rise in their places. Famine, pestilence and wars shall sweep over the earth, and remove many.

Agitation after agitation shall stir up the people preparatory for the great change, which must soon come to all nations, kindred, and tongues, upon your planet.

All these things, with their effects, swiftly flitted before my vision, and made a deep impression upon my soul. I appeared to see the new condition of things as they existed, and the great and glorious change which had taken place. I was fully awake to outer consciousness, but could not speak. As the vision closed to my external sight, he says, Now haste to yonr desk and write it down as you have been made to understand it, and in a short time I will come to you again and give it to you still more clear and in a broader sense.

I immediately left my bed and went to my desk, and hastily sketched the awful vision, while he stood by me, to witness each word and correct my errors as I hurriedly wrote the contents of what he had shown me.

He then departed, and I returned to my room to ponder over the awfulness of the terrible scene which I had witnessed, and how my vision and thoughts had so rapidly extended over so much scenery in so short a time. I looked at my watch, and it was not yet three o'clock in the morning.

Concluding Note by Editor Herald of Life.—How many more false prophets will appear, puffed up with the idea of their own greatness, or self-hood Godship, it is impossible to tell. But let all be on their guard against such pretenders, if they would not be "led astray by the error of the wicked, and so fall from steadfastness" in Christ. Let us keep close to the Lord Jesus, that His word and spirit may preserve us from every delusion of false prophets.

The Deist and the Quaker.

A gay young man, travelling in a stage coach in London, forced his deistical sentiments on the company by attempting to ridicule the scriptures; and among other topics, made himself merry with the story of David and Goliath, strongly urging the impossibility of a youth like David being able to throw a stone with sufficient force to sink into the giant's forehead. On this he appealed to the company and particularly to a grave Quaker gentleman, who sat silent in the corner of the stage. "Indeed, friend," replied he, "I do not think it all improbable, if the Philistine's head was as soft as thine." This grave rebuke reduced the young man to silence.—Selected.

Submission to God's Will.

There was a good woman, who, when she was ill, being asked whether she was willing to live or die, answered, "which God pleaseth." "But," said one standing by, "if God should refer it to you, which would you choose?" "Truly," said she, "if God should refer it to me, I would even refer it to him again."—Selected.

Letters and Extracts.

From Wm. R. Warner.

North Cambridge, Mass., June 21, 1869.

Br. Storrs: Last week I picked up on Boston Common a little tract, "You are Immortal!" and I am told that there was a large amount of these circulated during Jubilee week. It occurred to me that this would be a pretty and cheap form to publish the story of "Little Dene," which was pnblished a short time since in the Herald.

We, who have the truth, do not show the cunning and activity shown by others; as Jesus said, "The children of this world are, in their generation, wiser than the children of light."

Thus do they make the word of God of none effect through their traditions, which they have received from the old Serpent, called the devil and Satan, which deceiveth the whole world.

"You are Immortal!"

"Ye shall not Surely Die!"

Thus do they "Strengthen the hands of the wicked that they should not retnrn from their wicked way by promising them life." Yet God's word will abide forever. They have the money and men in countless nnmbers. We have the Truth, the eternal God, and we know and feel that underneath are the everlasting arms, and He shall thrust out the enemy from before us.

Would it not be well to labor without reference to those who teach the doctrine of the old Serpent; for he is a liar and the father of it? Then let him alone and his works. Would it not be well to move forward without reference to their devices or disputes, and take only God's word and give it to the perishing millions, simply as it is, and shake off the dust of our feet against them, as did the apostles, and go to others who will hear? Yours, for the light of life.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

Grafton, Ill., June 10, 1869.

Dear Brethren and Sisters: Believers in Life future and eternal only in Christ our Life-giver, and no future life without a resurrection or translation at the appearing of our Lord Jesus. Then, and not till then, the second birth takes place; and the resurrection birth does not embrace the wicked. Thus we are in harmony with Job, who declared that man born of a woman is of few days and full of trouble. This is the lot of all, both high and low, rich or poor.

As it regards ourself, we speak from experience, "Few and evil have been the years of the days of our pilgrimage," although the number thereof has been, this day, three score and ten; yet they seem as a tale that is told. But we feel to praise our heavenly Father that we are enjoying life; for the dead praise not the Lord.

Now, I wish to say, that we are harbor-bound, waiting for fair winds, so that we can swing clear of the wharf, and spread our canvas once more to the breeze. But when that time will come, God only knows. We hope, watch, pray and long for the way to open that has been shut up, and compelled me to put into port.

It was not choice, but keen necessity—a want of clothes to wear to keep us from perishing with the cold of the last winter. We were caught out in a severe snow-storm, near two hundred miles from home, almost penniless, and were obliged to make our way home; and here we are, hard to work, with one arm, to be able to preach and scatter tracts the coming fall and winter, if the Lord will; and we do most devoutly pray that the brethren out here in the West will take hold in good earnest to support the Herald of Life, the best paper in Christendom.

Come, my much beloved in the Lord, put your hands to the work of providing to fill the Lord's treasury; for the time to work will soon be over. May God help us to make a covenant by sacrifice. Read Psalm l., 5. Br. Osborn is on his tour West. Br. Walter, where is he? O how I feel for the cause. May he and others be helped on the way. Pray for me, that my way may soon be opened to blow the gospel trumpet. We want "Campaign" tracts, but at present are unable to help get them.

Yours in hope of eternal life through the Life-giver, soon, very soon, to come. Amen.

From S. Cornell.

Centralia, Ill., June 15, 1869.

Br. Storrs: Life only in Christ is undoubtedly the teaching of the Bible.

The seventy weeks of Daniel ix., 24, evidently ended at the destruction of Jerusalem, and if (cut off) determined on the Jews' nationality, do they not measure 490 years of the 2300 to the destruction of Jerusalem A. D. 70, leaving 1810 years, which, reckoned from A. D. 70, will make 1880 the time of the cleansing of the sanctuary? The 69 weeks, in verse 25, evidently ended when Messiah said "the time is fulfilled," Mark i., 15; and have no connection in beginning or ending with the time in verse 24; also, the one week in verse 25 has its own events, not in any wise connected with the 69 weeks, having reference to the destruction and desolation of the Jews by the Romans under Titus, by confirming the covenant which God made with Israel, saying, if they would not obey Him (see Deut. xxix.,) that the curse should come upon them, thus fulfilling the conditions of the covenant in the destruction of the Jewish nationality, and desolating Jerusalem and the whole nation in their destruction during the 77 years' war upon them. How fearfully has the conditions of the covenant been fulfilled on that people for disobedience and unbelief.

Are we not in midnight darkness, even Adventists, on the time of Jesus, coming? and may it not be a time like this when the vision seems to tarry, that the cry will be made, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh." All seems to be asleep on the time, with strange views afloat, whereby all is dark and confused.

May we not reasonably conclude that Christ will come prior to the cleansing of the sanctuary? probably seven years, as Br. Patterson has well said. It is a work of time. After the Saviour comes, the conflict with the nation is to take time; when "the nations will be angry"—"and there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even unto that same time." May we be ready through grace for his coming.

A Letter without Signature.

Milwaukee, June 17, 1869.

Br. Storrs: Enclosed find $2 for the Tract Fund. I am so glad that our paper is so willingly sustained; it is so much better than giving "Festivals," and doing every thing that can be thought of, to get money. Mr. ——'s church are trying to get an Organ, and it does seem such hard work to get the money. People have got to have the worth of their money back in something to eat or drink, or they won't give anything for the house of the Lord. O, if they could only get the Truth for the money, how much better it would be. But there seems to be a "famine in the land; not for bread, or for water; but for hearing the words of the Lord;" for "Thy word is Truth."

Note by the Editor.—The things for which people hold "Fairs" are not things which God approves; they are things to feed pride and show, generally. But "these things must needs be" when spirituality is gone, and truth is crushed out so as to find no place among the people.

J. M. Willis, Lake City, Minn., writes: The Congregationalist Minister in this place lately delivered a sermon on the "Immortality of the Soul," and has had it printed in pamphlet form. Br. Hudson has reviewed it, which is also being printed. I assure you the Life views are very dear to me, and I am taking every reasonable opportunity to spread the good news. I have reason to believe that the truth is taking strong hold of many minds in our community.

Note by the Editor.—If the advocates of inherent immortality can only be induced to preach and publish sermons on the subject, the truth of "Life only in Christ" will be the gainer by it. The barrenness of Bible testimony in all such performances helps to show the falseness of such doctrine.

The "Address" to Adventists.

The announcement in a previous number of the Herald, that a new tract was soon to be issued, entitled "The Divine Plan; an Address to Adventists of America," has created considerable interest, and already the first edition is nearly all ordered for distribution. Circumstances wholly beyond our control have delayed its issue, which we greatly regret. But the first edition will be ready to mail on the 23d inst., and being stereotyped we shall be prepared to furnish it in any quantities that may be desired. It is our earnest desire to place this in the hands of every candid Adventist in America, and to distribute it among all classes of thinking men and women. We have the address of over a thousand prominent Adventists into whose hands we design to place a copy, and to this end we shall appropriate the proceeds of its sale.

Our position in regard to the future re-living of the wicked dead has drawn forth many reflections from our friends. But we can assure them that in taking a public position on this great truth it has been no hasty movement. Long months of careful study and investigation has thoroughly settled our mind; and therefore, we offer this tract for the purpose of defending ourself from the charge of heresy, and to remove the embarrassment of misrepresentation. It embodies some of the reasons for the hope that is in us; and we offer them as our only apology, that they may judge wherein our theological position is heretical.

The original Scriptural, and pointed manner in which the subject is handled, we verily believe will make it an able auxiliary in the great work which lies before us as Life believers. Will you help us, dear reader, in circulating this "Address" among your friends and acquaintances? It is gotten up in an attractive form, and a small sum will scatter a large number in your neighborhood.

We will send two specimen copies for five cents; twenty cents per dozen post paid; or by express, one dollar per hundred. Any aid in its free circulation will be gratefully considered. Address,

Wm. H. Spencer.

Rochester, N. Y.

Hon. O. S. Halsted's address is, "Box 91, Newark, N. J." Any persons desirous to obtain his work, "The Theology of the Bible," should send to him direct. We cannot undertake to get it for any one. Please do not ask us to do it any more. We have all the business we can possibly attend to without going or sending out for others. If you are a subscriber for the Herald of Life, send Judge Halsted two dollars, as directed above, and he will send you his work free of postage. If you are not one of our subscribers, send him three dollars, which is the regular price of the work.

He Redeemed Me!

The tears of a slave-girl, just going to be put up for sale, drew the notice of a gentleman, as he passed through the auction-mart of a Southern slave State. The other slaves of the same group, standing in a line for sale like herself, did not seem to care about it, while each knock of the hammer made her shake. The kind man stopped to ask why she alone wept, and was told that the others were used to such things, and might be glad of a change from the hard, harsh homes they came from; but that she had been brought up with much care by a good owner, and she was terrified to think who might buy her.

"Her price?" the stranger asked. He thought a little when he heard the great ransom, but paid it down.

Yet no joy came to the poor slave's face when he told her she was free.

She had been born a slave, and knew not what freedom meant. Her tears fell fast on the parchment, which her deliverer brought to prove it to her. She only looked at him with fear.

At last he got ready to go his way; and as he told her what she must do when he was gone, it degan to dawn on her what freedom was. With the first breath, she said—"I will follow him—I will follow him; I will serve him all my days;" and to every reason against it, she only cried "He redeemed me! He redeemed me! He redeemed me!"

When strangers used to visit that master's house, and noticed, as all did, the loving, constant service, night by night, and day by day, she had but one answer, and she loved to give it—"He redeemed me! He redeemed me! He redeemed me!"

"And so," said the servant of Christ, who spent a night on his journey in a highland glen, and told this story in a meeting where every heart was thrilled, "let it be with you. Serve Jesus as sinners bought back with blood; and when men take notice of the way you serve him—the joy that is in your looks—the love that is in your tone—the freedom of your service—have one answer to give—'He redeemed me!'"

Following Fashion.

Rev. A. D. Mayo says nothing new, but says what needs frequent repetition, in the following paragraphs for young women:

Fashion is a good waiting maid, but a hard mistress. If you doubt this assertion, young women, try her and see. Now, she will tell you that delicacy of the personal appearance is the crowning grace of the sex; and will bake you in hot rooms and cover your faces with thick veils to insult God's blessed air and sunshine: and in every way reduce you to to the state of a diseased, inefficient caricature of a woman a creature that mother Eve would have disowned as one of her progeny. Now, on the contrary, she commands the most hazardous exposure of person, and requires you to breast a northwester, shivering behind a shred of muslin, or brave a mile of mud with a French slipper, or dance in public arrayed like a heathen goddess. She dictates the character and circumstances of your acquaintances, will sever ties of friendship and scoff at woman's holy love, and mock the teaching of religion. In short, if you can agree to submit to her, she will soon place you where womanhood will come to mean all that is superficial, false and absurd, in opposition to all that is real, true and reasonable.

Need I warn young women against such a danger as this? Yes, let me entreat them to keep out of this mill of fashion. I do not enjoin needless singularity, or that disagreeable individuality which forever intrudes itself into notice. But I do ask, in the name of Christianity, that they shall remember they were made to become true, pure, and lovely women, and not the actors in any social spectacle. I ask them to form their own ideas of life, by patient study, careful observation, self knowledge and consecration to God and duty; and to set their faces like a flint against whatever will prevent them from becoming this. If society tells them to dress in a manner that will inevitably injure that body which God gave to be the temple of a healthy soul, I ask them to take care of themselves, and let fashion talk to the wind. If custom tells them to do what their best sense of womanly dignity and grace pronounces ridiculous, tell them custom is changing, every day, and the dignity, modesty and grace of women endure as life. If foolish men and women think ignorance, laziness, dyspepsia and spinal disease, coquetry and the general waste of life, becoming, I ask them to be wise, and follow not after their counsels. I ask them to follow social customs as long as they can be intelligent, virtuous, and graceful women, by so doing, and there stop, and not permit themselves to be flattered, pushed or dragged one inch beyond the line.

A Strange Accumulation.

Thomas Dick puts the hoarding of wealth in this striking way:

Suppose a man could lay up a stock of clothes and provisions sufficient to last him for three hundred years, what would it avail him, since he can live at most but from 70 to 100 years? Suppose he laid up in a store-house 70,000 pairs of shoes, to what end would it serve, if he could make use during his whole life, of only the one hundredth part of them? He would be in the same condition as a man who had a hundred dishes placed before him at dinner, but who could only partake of one; or of a person who had a hundred mansions purchased for his residence, but who could occupy only one. How ridiculous it would appear if all that could be said of a man while he lived, was simply this—that his whole life was occupied in collecting and laying up in a store-house 60,000 mahogany chairs which were never intended to be used for the furniture of apartments, or 80,000 pairs of trousers which were never to be worn? And where is the difference in point of rationality and utility, between such absurd practices, and hoarding thousands of guineas and bank-notes which are never brought forth for the benefit of mankind. There is no conduct connected with the pursuits of human beings that appears more absurd and wicked (however common), if examined by the dictates of reason and the Word of God.

John Bright, the royal Quaker, says:

"More than thirty years ago, when I was very young indeed, in my beginning to think about public affairs, in reading the prose writings of John Milton, I found a passage which fixed itself in my mind, and which time has never been able to remove. Milton says: "Yet true eloquence I find to be none but the serious and hearty love of truth." And I have endeavored, so far as I had the opportunity of speaking in public, to abide by that opinion.

So far as I am able to examine myself, during the thirty years I have been permitted to speak at meetings of my counntrymen, I am not conscious that I have ever used an argument which I did not believe to be sound, or have stated anything as a fact which I did not believe to be true.

What a glorious world this would be if all its inhabitants could say, with Shakespeare's shepherd, "Sir, I am a true laborer; I earn what I wear: I owe no man hate; envy no man's happiness; glad of other men's good; content with my farm."

Poetry.

The Jewish Pilgrim.

Are these the ancient, holy hills
  Where angels walked of old?
Is this the land our story fills
  With glory not yet cold?
For I have passed by many a shrine,
  O'er many a land and sea,
But still, O promised Palestine!
  My dreams have been of thee.

I see thy mountain cedars green,
  Thy valleys fresh and fair,
With summers bright as they have been
  When Israel's home was there;
Tho' o'er thee sword and time have passed,
  And Cross and Crescent shone,
And heavily the chain hath prest,
  But thou art still our own!

Thine are the wandering race that go
  Unblest through every land,
Whose blood hath stained the polar snow,
  And quenched the desert sand;
And thine the homeless hearts that turn
  From all earth's shrines to thee,
With their lone faith for ages borne
  In sleepless memory.

For thrones are fallen—nations gone,
  Before the march of time,
And where the ocean rolled alone
  Are forests in their prime,
Since Gentile ploughshares marred the brow
  Of Zion's holy hill;—
Where are the Roman eagles now?
  Yet Judah wanders still.

And hath she wandered thus in vain
  A pilgrim of the past?
No! long deferred her hope hath been,
  But it shall come at last;
For in her wastes a voice I hear,
  As from some prophet's urn,
It bids the nations build not there,
  For Jacob shall return.

Oh! lost and loved Jerusalem!
  Thy Pilgrim may not stay,
To see the glad earth's harvest home
  In thy redeeming day;
But now resigned in faith and trust,
  I seek a nameless tomb,
At least beneath thy hallowed dust
  O give the wanderer room.

Children's Department.

From Grandmother Lamb.

St. Paul, Minn., May 31, 1869

Br. Storrs: Enclosed you will find the pennies of my granddaughters, a freewill offering, suggested by hearing Sister Weaver's proposition and little Dwight's offering. The oldest, Gilbertie Davidson, immediately presented his offering of fifteen cents. I went to Mrs. Hall's, read it before little Bessie B. Hall, three years old, not expecting she would comprehend it. She said to her mother, "I want some of my pennies." Her mother asked, what do you wish to do with them? "I want to give them for what Dwightie did." She picked out three five cent pieces, calling them three pennies, and said, "Give them to Mr. Storrs, for I love to have Grandmother read the stories in his paper." Another little grandaughter, Daisy W. Davidson, said, "I want to give some too." She also sends fifteen cents, to be added to the Children's Fund for Tracts.

The first inquiry on meeting these little ones, usually, is, "Grandmother have you got a new paper? Has Mr. Storrs put a story in it?" They seem almost intuitively to comprehend the truth. One of them, five years old, a few days since, when playing with a neighboring child, whose father is dead, as her father came to get a good-bye kiss, said to the fatherless child, "Don't you wish you had a father to kiss you?" The reply was "No, for my father is in heaven." Said the other, in response, "O, he is not, he is in the ground: Jesus has not come yet; and the time to raise the dead has not come." They disputed till the latter child came to his mother with it. Little Bessie has a sister buried. Many tell her "Little sister is in heaven." She always answers, "No, she is in Oakland Cemetery: when Jesus comes He will raise her up." Thus I often think that these things are hid from the wise in their own conceit and revealed unto babes; even so, Father," said Jesus, "for so it seemed good in thy sight."

Talking Things.

BY S. M.

"Now," said Caro, "it is too dark to play in the yard, let us go in grandma's room, and make 'Things Talk.' Charlie you must be 'Mr. Window.' Fannie you must be 'Miss Lamp,' and you Harry, must be 'Mr. Clock,' and I will be 'Miss Fire' and we must all tell of what use we are."

So the children scampered to grandma's room saying, "Grandma we want you to hear the "Things Talk." 'Come in children" said the dear old lady.

"Mr. Window" began by saying: "I think it would be as dark as Egypt in hear if it was not for me to let the bright sun in."

"Oh," said "Miss Lamp," "when night comes, you are not of much use and I wonder how the children would learn their lessons, and papa read the newspapers, and mamma sew, if it was not for me."

"Well," said "Mr. Clock," "when Mr. Window is closed by the shutters, and Miss Lamp put out for the night, I am of as much use as ever, and keep on ticking, ticking all night long, and strike just as loud at night as in the day time, besides were it not for me half the people would not know when to get up in the morning."

"That may be," said Miss Fire, in a kind of sparkling tone, "but it would not be much matter what become of any of you, if it were not for me; for you and every body and every thing would be frozen up."

The children and grandma laughed heartily to think what a plight the world would be in, if it was not for Miss Fire who tossed her head good naturedly at the idea of her own importance. However, the "Talking Things" did not feel inclined to give up the contest; till they had spoken of several ways in which each excelled.

When the servant came in to close the shutters, and light the lamp, grandma said, "I have quite enjoyed my dear children to hear your 'Talking Things.' Now you must all tell me of what use you are."

"Why," said Harry, "I find your spectacles, grandma."

"And I" said Fanny, "open the door for papa when I see him coming and bring his slippers to him, and ever so many other things."

"And I," said Charlie," run almost all mamma's errands, for she says I go so quick, and don't make mistakes."

Caro was the only one silent, and grandma said, "Is my Caro of no use?" "Oh yes," shouted all the rest, "we could not do anything without her. As she said of Miss Fire, we should be all frozen up without her, and so would papa, and mamma, and poor old Mrs. Clark says when Caro grows up, she must not be married, because she wants her to take care of her."

Caro was quite overpowered, hearing the praises of herself, and nestled shyly close up to grandma, who put her arms round her, saying, "Well, it is better to have others praise us, but we ought to know ourselves if we are trying to be useful. If children are useful in little matters, we may hope that if their lives are spared, they will 'go about doing good.' This you know was said of our Saviour, who has also told us that the cup of cold water given to please him, is remembered by him, and we may be sure the kind look, and word, and deed are remembered, too. But I want to tell you a little about my Bible 'Talking Things.' It was only this morning Lucy said in her lisping way, 'Dam'ma why read the Bible tho' muth?'

"I hope Lucy and you all will soon understand that the Bible has its 'Windows,' 'Lamps,' 'Clocks' and 'Fires.' The 'Bible Windows' are often illuminated with beautiful colors to the Christian, and lighten his dark hours with bright views of heaven, and the Holy Spirit can so open the windows for the soul, that a dying man once said of heaven, 'its breezes fan me, its odors are wafted to me.' Then the 'Bible Lamp' is such a wonderful Lamp for brightness, that in my long journey in this world, often in the midst of perplexities, when I hardly knew the way before me, it has always showed me 'one step more.' And as for my 'Bible clock' it is a good time-piece, and tells me with every solemn providence that our days are numbered —striking loudly—'passing away.' And for the 'Fire' oh, if there were no celestial fire what would dear grandma do now, certainly so near the end of her journey—and so soon to say 'good bye, my darlings.' But there is a Fire from heaven, a Saviour's love, of which no living tongue can tell of all the warmth and fullness there."

Tears were in the eyes of the children, as Grandma Bright tried to enfold them all in her arms.

In a few moments she continued, with a loving, cheerful smile, "Our conversation has brought to my mind a book on which the face of a clock was on the first page. Opposite the hour of One was written in small letters, 'Watch;' opposite Two, 'Fear God;' Three, 'Honor all men;" last of all, at the hour of Twelve, the words, 'Here have we no continuing city, but we seek one to come.' Often as the clock strikes the hour, the words come to my mind, and I think it would interest you all as much as your 'Talking Things' to see how many different passages in the Bible you can find containing the number of words of the different hours. And it is well to let the hours speak to us in words from heaven in every way we can.

May you listen, my beloved ones, to the heavenly 'speaking things'—so that when age has frosted your years, your hearts may be so warmed with heavenly love as to be able to say:

I'm waiting now to see the Lord,
Who's been to me so kind,
I want to thank him face to face
For this my quiet mind."

Washington, D. C.—The Advance.

Atonement for Mortals Only.

Br. Storrs: Indulge me in a few thoughts on the atonement.

The virtue of the death of our Lord is variously estimated. Most of those calling themselves Christians allow that his death was atoning—making satisfaction to some principle or party. "One dying for many," called a "vicarious scarifice."

Then there are others of the Christian name who admit of no such arrangemeut; no atonement in the case. Such a thing, in their minds, is impossible, being contrary to law or justice that the "innocent should suffer for the guilty." Christ died, it is true, but not by any such necessity as atonement supposes. His death, say they, was incidental, not according to any plan, the virtue of which was dying for a principle. His was a martyr's death.

This class, it will be remembered, believe that the righteousness that the gospel requires is good works—and not its faith. This will answer, because they fancy they have innate immortality, and can get their reward at death. So Jesus can only serve as a pattern —an "ensample to the flock." Hence they have no occasion for either the death or resurrection of Christ. He can serve them in no way. He need not die for them: they were never exposed to any such disaster. If dead, he need not live again for their sakes, for they are as immortal as possible. So this class can dispense with Christ's services altogether and forever. They have the record of his virtues in the evangelists, which will suffice for them.

That other body, which assumes to be orthodox, while they claim the same independent immortality assumed by the Unitarians, Swedenborgians, Spiritists, and the rest, fail to have as much consistency; because, while they claim to possess natural immortality, they unnaturally advocate the doctrine of atonement. In their creeds and institutes, they make it essential, indispensable. Making everything of the death of Christ in all their sermons, books and poetry, the burden of which is, "Blood, suffering and the cross," as if they had no use for our risen Lord. Nor have they. By their own showing, they are as independent of Him as their neighbors before referred to. Hence it is not for us to admit that the death of Christ—his passion, his shed blood, or any of his works, can at all serve them with their "faith no faith." Their idea that they are as immortal as infinity could make them, puts Christ to a total disuse. He came to look up the "lost," to heal the sick, and give life to the dead; as it is written, "If one died for all, then were all dead." This was Paul's "constrained judgment." 2 Cor. v., 14. With this view, "All were dead," there is a preciousness in the death of Christ. But if none were dead, how then?

For them to talk of atonement, of a vicarious sacrifice, and such like things, is absurd.

What of atonement? It was made by "blood." Because "the blood was the life:" and life had been forfeited; and the only price of redemption was blood. Peter says, "With the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." Many other Scriptures declare the same thing, down to the "Lamb in the midst of the throne, as it had been slain." Rev. v., 6. The same was signified by the lamb offered by Abel. Our Lord accepts this doctrine when he says, "This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for you," etc. An illustration of atonement which is only appropriate to such as are born mortal and are willing to own it.

It will be remembered that God said to Adam, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." The same day "between an evening and morning." Notice: "The evening and morning were the first day." Gen. i., 5. This form is repeated five other times, which defines the period called "day." No better exegetical meaning can be given to it. Adam did not die that day; and why? God is love, and he can do better than he threatens without harm to anybody. He did it in this case. He contrived a better way: man was redeemed. But there was a moment when his life hung trembling in the balances; when the Creator dropped into the scale of mercy a grand, great purpose and promise: "It shall bruise thy head." There was virtue and power in this declaration; so much so that every one who believed and embraced it at any time was taken into divine favor.

Abraham was a representative man. God called him from his kindred for his and our sakes, that he might educate him to his mind. He became well informed in the faith. Mark the process: "Walk through the land, in the length of it, and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee;" and more of this kind. But he must be informed that this land was not worth the receiving, if only to be possessed on the usual tenure for a common lifetime; and that to be made up of strife and war, as the rule was, and is, and only forty-five years remaining to him.

Hence the next lesson. "Know of a surety that thy seed shall serve a strange nation, that should afflict them four hundred years. Thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace." This was signified after this manner: "And when the sun was going down a deep sleep fell upon him; and lo, a horror of great darkness fell upon him." Gen. xv., 12, 13. His death was hereby signified. But how is the promise to be fulfilled at this rate? Another lesson is necessary, embracing the atonement, the seed, and the resurrection. The command, at this time, is to offer up Isaac. Passing over preliminaries, Isaac is bound and laid on the wood. The arm is raised, but a voice arrests the blow. It is an angel. "Lay not thy hand upon the lad, neither do thou anything unto him; for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me." Gen. xxii.

We see Adam, a victim bound; but a day to live, if so long; with him his posterity. Had he fallen, we would not have been. But, thanks to the voice of mercy which cried, "Justice, stay," and lo, we live! As in the case of Isaac, so in this, a ransom is provided. Said the dutiful son, "Behold the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb?" "God will provide himself a lamb, my son." God did intend the death of Adam, but not of Isaac. Abraham believed in some interposition in the last event. He believed that God was able to raise his son from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure. Heb. xi. A lamb was provided in both instances. Abel offered a lamb to represent his faith in the promise. John the Baptist, when he saw Jesus coming to him exclaimed, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." "Abraham lifted up his eyes and looked, and beheld a ram caught in a thicket, by his horns; and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him for a burnt offering in the stead of his son."

That is atonement; available and profitable only to those who feel assured of their native mortality, and certain remediless death, but for the atoning Lamb. B. Matthias.

Sketches on the Book of Rev.

BY S. S. W.

THE SEVENTH VIAL.

"And the seventh angel poured out his vial into the air: and there came a great voice out of the temple of heaven, from the throne, saying, It is done." Chap. xvi., 17.

This vial was poured out into the air. As the air or atmosphere encircles the earth, so this plague would seem to extend farther than the former ones.

A voice from the throne in heaven is heard, saying, "It is done." These plagues are finished. The last vial is poured out, and the final results will be reached under it. We are not to understand that immediately on the pouring out of this vial, the whole is concluded; but that all shall be finished during the progress of this plague, which may continue for some years. God will now avenge his own elect, and will punish those who have unsurped his prerogatives. He will render to them tribulation and anguish, and they shall utterly perish.

"And there were voices, and thunders and lightnings; and there was a great earthquake, such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake, and so great." Ver. 18.

These voices, thunders and lightnings symbolize great commotions among the nations, strong expressions of dissatisfaction with their rulers, and bitter denunciation of those who have deceived them in times past.

The great earthquake is the symbol of a great civil revolution in which great commotion and perplexity among the people will be manifested. A writer before alluded to says, of the present time:

"We are fast approaching a crisis when the words of the Bible shall be fulfilled; 'He frustrateth the tokens of the wise, and maketh divines mad.' Problems the most perplexing in political science; diversities in moral judgments the deepest; new wants and cravings in society; positively new classes of character cast up by the surging and heated tide of things, are all appealing to our rulers for solution, direction or restraint, and appealing in vain. The reins of empire over the whole earth (and we include in this empire secular, empire intellectual, and empire moral and spiritual) were never held in such loose hands —a sure sign that a more energetic grasp may soon be expected to lay hold upon them."—Gilfallen.

This crisis will come, and rulers be overthrown, and a greater revolution than ever was known, take place.

"And the great city was divided into three parts, and the cities of the nations fell; and great Babylon came in remembrance before God, to give unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath." Ver. 19.

Cities are symbols of churches. The New Jerusalems is a symbol of the true glorified church of Christ. Babylon, here called "the great city," and "great Babylon," represents the Romish church or Hierarchy,' and its utter overthrow is here predicted. The particular description of this is given in the xviii. chapter.

It is said the great city was divided into three parts, by which it would appear that there will be a division in that church, the particular nature of which is not stated. There are at present many Roman Catholics who are opposed to the temporal power of the Pope. Not long since, a petition, signed by a large number of Catholic priests in Italy, was presented to the Pope, asking him to resign his temporal power. There may be, at the period here predicted, three factions in that church. One may be in favor of the Pope's temporal power; another may be opposed to it, and still another may be opposed to both his civil and ecclesiastical authority. This, however, is but conjecture. What the divisions may be we cannot at present determine.

"The cities of the nations fell." The national church or hierarchies, both in the Roman kingdom and other nations, will be overthrown. All corrupt churches will be blotted out, and terrible judgments will overtake the nations.

"And every island fled away, and the mountains were not found." Ver. 20.

Mountains are symbols of great governments, and islands of smaller ones. The islands fleeing away, and the mountains not being found, show that the kingdoms and other governments will be overthrown. In the book of the Prophet Daniel, chap. ii., we read that "the God of heaven will set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed, and this kingdom will not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms [there referred to], and it shall stand forever." There will be a complete breaking down, a dissolution, a destruction of the kingdoms of the earth, that the kingdom of Christ may be set up, or established in their stead.

"And there fell upon men a great hail out of heaven, every stone about the weight of a talent, and men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail; for the plague thereof was exceeding great." Ver. 21.

Mr. Lord regards this hail storm as a "symbol of sudden and relentless strokes, by which in a violent political revolution, men are smitten down from dignity, independence and happiness, to helplessness vassalage and ruin; as such a storm strips the leaves and fruits from the trees, and dashes down the crops of grass and grain. Such a devastating tempest is to beat on the men who belong to the train of Antichrist."

Who can tell or conceive of such a tempest of God's wrath as shall then strike down those who have usurped his authority, despised and persecuted his people, and set themselves up as the great ones of the earth?

But these terrible inflictions of divine providence will have no reformatory effect. Those who suffer under them, so far from repenting of their sins, will be filled with madness and blasphemy: "And men blasphemed God because of the plague of the hail." This is a sad picture of human depravity. The judgments of Jehovah will not be heeded by these wicked rulers and people. The nations who have despised the will and authority of God, will only be more hardened, as Pharaoh was, under the plagues of Egypt. Those nations, therefore, shall utterly perish. God will sweep them from the face of the earth, and the kingdom of Christ shall take their place. —Advent Herald.

To Doubting Christians.

If Jesus were on earth, would you not go to him and ask him to save you? Would you not believe him if he said to you, "Thy sins are forgiven thee; thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." Thus he speaks to you in the Bible. Hear his voice, believe what he says, command away every doubt by the authoritative voice of the mighty Saviour.

Two gentlemen were lately conversing together upon this momentous subject. One said to the other, after pointing out to him the mighty works of Christ on the cross,—

"Do you need anything more?"

The other replied:

"Yes, I think I do; I think I must have some work of my own."

His friend replied:

"Jesus at the right hand of God is my title, and my only title to salvation. Here are pen, ink and paper; write me down a better."

The truth is, that Christ in glory is the proof of the complete and all-sufficient value of his death. If a friend becomes surety for me, and is thrown into prison on account of my debt, and I afterwards meet that friend walking at liberty, I am sure he must have made full satisfaction for my debt, otherwise, he would not be out of prison. So the Lord, at the right hand of power on high, is a proof that he has answered to the full every demand of God against me as a sinner. His death is everything or nothing. It is either the entire blotting out and cancelling of every charge that can be made against me, or it avails me nothing.

John Bunyan was walking one day in a field, in great trouble of soul at the discovery of his own vileness, and not knowing how to be justified with God, when he heard, as he imagined, a voice saying to him, "Your righteousness is in heaven." He went into his house and took his Bible, thinking to find there the very words that had sounded in his heart. He did not discover the identical expression; but many a passage of Scripture proclaimed the same truth, and showed him that Jesus, at the right hand of God, is complete righteousness to every one that believeth.—Selected.

The Oldest relic of Humanity.

The oldest relic of humanity extant is the skeleton of one of the earlier Pharaohs, encased in its original burial robes, and wonderfully perfect, considering its age, which was deposited about eighteen or twenty months ago in the British Museum, and is justly considered the most valuable of its archæological treasures. The lid of the coffin which contained the royal mummy was inscribed with the name of its occupant, Pharaoh Mykerinus, who succeeded the heir of the builder of the Great Pyramid, about ten centuries before Christ. The monarch, whose crumbling bones and leathery integuments are now exciting the wonder-gazers in London, reigned in Egypt before Solomon was born, and only about eleven centuries or so after Mizraim, the grandson of father Noah, and the first of the Pharaohs had been gathered to his fathers! The tidemark of the deluge would scarcely have been obliterated, or the gopher-wood knee-timbers of the ark have rotted on Mount Ararat, when this man of the early world lived, moved and had his being! His flesh and blood were cotemporary with the progenitors of the great patriarch! His bones and shrivelled skin are contemporary with the nineteenth century, and the date of the crucifixion is only about midway between his era and ours.

The Meaning of Sorrow.

Let us look truth in the face. You cannot hide it from yourself. "Man is born to sorrow as the sparks fly upward." Sorrow is not an accident, occurring now and then; it is the very woof which is woven into the warp of life. God has created the nerves to agonize, and the heart to bleed; and before a man dies, almost every nerve has thrilled with pain, and every affection has been wounded. The account of life which represents it as probation is inadequate; so is that which regards it chiefly as a system of rewards and punishments. The truest account of this mysterious existence seems to be, that it is intended for the development of the soul's life, for which sorrow is indispensable. Every son of man who would attain the true end of his being must be baptized with fire. It is the law of our humanity, as of that of Christ, that we may be perfected through suffering; and he who has not discerned the divine sadness of sorrow, and the profound meaning which is concealed in pain, has yet to learn what life is. The Cross, manifested as the necessity of the highest life, alone interprets it.—Robertson.

BOOKS AND PAMPHLETS

FOR SALE AT THIS OFFICE.

On all books and pamphlets sent by mail, the postage has to be pre-paid.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

NO LIFE OUT OF CHRIST."

FROM ELD. L. F. MOORE.

QUITE frequently we are asked, "Why! how can you believe such a doctrine as the one which teaches, No Life out of Christ?" My answer is simply this, viz: Its opponents have driven us to the full and undoubted belief of it.

In their extreme efforts to sustain their position, they very unconsciously advance ideas which are very fatal to it, proving their premises unsound. For instance. Speaking of the natural or Adamic death of mankind, (called the first death), it is affirmed, (and with truth too), that all suffer this (except the changed) irrespective of character. Now, I had once fallen into the sad mistake that the doctrine in question taught that, if a man did not sin he would not die, and believing thus had conversation with several persons, on the subject. Once we were informed that all men must die, sin or no sin, and the following text was quoted to prove it: "Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression." Rom. v., 14. Now, then, because of the disobedience of one man death was brought upon all men; or in other words, all men receive the same nature which the first Adam received in consequence of sin or disobedience: therefore, as a natural consequence, all men died from Adam to Moses who, as we were informed, lived without any revealed law to control their destiny. Of course this placed us in a position where we reject the idea which taught (as we suppose) that, if men did not sin they would not die: but set us to thinking something like this. Here we have many generations of men from Adam to Moses all dead without law. What shall we do with them? There was no law to control their destiny! die they must, and die they did. Says one, "Raise them from the dead, or make them alive and judge them." But, there is a very great difficulty in the way of such a procedure as that, and it is this. What law shall they be judged by? We have very respectfully been informed that from Adam to Moses there was no law, and I am very sure it would be rather a difficult matter to judge men without law; and I do not think that there would be much justice in trying men in such a case by any ex post facto law, inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States forbids any such course even in its civil affairs; and I am sure if such a course looks like barefaced injustice to men it must look more so in the eyes of our great, good and just God. Therefore, we conclude, that if all that lived without law are raised to life they must necessarily and in the very nature of the case continue to live forever. For if a man should be arrested in the act of killing another, and should be arraigned before a court and jury to be tried, and if the court upon searching their statute book should fail to discover a law to try murderers by, they would either be obliged to make a law for the occasion or acquit the man. So it seems to us. Furthermore, the apostle says, "For as many as have sinned without law shall also perish without law." Rom. ii., 12. Here then we are driven to the conclusion that they will never live again.

Once more. I have many times asked and have been asked the question, Did Christ suffer the penalty of God's broken law for sin? and have invariably received and given the answer, Yes! Once when in Middletown, Conn., I attended service in an Episcopal Church. The preacher in the course of his remarks said, "Christ suffered the penalty of God's broken law for sin." I immediately noted it down in my memorandum book and handed it to an elderly man in the pew with me, who evidently was a member of the church, to read, asking him if I had heard correctly. He nodded assent, and handed it back. I wrote again, that Theologians say that the penalty of God's broken law for sin is, "Eternal torments in hell fire;" and handed it to him, asking if it was true. Although it was written as plainly as the first, yet he rather hesitated in reading and answering; but finally said, "Salvation is conditional" (I suppose he thought I was a Universalist). O! said I, I know that, but is that true which I have written? Well, said he, "You know hell fire is not preached much now, it's worn out."

But again. I take up the "World's Crisis" of June 16th, and in the editorial account of a discussion with "Bro. Townsend," I read that, "If mortal death" (be the punishment for sin) then Jesus never suffered the penalty that was upon man, for our Saviour was "without sin." "The penalty on Adam could not have been eternal torment, for if it was, then Jesus would never get through suffering the penalty, and there would be no time for a "second death." This is public property; so we use it as the ground of the editor's belief, and from it gather that the editor does fully believe that "Christ" did "suffer the penalty, of God's broken law for sin;" also, that the penalty is not "Moral death," neither eternal torment, but the "second death," and finally, that Christ, instead of suffering eternal torment, did suffer the "second death." All this we gather from his report of the discussion with "Bro. Townsend."

If I remember correctly, and am rightly informed, it is generally conceded among Adventists that the "second death knows no waking;" that it is "eternal death," and no redemption from it, but he who suffers it must FOREVER remain in a state of unconsciousness; and this takes place after the judgment. Besides all this, we know from reading the "World's Crisis" that the above is its belief.

Now, we have repeatedly read from the editor's pen that "Christ was risen from the dead;" so of course it is both morally and absolutely impossible to believe that Christ did suffer the, "second death," as the editor claims; for if the "second death" is "eternal death," or an eternal state of unconsciousness (which it is) in the grave, then if Christ did "suffer the penalty of God's broken law for sin," he must of necessity be in that state now. But hark, hear the hills re-echo with the glad and glorious, tidings, "Now is Christ risen and become the first fruits of them that slept." Therefore we must reject a doctrine which leaves Christ in "hell," and accept Paul's doctrine.

Again. Does the second death consist in dying twice? we might ask: i. e., die a natural, death, then live by a resurrection and die again? I have read such a statement in the writings of our opponents, and it has been the continual cry of Adventists that "Christ DID suffer the penalty of the law for sin," (and we have always believed it), and that, that penalty is the "second death," or a physical death after the resurrection, or dying twice. If this be true, did Christ ever go through such a performance? If so, When? and Where? The Apostle says, "The wages of sin is DEATH." Rom. vi., 23. "For in that he (Christ) died, he died unto sin ONCE." Rom. vi., 10. Again. "And as it is appointed unto man ONCE to die, and after that the judgment." I cannot now conceive how once can be made to mean twice; but perhaps some one is ready to say, that "After that the judgment," means, to be raised from the dead and killed again! But not long ago, in a series of articles published in the "World's Crisis" the writer of them proved, very conclusively, that "Judgment" did not mean punishment, but simply separation; also quoting authority to prove that the word "nations," when addressed to nations in scripture, did not mean dead nations; also, using the same argument used by the editor of the "Prophetic Times" to prove that the "dead" are not made alive in order to be judged, but are judged as dead men, quoting, 2 Tim. iv., 1, as proof: "I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and THE DEAD at his appearing and kingdom," all of which we do most heartily indorse and concur with.

Now, one word with reference to the manner in which our opponents say the resurrection is to be. Says one fearless advocate, "If they go down drunken bloated sots, they come up drunken bloated sots. If they go down with one leg, they come up with one leg. If they go down with one arm they come up with one arm."

Well, I suppose this mortal resurrection argument is just as good all through; so, of course, if they go down without any heads they must come up without any heads; and what an awfully grand spectacle it must be to see men without heads, standing up to be judged. But stop, says another fearless and able advocate of Adventism, "The brain is the seat and organ of thought and without it men must be unconscious." So here we have a lot of headless, unconscious men to judgment. But perhaps there may be some process of hitching or putting the head on, which we do not understand now. But here a difficulty arises in the fact that there is never a change promised or threatened to wicked men after their supposed resurrection, but to be burned up to ashes, according to our opponents' statements. So we must reject such a doctrine and accept Paul when he says, "the dead are raised incorruptible."

Finally. In the "World's Crisis," of June 16, in an article on the first page, headed, "The coming end," 1 Cor. xv., 22, 23, which reads thus, "As in Adam all die (go into the grave) even so in Christ shall all be made alive, (that is, come out again), but every man in his own order; Christ the first fruit, afterwards they that are Christs as his coming." I suppose the above is used and paraphrased to prove the universal salvation or resurrection of men from the grave; so we will treat it in that manner. First then: it is written, "As in Adam all die, (go into the grave)." Many times have we asked the question, How do men die in Adam? and we have so far invariably and without exception received the following answer, viz: "By having Adam's nature." Very good and very true. What comes next. "EVEN SO," i. e., in the same manner precisely—"even so in Christ shall all be made alive." That is, by possessing Christ's nature. And we are driven to the same inevitable conclusion (if the above be true) with the Universalist into the universal and unconditional salvation of all men to a divine life in eternity; for according to the paraphrase of the "Crisis" writer, the scriptures most emphatically declare that "As in Adam all die" (go into the grave, by possessing his nature), "Even so" (in precisely the same manner) "in Christ will all be made alive," (i. e., come out again, by possessing his nature). Now Christ's nature is divine and immortal. Query: "Will wicked men have Christ's nature? We trow not. Our humble opinion of the text is this: "As all that are in Adam die (and of course all men, without any exception, are in Adam), even so all that are in Christ shall be made alive;" in both cases possessing the nature of their representative Adam; for it is positively true that the first Adam's posterity die; therefore it is equally positively true that the second Adam's posterity must live again.

This view removes all difficulties in the whole chapter. For it is declared that "The dead (definite article) are raised incorruptible" (aphthartos, immortal); which of course renders the resurrection of wicked men impossible according to 1 Cor. xv.; but let us see a little further about the matter. Emphatic Diaglott, 2 Tim. i., 10, reads "Who has indeed rendered death powerless, and has illustrated life and incorruptibility) aphtharsain, immortality) by the glad tidings." And when He stepped out of Joseph's "new tomb," he revealed and illustrated that great question proponnded fifteen hundred years before him, viz., "If a man die shall he live again?" Yes, our glorious and blessed Redeemer brought to light this great truth and fact contained in the Scripture, but hidden from man for ages, and finally revealed in the Glad tidings to his holy apostles. But our Lord never did illustrate corruptibility by the Glad tidings, or any other tidings; or at least, we fail to find it except as concocted in the brains of our opponents. But it says, "Every man in his own order. Christ the first fruits, afterwards those that are Christ's at his coming." Well, I find two classes spoken of, here; the first, "Christ the first fruits;" (plural); which, if the rendering is correct, had its fulfilment at, and after his resurrection when "many bodies of the saints arose." The second "They that are Christ's at his coming;" and I am sure that wicked men are none of Christ's; for, "If you have not the spirit of Christ ye are none of his." Therefore, I fail to see how either the "first fruits" or "they that are his at his coming," can possibly affect wicked men, one way or the other. The Emp. Diaglott renders aparce, "A first fruit" (singular). If this be true, all is correct, for Christ was the first fruit from the dead, and the rest of the harvest must be like him. So it seems to us. In hope of Life.

THE NON-RESURRECTION QUESTION.

IN remarking upon the 11th paragraph: To his main point (question), that the two classes will, at the same time, receive reward and punishment, he answers, No! Never! There is no such position taken in the word of God. This is the capital blunder of the writer on the eternal torment theory, and is now the point of the opposers of the doctrine of "no life out of Christ." Indeed, the abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom appointed the saints at one and the same time; but there is no need of the enemies of God being about there then. "When the Son of man shall appear in his glory," etc. Matt. xvi., 27.

And before him shall be gathered all living nations, which is all this can possibly mean—and shall reward every man (who is there) according to his deeds. This is not a literal judgment throne. Where would he put all nations, and how would he keep them? Would he have them before God, and would he give them reward according to what they have done? He will follow his own knowledge and wisdom. Christ tells us how men will be judged "at the last day." Does he need such a literal throne and gathering? Not at all. John xii., 47, 48. "If any man hear my words and believeth not, judge him not; for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my words hath one that judgeth him. The word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him in the last day." Campbell's Translation. "Hath what condemneth him," viz., the word or doctrine which Christ declared." Doddridge "That (very word) shall judge him."

We do not know that each human being will know the results of his probation, nor do we know the object of it. These supposed facts are assumed by our brother, and it remains to be proved that the scenes depicted by Daniel, Christ, Paul and John, refer to the individual judgment of men. Whether we are to suppose that the gathering of all before Christ includes only the living when he comes, we have the language of Christ that all nations are involved; but we have no proof that all nations should signify the dead, nor yet that here is a literal throne before which they stand.

"Will not all the dead be there?" No. "When he says, 'come ye blessed,'" etc. . "Will one be missing then?" Yes. "Shall not all the votaries of sin be there with all liars, etc., and hear and know their doom?" Not at all. "Will death and hell keep back?" No; but they will be punished who are worthy of it, for judgment in Revelation xx. is judicial and executive. No appearing before the throne there, for even the heavens and the earth fled away from it. The throne of judgment is a figure of decision and separation. The dead hear his voice, and the dead stand before God. If they stand before him, as dead, they will be counted so placed. How came the good in the book of life, if they had not been judged? It is only an idea of the past time, without the least authority from the word of God, that all the world of mankind will, at once, stand personally alive before God.

The author of the tract says it is objected as unreasonable to suppose that the wicked die a second time, as if they died twice for their sins.

Quite unreasonable, indeed; and no argument can ever make it consistent with the character of God. To say that the first death is upon all, and yet the most wicked have been punished for their sins by dying prematurely, will not remove the "fallacy." God does, indeed, bring every work into judgment; but when men have been judged and punished, 'tis not our God (who doeth right, as the judge) that will make alive merely to kill. No man will die twice for sin. Men, in large classes, have died as the direct penalty of sin. The wrath of God has come upon them, and they have been destroyed. The punishment of "Sodom and Gomorrah are set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." I think I should as soon believe that they are conscious as that they will come out of their condition.

If a man has suffered the penalty of his crime, it will excuse him from suffering again for that offence. No matter what illustration Br. C. may use. For the penalty is in the law that should have governed him. Our author declares in his 14th paragraph that "God will make, before all his intelligent universe, a settlement of all human accounts" (a strong figure, by the way), and that "if we cannot see what good it will do, our short-sighted fault-finding must forever cease with the fact that he will do it."

We remember, a little back, that the tract says that if the wicked dead rise not, then "he cannot see how the righteous are not punished in this life as well as the sinners." The fact that God says the righteous only will live after death, with the assurance that he will punish the wicked, should cause this surmising to cease, and lead one to see it. I see how God could have spoken much plainer if he had meant the thing after the manner of this essay; but for the truth, in harmony with itself it is plain enough now. Whether plainer, might have been or not.

I am not apprized of the full capacity of our dear brother to judge of the "sophistry or ingenuity" of sufficient force to bear testimony, or to use language that will be more powerful to convey import. But, I stand on the word, John v., 28, 29, as well as the rest. Great passage, to be sure. There is no literal grave in this passage. The word is not "hades." It does not mean the literal graves; and what is more, the term is not grave (in the singular) in our translation. Again: the word there rendered "resurrection" does not necessarily mean life from the dead, or coming out of the grave. It may signify "standing up" or "standing before:" and the dead are said "to stand before God," as dead. So said J. Litch, on this passage, more than 20 years ago.

The resurrection passage, in this connection, is the 25th verse. This, at all events, is a judgment passage, and signifies the condemnation of the unbeliever who does evil and is damned "already," or "stands forth" to "damnation," or judgment (punishment), while those that do good ("bring forth" good fruit), stand forth to life. Will not the sinner live if raised, and live just as fully as the righteous, if he is mortal? Christ says, "I am the resurrection and the life;" and "he that believeth (doeth good) hath everlasting life, and shall not come to damnation."

If this great text with the opposers, said "their graves," they might have some advantage. Not now. If we found in it "the grave" (hades) they might have some. Not a whit now. And then, how would the voice of Christ reach the dead who have not been put in "the graves," or "their graves"—for it is not hades—to signify all the dead?

The passage is figurative, in any view. If it refers to the literal resurrection, it is a figure.

What if the bones in Ezekiel's vision did come together and form at the voice? The people of God are brought to view and the Spirit of God came upon them. If men in the grave hear his voice, only those who are his will live by it. "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die" (not die twice), and there is no life. "If ye live after the Spirit ye shall live" "Though you were dead." Thus saith the Lord.

Paul said, indeed, that he believed all things written in the law and in the prophets. Let Br. Collins show from the prophets and the law of Moses that the wicked dead will be raised, then he may say, with a better grace, that the apostle Paul believed it. "And had hope toward God, which they allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust." Now did the apostle endorse the notions of the Pharisees, as to the resurrection? It would be strange if they had correct ones, and that on this most important doctrine of the gospel he should have been instructed by them instead of the gospel of Christ, for they did not believe the gospel of Christ. "The Saducees deny that there is any resurrection, either angel or spirit; but the Pharisees acknowledged both." What idea they had of the literal resurrection of the body, does not appear; but one would suppose very confused convictions prevailed. But if they allowed his faith, by believing in the resurrection of the just and the unjust (not all mankind, by any means), he might limit his faith to a belief that "those who sleep in Jesus will God bring with him" —(Christ.)

Again. He states that the Pharisees believed that Dan. xii., 2, teaches the resurrection of the just and unjust, and "Paul squarely subscribes" to that.

How he ascertained that the Pharisees did thus believe, he has not told us. Acts xxiv., 13–25. Note, in the Cottage Bible: Josephus teaches that the Pharisees believed only in the resurrection of the body." They did not believe in Jesus, and therefore did not believe in the resurrection, as it is in Jesus, or taught by Jesus. Here was a new revelation of life and immortality which they called "heresy." Paul had been a Pharisee, and so he says, "I am a Pharisee; of the hope and resurrection of the dead I am called in question."

Let Paul settle this with the author. He had as much right as a Christian apostle to quote the whole of their faith [which I cannot for a moment suppose he did], and say they allowed his faith when he only believed a part of what he stated for them, as he had to say he was a Pharisee, and call them brethren, when he was a minister of the gospel of Christ, and Christ said, "Beware of the leaven (doctrine) of the Pharisees."

Paul was using a little policy, as some suppose. Now the fact is, that neither Paul nor the Pharisees had any such idea of the passage, Dan. xii., 2. For there is no "some" in the Hebrew text, as the best Hebraists assure us, including Bush, Whiting, and other scholars of note. The original uses "these" and "those."

Then we have, as Bush reads, "these," the awakened, "those," the unawakened, all belonging to Daniel's people, as every one may see who will read. "Thy people shall be delivered" (verse 1), "and many of them [thy people], that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake." It is probable that the Pharisees had notions about this matter from the promise made to Abraham, for the apostle says that "unto which promise our whole twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come." Now, if the Pharisees believed in the resurrection of the Jewish nation, as they may have done, they would have believed in the resurrection of the unjust, and not have believed in the resurrection of all the wicked. The Pharisees, it is rather plain from the account in the gospel, believed in the transmigration of souls; but should we conclude that Paul believed in that too? He says that they had a zeal not according to knowledge. If Paul, therefore, had believed as much as he in this place says they did, that would not have identified him with the idea that all men will have a resurrection.

It is plain that Paul believed in Jesus, and the resurrection by him. The Pharisees did not believe in Christ at all; hence they had no just notions of gospel resurrection.

In treating upon 1 Corth. xv., 22, the author of the tract insists that Paul means to teach a general resurrection. But we feel quite content that the Scripture should determine; for we have Adam as one man, by being in whom, we die. And Christ as another man, by being in whom, we live. Amen. We are not in Christ by nature. Let us get into him and we will be sure of a resurrection.

Here mark: You have to take the ground that the death is one, and the life is one. Christ stands against Adam, and those who belong to him stand against those who belong to Adam.

Ver. 12. "How say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?" Our brothers take occasion to insist on the peculiarity of the phrase here. He says not from the dead, nor from among the dead, nor a part of the dead; but of the dead.

In John v., 25, we find that the dead shall hear his voice, and they that hear shall live (all live, I suppose, Br. C., and all live alike); then the apostle tells us that the dead shall be raised incorruptible; hence, so far as salvation from corruption is concerned, all the dead are saved. He tells us that it means the dead without "limit or distinction;" then they are saved without limit or distinction. I think with this conclusion Br. C. would appear very well before "a Universalist Council," saying that they allowed his faith; for his position is proving theirs. But the Apostle Paul does tell us that he was "striving, if by any means, he might attain unto the coming out from among the dead:" Ex-Anastasis. It is doubtful if all the dead "without limit or distinction" should receive the "Ex-Anastasis."

The apostle would confirm the faith that the dead in Christ shall be raised by reference to the resurrection of Christ, which he had previously shown, "according to the Scriptures." Yet our brother says, "he predicates the resurrection of Christ on the broad ground of a general resurrection." Rather too bold a violation of the rules of argument to be called logic; and, yet hardly sufficiently ingenious to be called sophistry. I pray to know on what does he predicate the general resurrection? Yes, indeed, if the resurrection of Christ did not secure a life for the future, here all hope must end; for there is no other ground of hope.

His Minnesota illustration must be very unfortunate for the argument, unless the fact that they have a summer in Minnesota proves that they all raise corn.

"But now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept." "If the first fruit be holy, the lump is also holy." The simple truth is, that "he is the first born of many brethren."

Does he bring back the same body?

"It is sown a natural body," "raised a spiritual body;" "Sown in dishonor, raised in glory." Illustration: "Thou sowest not the body that shall be." "For as in Adam [that is, by or through] all die [that is, go down to the grave] even so in Christ, [that is by or through] shall all be made alive"—come up again. And what will become of those who do not die (or go into the grave)? The elder Universalists proved their doctrines in the same way.

All who are raised within the sphere that the apostle here presents, will be "raised in glory:" and the reason is, "he that eateth me, shall live by me." Br. C.'s essay says, the sinner will live by him, too. Then we have victory over death, (the very thing in dispute), through our Lord Jesus Christ. Our brother says, "by and through." The wicked can have no victory over death; for we are told in this tract, that "with their dying breath, death is destroyed, because there are no more to die." That would indeed be a singular victory over an enemy, that it should die out by a natural death. "The last enemy (death) shall be destroyed." The enemy of Christ and his chosen, it will be brought to an end by the establishment of a state in which there will be no death. But the appostle "passes in silence" over this future, at this point in his argument; perhaps, therefore, the tract might judge it proper to conclude that the last enemy died "because there was no more to die;" and so leaves Christ producing death instead of destroying it. Who then will have the victory?

In replying to this last position, we observe—1st. Paul does indeed speak to brethren who "have borne the image of the earthly" "one," he says, "shall bear the image of the heavenly." That heavenly man is the Lord Jesus Christ in the resurrection. He is perfect then; will the sinner have or bear that image? He addresses his brethren, in 1 Corth. xv., and speaks of the resurrection of Christ and his brethren, only. "Every man in his own order."

When the apostle is speaking of positive blessing upon a class, and the very essential condition to salvation (for he says that the resurrection is essential to the faith and life of those asleep in Christ), it is positive proof that those who are not mentioned will have no part in it.

2d. The sinners are shown to be left in the mortal condition, when men are changed, and they die by judgment, just as many others have done. The argument here offered makes it necessary that they should all be raised to life to die again; else how can God be just? Now can sinners suffer the second death?

Paul does teach particularly the destruction of the wicked, and speaks of the wicked alone when the Lord comes; but he does not teach that the wicked dead will rise, or that all the wicked suffer God's judgment at the same time.

The Wrong Sermon.

A few years ago, a minister of Christ, then young, had occasion for a single half day to supply a pulpit to which he was an entire stranger. It was only two miles from the place of his temporary sojourn, and arrangements were made for his conveyance within the last half hour preceding the service. In his ignorance of the particular religious condition of the people he was to address, he selected, and, by way of reparation for the services, carefully read over a sermon which he thought would do no harm, if it did no good, in any circumstances that might exist.

Greatly to the preacher's discomfort, the person who was to carry him to the church did not call for him till within a few moments of the hour for service. In the excitement and agitation of this unexpected delay, he then hastily seized, as he supposed, the selected sermon, and hurried away. It was in a state of body and mind sadly contrasting with that which he had hoped to possess, that he entered the sanctuary, and ascended the pulpit, to whose empty seat the waiting congregation had been for some time looking in wonder. Scarcely had he reached this conspicuous position, "the observed of all observers," before the prompt old sexton was by his side, with the familiar, and sometimes trying, demand for "your hymns, sir." For this trial, however, the preacher had provided in part, as he had carefully noted the hymns on the margin of his chosen sermon. Very confidently, therefore, he took from his pocket the manuscript, that he might transcribe the numbers, when lo! he was appalled to discover that in his haste he had brought the wrong sermon—a sermon designed specifically for anxious inquirers! There was, however, no time for debate, nor deliberation, nor even apology; and the only course left to pursue was to give the sexton the hymns that first occurred, and forthwith proceed with the service. Whether the people discovered the emotion which agitated the young preacher, the writer never knew; but before the sermon was half delivered it was evident there was emotion in the congregation. A marked stillness pervaded the whole house. Here and there was a hearer bathed in tears. What could it mean?

The preacher had another engagement elsewhere in the afternoon, and was obliged to leave the place immediately after the service, without stopping to ascertain what it meant. But, within two or three days, he received a most welcome message from two different sources, in which was expressed the greatest gratitude to God that a stranger had been sent to N. to preach that particular sermon on that Sabbath. One lady who for many months, had abandoned herself to almost utter despair, and to whom the kindest and best of Christian counsel had again and again been addressed in vain, while she listened saw, as if the light of heaven had suddenly broken upon it, the way to be justified and saved, and at once emerged from the darkness and wretchedness of her soul's protracted imprisonment, into the joys of a conscious and complete deliverance. Others were led to inquire after the way of life, and a precious season of refreshing followed.

The writers object in relating this incident from a sketch-book of ministerial memories, is to magnify the guiding, rescuing, and saving grace of God. If the young preacher had been left to carry out his own short-sighted plan, he would, perhaps, have gone into the pulpit full of self-confidence, and possibly a little proud of his little "great sermon." But he has no reason to believe that his effort would have reached a single heart, or been instrumental in loosing from the bounds of distress a single daughter of spiritual darkness. Man appointed; God disappointed, and saved thereby a soul from death. Let him be praised that the wrong sermon was, at least in this case, the right sermon.—Cor. Congregationalist.

Revelation xiv., 12.

I was surprised at the explanation of the word "henceforth" in this text, which I heard in a funeral sermon recently. The speaker said it meant from the moment of death in the experience of every righteous person. But when I found how deceitfully the word of God was handled regarding the intermediate state, I was no longer surprised that this passage was, with the rest, colored and tinted to match and weave into a favorite dogma.

Now, what is the true import of this passage? which reads, "Blessed are the dead, which die in the Lord from henceforth. Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

It is preceded by these words, verse 12: "Here is the patience of the saints: here are they that keep the commandments of God, and the faith of Jesus," in part a repetition of Rev. xiii., 10; the first part of which, "He that leadeth into captivity shall go into captivity; he that killeth with the sword must be killed with the sword," seems to indicate that the saints, during the fiery trials which awaited them, would need this new assurance vouchsafed them by the Spirit. Having this fresh token of love, no shadow of doubt need henceforth disturb them; though led into captivity, and killed by the sword, their sleep in Jesus shall be sweet, and their labors not in vain, for their works shall follow them, and at last they shall come forth from the dark halls of hades, the rejoicing children of the resurrection. As to their foes, they shall not only be led into captivity, and killed with the sword, but never have a release from the prison-house of death. E. B.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, JUNE 30, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

"Let the Righteous Smite Me."

Among the items in our excellent exchange, "The Advance," under the head of "Literary Small Talk," we find the following:

> An article by Pres. Haven on "Annihilationism," having strayed off anonymously, was criticised by the editor of the Herald of Life, who averred that the "author had no brain," "shows entire ignorance, etc." Fancy his feelings as the President courteously reviews him!

Our good Br. of "The Advance" has hardly treated us "courteously," if Pres. Haven has; whose "review," if it exists, we have not seen. "Courtesy" requires exact truthfulness. We do not say that "The Advance" intended to misrepresent us, and yet it has done it. The "anonymous" article, among other statements, said, "Annihilationism of the present day . . . denies that there can be thought without a brain." To this we responded:

"Perhaps the author of this statement has demonstrated there 'can be thought without a brain,' for he really seems to have none. He may next demonstrate that there 'can be thought without a' thinker, or without existence. Let it be remembered that all created beings are organized; and hence must have some organ of thought. That organ in man is a brain; God has ordained it so. How other beings beside man exercise thought we are not called upon to determine. We just, therefore, give a simple denial to this writer's statement."

We appeal to the candor and "courtesy" of "The Advance" if these remarks of ours warrant its statement that we "averred that the 'author had no brain?'" Do not the words "perhaps" and "seems" at least qualify our remarks? If the article had not been "anonymous" we confess we should not have used language so apparently severe as we did; but we do not think it "courteous" to represent it more severe than it was; which our exchange has done, as all will see. Besides, our language was used hyperbolically, as the candid must know, if they read the whole paragraph.

The other expression, quoted by "The Advance," viz: "shows entire ignorance, etc.," is made to express that which our language does not warrant. The "etc." does not tell the whole truth. We said of certain things in that article, "These statements show an entire ignorance of the subject of which the writer undertakes to speak." This expression of ours may have been too unguarded; but does it justify the partial manner in which "The Advance" has produced it? Can any candid mind believe we intended by it even to insinuate the author "ignorant" on all other topics?

In conclusion, we say, "Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness; let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head." Psa. cli., 5.

H. H. Dobney: "The Unpreached Gospel."

In the "World's Crisis," two weeks ago, was a letter from Eld. Jacob Blain in relation to the above-named. The information from Mr. Dobney is interesting. The tract to which Eld. Blain refers, that we spoke of some three weeks since, had the above title. We give Br. Blain's communication in the "World's Crisis" entire, and shall follow it with some remarks by way of Notes.

News from England.

Br. Grant: Having just received a letter from Br. H. H. Dobney, the old and able advocate of eternal life only by Christ, I conclude our brethren would like to hear what he says about the changes in England as to the doctrine of future punishment. I had requested him to give such information, and also to tell what he knew of H. Dunn, who has lately written a work of seven hundred pages, entitled, "The Destiny of the Human Race," which I had obtained and read with interest. He holds the annihilation of all who "sin wilfully after receiving the knowledge of the truth," as told in Heb. x., 26, 27. All others in Christian lands, dying in impenitence, and all the heathen, idiots and infants, will have a probation, or offer of accepting the Saviour after a general resurrection, and the coming of Christ: and so the majority, or mass, of our race be finally saved; but with different degrees of glory in the "new heavens and new earth." His views are entirely new, and important, if sustained by the Bible; and on that alone he relies; taking much of his proof from the Old Testament prophecies, much of which he thinks are not contained or repeated in the New Testament. His plan is being investigated in England, and a few of his works and some of his tracts have been sent to Boston.

Br. Dobney [after some personal remarks] says, "With all my heart do I wish you all joy and peace in your earnest endeavors to clear the character of God in the eyes of men, from the assertions which a popular theology has cast on it. The address you sent me, to the Minnesota Conference of the Methodist church, by Eld. L. C. Collins, is able and telling, while the spirit of it is excellent. As to us in England now, men on every hand deny, and indignantly repudiate, the dogma of everlasting misery, and deny it with impunity. The 'Churchman' of the Congregational Union for the present year, preaches life only in Christ—no immortality only in him. The editor told me in a letter last autumn that such was the state of opinion now in the churches of the C. Union, that if only two or three known and trusted men were to state openly their real convictions, the dogma of unending torments would be swept away forever from the churches.

"Many ministers of otherwise orthodox churches more than intimate their belief that ultimately all will be saved, and no harm accrues to them for the expression of this opinion. (1.)

"The more benignant views of God and his designs obtain in our lighter religious literature—works of fiction by honest, God-fearing, and God and man-loving writers. I think the more hopeful belief about the ultimate of the human race is likely to prevail by and by. (2.)

"H. Dunn, Esq., the author of 'Human Destiny,' about whom you inquire, is, so far as correspondence goes, a friend of mine—a most worthy lay gentleman, now advancing in years, but most indefatigable in endeavors to promote the kingdom of heaven. He is the author of many works, for the most part very admirable. While I was editor of the Spectator, he was one of my frequent contributors. Panton Ham joined the Unitarians long ago—I never see his name now." (3.)

These are the main items of information, and they show that England is getting ahead of us as to the great truth that evil is to have an end in God's good time. (4.) May we not hope that their progress will soon help us in our efforts? Surely our reform is no longer in a corner. J. Blain.

Buffalo, June 1, 1869.

P. S. Since writing the above I have seen Br. Storrs' paper, and find that he and Eld. Parry have read a tract by Br. Dunn, and both mistake his views on two points—immortality of the soul, and endless misery of the lost. (5.) The tract they read is not as plain on these points as it should be for an introduction or synopsis to his large work; yet destruction is intimated. His large work makes it plain. In another tract of his on "hades," he says—"The natural immortality of the soul is a doctrine unknown to the Bible, and is evidently of heathen origin." In the same tract he says—"The final lot of such (enlightened and wilful sinners) will be utter destruction (6.) This is plainly enough revealed. Evil is not to be eternal; and because it was never intended to be so, God graciously, after the fall, cut off our first parents from the tree of life, lest, eating thereof, they should live forever. Immortal monsters have no place in the universe of God." (7.)

This makes all plain. (8.) He, with Br. Dobney, and most of our late writers on destruction in Europe, are yet in the dark as to the intermediate state. (9.) Mr. Dunn owns the Bible is so silent about it, that he knows that sinners are on probation there. (10.) I found four of his tracts in Prof. Hudson's library. His piety and great knowledge of, and reverence for the Scriptures, will induce many to examine his system. Some will condemn it by one passage—"the broad and narrow way." On this he says; Christ was teaching Jews, who had a broad way by Abraham, and external ceremonies, while his was by holiness of heart; and further—in the present dispensation, but "few" accept or even hear of the Saviour. His views being new, I have not had time to search the Bible so as to receive or reject them, but see they deserve examination. I only now hint his plan to give news from England, and call attention to it. (11.)

[1.] This statement by Mr. Dobney makes us apprehensive that the tendency in England is to Restorationism, arising from still [generally] holding to inherent immortality. Mr. Dobney, of course, does not believe in such immortality, but theologians generally have or do hold to it; and hence, having become shocked by its consequence to the lost, viz., eternal torments, they have cast about to find some way to escape that idea, still clinging to inherent immortality. No wonder such should set themselves to the task of a future restoration somehow, or by some means.

[2.] This last expression makes us think that Mr. Dobney is inclined to favor the restoration to which he refers. We know that in his work on "Future Punishment," in 1844, he thought that view the more desirable one, if it could be sustained by Scripture; but he then thought it could not. What have been his musings in his twenty years' silence we do not know; he may have obtained light of which we have heard nothing. With our present light we have no more faith in Restorationism, so called, than we have in inherent immortality. We showed, years ago, that Bishop Newton favored the idea of universal restoration. He looked at future torment from the standpoint of inherent immortality, and could not reconcile eternal torments with the perfections of God; so he thought there might be "repentance in hell;" and if so, God would not continue the torment; that would be "impossible." It seems the English divines begin to think that "the more hopeful belief about the ultimate of the human race." Let them give the Bible testimony for such a "hopeful" view, and we will weigh it impartially, though at present we have no leaning to that view, and believe it founded, in most minds, on the notion of the deathlessness of man's nature.

[3.] We regret that Panton Ham swung out into a search after the definite knowledge of "who the Son is," which Christ said, "no man knoweth but the Father;" and has thereby buried himself, so far as the life views are concerned. We have ever lamented his course in this matter. He wrote nobly at the outset, but failed by turning aside to seek for knowledge which is too high for mortal man.

[4.] We doubt if "England is getting ahead of us" in the matter spoken of; or, if ahead, we fear it is in a way that will corrupt the truth, and thus do evil.

[5.] We did not mistake his views" at all. We did not mean to be understood that Mr. Dunn believed in inherent immortality; but that the views he promulgates are founded on that doctrine. We do by no means consider Mr. Dunn as the author of those views. They are as old as Restorationism. Eternal torments and universal salvation came from one root; they are both based on the "deathlessness of man's soul:" they are two branches from one root.

Mr. Dunn's restoration principles are very fully expressed in the following language:

> The Bible announces the glad tidings: It is, that "God is our Father, in spite of our indifference, or neglect of the relationship; that the Redeemer died, not merely to render it possible for men to be saved, but to save them," etc. "The godly and the ungodly are children of the same Father," etc.: pp. 44, 45.

Such language shows the views of Mr. Dunn, and shows how unlike the teaching of Jesus it is. To the wicked Jews, who claimed what Mr. Dunn says is true, viz., "We have one Father, God," Jesus replied, "If God were your Father, ye would love me; for I proceeded forth and came from God. . . Ye are of your Father the devil." John viii., 41–44. "Not so," says Mr. Dunn, "the godly and the ungodly are children of the same Father." Such is the "Unpreached Gospel" of Mr. Dunn; and we can, with present light, regard it only as that "other gospel" of which Paul speaks when he says, "Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel than that we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Gal. i., 8.

Mr. Dunn's grand mistake is assuming a relationship to God for sinners—for those not "begotten again"—that the Scriptures do not warrant. Prove that "the godly and ungodly are children of the same Father," and his conclusion of universal restoration follows inevitably. Yea, prove a universal resurrection of the dead, and it follows they are all children of God, for Jesus testifies, "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead . . . are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection:" and further, "neither can they die any more." Luke xx., 35, 36. Thus the wicked dead have a short route to salvation, if Mr. Dunn and the universal resurrectionists are right. No wonder those who hold and teach that the wicked dead are all to have a resurrection seem to look favorably on Mr. Dunn's views. To this they must and will come, unless they abandon their mortal resurrection notions. None of the raised. dead "can die any more"—"the dead are raised incorruptible," saith the Word. There is no dying again. If, then, wicked men are to be raised from the dead, they are raised "to be saved," as Mr. Dunn says.

[6.] So Mr. Dunn teaches some of God's "children" are "wilful sinners," and their "final lot will be utter destruction." Mark well, he has said, "the godly and ungodly are children of the same Father." He has also said, "Both must be saved by grace alone;" p. 45. He admits the godly "are children in a higher sense than the" ungodly; that is, he adds, they are "earlier brought to the feet of the Redeemer—the first-born of the heavenly family;" p. 45. The ungodly are to be "of the heavenly family," only they are a later birth, and will not be of "the Bride." And yet, some "wilful sinners" (children of the same Father), "will be utterly" destroyed! If Mr. Dunn is correct in his theory, we don't now see it. The eye-salve that is specially needed to make it plain is the proof that all sinners will be raised from the dead into a living existence. Mr. Dunn evidently believes they will be. With that view, we do not say he is inconsistent in his idea of their salvation.

[7.] Mr. Dunn, Br. Blain tells us here, does not believe that "Immortal monsters have any place in the universe of God." We are glad to hear that; but then, What is to become of the theological devil? or, does he not believe there is any such? If not, what does he mean when he speaks of "the great destroyer, 'foe of God and man,'" page 45? If that "monster" is not to be "immortal," and is to "have no place in the universe of God," we would like to see Mr. Dunn's proof of it. Has Br. Blain got it? If he has, will he be kind enough to let us look at it?

[8.] It may be "all plain" to Br. B., but we want to see it so, too, before we endorse it.

It certainly does not now look plain to us, till he let us into the secret how the "monster" devil is disposed of, on his theory.

[9.] The English writers are far more constent on the intermediate state than those i this country who believe in the resurrection of the wicked in a mortal state to die again. There is twice as much in the Bible to prove the conscious state of the righteous dead as there is in favor of the re-living of the wicked dead. We reject both ideas, but the first is far the most plausible of the two; and if holding to the latter, we would feel a delicacy in accusing our English brethren of being "in the dark as to the intermediate state."

[10.] This a singular statement. "The Bible is so silent about it that (Mr. D.) knows that sinners are on probation there." If this is a sample of Mr. Dunn's logic, we would not dare trust him as an expounder of the Scriptures; and we fear it is this sort of haphazard conclusion that forms his theory, toward which Br. B., as well as some of our English friends, seem inclined to lean, as the concluding remarks of Br. Blain plainly show.

[11.] To commend such writings as these of Mr. Dunn, or call attention to them as if they might prove true, when we have "had no time to search the Bible so as receive or reject them," we must say is rather a hazardous work. Who can tell what the effect may be on minds inclined to adopt the idea of a future probation for the dead and a restorrtion from all the consequences of their sins? We must say, with present light on the subject, we regard the scheme as a fancy, unwarranted by the Bible, and as chimerical as the Beecher theory of the "pre-existence of souls;" or, rather, the Origen theory; a mere fancy to avoid the plain facts of the Bible that "Now is the accepted time; and now is the day of salvation;" and "the soul that sinneth it shall die;" also, "the wages of sin is death;" and "as many as have sinned without law, shall perish without law," etc. Let all men beware of venturing on such a perilous speculation as the idea of a probation after death. Is Br. Blain willing to send out, with his seeming approval, such a sentiment as that found on page 31, of Mr. Dunn's tract, on which we commented, May 26th? as follows:

> The redemption of mankind from the tyranny of Satan; the deliverance of the race from "captivity;" the salvation of the world . . . is never made dependent on the belief or unbelief of mortals; nor is there a shadow of support to be found in the Bible for the supposition that the reconciliation of the world unto God fails to take effect when men neglect to co-operate with the Reconciler.

This is a sweeping statement, which, if received as truth, makes the Bible of no real value, and preaching, praying, scattering books, tracts, and faith itself, all superfluous; and all exhortations, warnings, yea, and promises, too, a waste of effort, by "mortals;" for the work of "the salvation of the world is not dependent on "their" belief or unbelief."

"You Are Immortal."

Such is the heading of a 24mo. tract, issued by the "American Tract Society, 164 Tremont street, Boston," and which, it seems was extensively scattered at the late "Peace Jubilee" in that city. Br. Warner, of North Cambridge, Mass., picked up a copy of it on Boston Common, and sent it to us, accompanied by a letter, which we gave in the Herald last week.

We will not question but what the motives which prompted the printing and circulating such a tract were good; and many items of exhortation in it may be of service; but the title and some of its statements are as near the language of the "old serpent" as can well be conceived. It opens thus:

> Reader!—You are an immortal being! You have been born, and you will die, but you can never cease to exist! You must live forever! It is of no avail that you are so debased by sin that you may wish to be, at death, like the brutes that perish. You can not, . . . you are to spend eternity in the enjoyment of heaven, with God and Christ, the angels, and the redeemed from among men, or with the worm that dieth not, and the fire that never shall be quenched.'

No doubt the "Am. Tract Society" suppose they were scattering truth in sending forth such unfounded and antiscriptural statements. We will not therefore charge it with deliberate falsehoods; yet, more untruth could hardly have been crowded into so few lines. We ought, of course, to pity the ignorance that would attempt to impose on a student of the Bible such statements for truth. The authors of them may not give us credit for calling the scattering of such statements the result of ignorance, and say, as did the Pharisees, "Are we also blind?" "We, the learned, the intelligent, who have such men as Calvin, Arminius, Wesley, Edwards, Fox, the Pope, and a host of others on our side; are we to be called 'ignorant' by striplings, who are no better, and no more learned than the fishermen of Galilee?" True, gentlemen, it is a humiliating idea; but have we, "therefore, become your enemy, because we tell you the truth?" The fact is clear, that on the nature and destiny of man, notwithstanding the extensiveness of your general learning, you are sadly defective in knowledge. We are not astonished that you are so under the traditionary training you have had from infancy up; but we are grieved that, with the means of better information, you persist in following the traditions of men to the dishonor of God, by the perversion of His truth. Not one such utterance can you find in God's Bible as those you have employed in the above extract. Why then persist in the employment of such language? Do you not know men will think for themselves, if you will not? And what is to be the result to yourselves, ultimately, by such baseless statements as you have used at the outset of this tract? Do you not know that you will by and by find, by sad experience, that men have lost all confidence in you on the subject of religious truth, and you will come to be wholly disregarded as teachers of the knowledge of God? Have you no concern in this matter? If you really love the cause of God and dying men, ought you not to study to commend yourselves to intelligent minds who do and will think? Is it nothing to you that such minds are daily seeking to others than to you for a system of teaching that shall better agree with God's revealed character and the reason He has given them, than such preposterous assumptions as you have put forth on man's nature and destiny? If they accept your affirmation—"You are immortal"—will they not indignantly reject your conclusion of eternal torture of the creatures God has made? Will they not turn from such statements as irreconcilable with the perfections of God? Yea, have not thousands on thousands already rejected such statements, and sought refuge in Spiritism, Universalism, and other like ideas? And what is more—Have not multitudes in your churches already given themselves up to the secret belief of Restorationism; perhaps to an open avowal of it, as in England?

It is impossible for your ministers and churches to stand still; already your very foundations tremble; and your most mighty minds show signs of attempting to escape the horrible consequences that follow in the train of "You are immortal," and "will have to spend eternity in a fire that never shall be quenched." Cast about they do and will, and so will the people, to avoid such conclusions. Will you let yourselves and the people drift into Spiritism and Restorationism by still insisting "You are immortal—you can never cease to exist?" Sure as the sun continues to rise and set, the time is not far distant when you must abandon this position, or be swept away with the rising flood which is coming in on you.

We beseech you to review the ground on which you stand, and see what is to be the result to yourselves and others by persisting in promulgating such views of man's nature and destiny as those contained in the tract which is the occasion of these remarks. Man is a dying, perishing creature, going out of life without hope, except he lays hold on God's promised mercy in Jesus Christ. "Man that is in honor and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish" (Psalm xlix.,) notwithstanding the tract before us positively denies this statement in the paragraph we have quoted from it. Nevertheless it is true; "God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii., 16.

Do not trifle with such testimony. Let men know they are perishing "like the brutes," and that unless they accept God's method for redemption from death, they will "utterly perish in their own corruption." 2 Pet. ii., 12. Point them to the Lamb of God to take away their sins, and as He alone, who is God's appointed Life-giver, whom they must accept as such, or utterly perish in their sins.

Next Week being the "Fourth of July" week, no paper will be issued. Permit us to have a little rest, and read over some of your back numbers, for once. They will pay you well for doing so.

Infant Salvation Again.

We have several quite long communications on hand on this subject; doubtless thought important by the writers because the opposers of Life only in Christ try to stay the progress of the truth we promulgate with the cry that our view excludes infants from salvation. If these opponents have worn out their "mortal resurrection" theory in their warfare on us, they doubtless will look about for some new weapon to oppose the truth. We think we placed this subject in its true light a few weeks since, and are of the opinion, it is needless to fill our columns with fighting our enemy's "man of straw;" it is their dying resort; and not an intelligent man among them but what knows their accusation against us, in this matter, is a baseless fabrication. Let them "mock on," if they will; but let us continue to proclaim "Life only in Christ." So shall we live and prosper.

PRESBYTERIANISM AND METHODISM.

It seems the "Christian Advocate," of this city, has recently discovered that these two systems of religion are nearer together than has heretofore been generally supposed by themselves or others. We rejoice at any manifestation of friendly or brotherly feeling between them, as we believe all Christians ought to love one another, though they may have doctrinal differences. We were glad to see that a delegation of Methodist ministers visited each of the Presbyterian General Assemblies, which recently met in this city, and that friendly salutations were given and receaved on both sides. We trust good will result from it, and that the parties will come to understand each other better and love each other as they should. After expressing satisfaction with the above friendly greetings, the "Advocate" says:

"There are clearly-marked differences between Methodists and Presbyterians which cannot be expected to be removed—it is probably best they shall remain; and yet we are satisfied that with no other class of Christians have the Methodists, as a religious body, so many things in common as with the Presbyterians, though hitherto they may have seemed to be most widely removed from each other."

It is a good thing, once in awhile, to look over the agreement that exists, so as to see how near we can get to each other; it may help to modify or change some of our errors for truth, and bring in more of real union and fellowship. Of the Methodists and Presbyterians, the "Advocate" says:

"The fundamental ecclesiastical principle of both orders is the divine authority of the Christian ministry, and the essential equality, in order, of all ministers of the Gospel. This is the very soul of Presbyterianism, and yet is the distinctive characteristic of Methodist ecclesiastical polity. Ministers are not simply elective Church officers, but beyond this they are divinely-appointed ministers of God to men, by virtue of which divine ordination they are qualified for their calling as servants of the Church in word and doctrine. The authority of the Presbytery, the body of ministers, is recognized in both Churches, and practically it has hitherto been preserved in greater purity among Methodists than in any of the distinctly so-named Presbyterian Churches. We have, indeed, our Bishops; who, however are not only themselves Elders in the Church of God of the same order with their brethren, but they are also officially the creation of the Presbytery, and their official life hangs continually upon the will of that body. Ecclesiastically, Methodists claim the reality of the ministerial calling, creating an order of persons in the Church to whom are intrusted certain functions, and of whom certain duties are required, so constituting the ministry a distinct and peculiar class in the Church; and these individual ministers, so called and ordained of God, are all essentially of the same grade. Between our denomination and the regular Presbyterian bodies of Protestant Christendom there is a substantial agreement in the fundamental principles of Church polity."

Here is a claim set up for authority by ministers, in which the two denominations are agreed, except the Methodists "hitherto" have "preserved" it "in greater purity" than the Presbyterians. The word "hitherto," is noticeable in this remark. The laity in the Methodist Church, "hitherto," were little more than ciphers in governmental affairs; but that state of things is about to pass away; lay delegates are to have part in making and executing laws in that church. We regard this as a favorable omen, as it will open the way for other reforms among them. As to the so-called ministers of either church being "divinely-appointed ministers of God to men," and "ordained of God," what did Rome ever claim more? If this statement is true, why should not the laity yield a perfect submission to them in doctrine and in government? If they have a ministry "divinely-appointed" and "ordained of God," has He not qualified them to do and teach His will? and shall the laity presume to ask, Why do ye so? and shall they seek to do the work which God —as they believe—has "ordained" a "divinely-appointed ministry" to do and teach? Because the Apostles were so appointed, by Christ, personally, does it follow that any other man or body of men have ever been, since their days?

Assuming this point has been the foundation of all the persecutions that have originated in Christendom; and is the very thing that now divides Christians into so many sects and parties, and prevents a permanent union of true Christians. Other interests than those which are purely Christian, influence leaders, claiming to be "divinely-appointed ministers of God," in all these organizations. It is this which keeps up the strife, and leads to emulation to see who can have the most popular minister, and have the finest places for their public assemblies, and the most attractive surroundings to draw men to their places of so-called worship; especially rich men, who can help to keep up this outward appearance, while the inward work on the heart becomes only a secondary matter.

Such, alas! is often the result of this claim of a "divinely-appointed ministry—ordained of God." It becomes a "lordship" over "God's heritage" by their high claim of authority. Who shall presume to take a stand in any thing opposed to the will of men whom "God" has "ordained" to make known His will? Truly, he must be a heretic, indeed, that hints a word of dissent from such Heaven appointed men!

"In matters of Christian doctrines it is often tacitly assumed that there is a strong and clearly marked antagonism between the two systems. Calvinism and Arminianism are considered antipodes to each other, the two poles of the dogmatic sphere. But a definition of terms would probably show that these differences are not altogether so clearly marked as at first appeared. A Calvinist's definition of Calvinism includes nearly the entire creed of an evangelical Arminianism; and an Arminian's confession of faith will, to a Calvinist, prove him to be not far from the faith of the "elect." Even the dogma of predestination, which Arminians totally reject, as explained and applied by many Calvinists, will be readily accepted by intelligent Arminians as identical with things approved by themselves, but called by other names, and set forth in more felicitous terms. Both Calvinists and Methodists believe alike in the sovereignity of God and the free agency of man. If the former class err by overpressing the former idea, the latter need to be careful lest they so disproportionately extend the idea of human freedom as to exclude the divine Efficiency from a most important department of his dominions. A broader logic, tempered with an enlightened charity, would go very far toward harmonizing these apparently antagonistic and irreconcilable points of doctrine."

This is exceeding clever: the warfare so bravely carried on by Wesley, Fletcher, and a host of other eminent Methodists, is terminated; not by concession of Calvinists, but by the "Christian Advocate." How will other Methodist organs relish this? But we leave this statement to be settled among themselves. If they can reconcile Calvinism and Arminianism, after so long and hard-fought a battle as that of the past century, it will do much to establish their divine-appointment to the ministry," as the age of Christianity could hardly boast a greater "miracle;" the needed evidence that their ministry is "God ordained."

Here follows another statement of the "Advocate:"

"On many of the chief articles of the Christian faith the agreement of these two classes of believers is complete. Respecting the Trinity, the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures, the Sabbath, baptism, (as to both the subject and the mode), and the Lord's Supper, there is the most perfect concord. As to those great doctrines which relate to man's spiritual character, and God's dealings with men as spiritual beings—those relating to sin, atonement, ability, grace, and free will—though it is thought that just here the divergence is most manifest, we find rather a substantial agreement between the two types of theology. The definition of "original sin" given in the Methodist article on that subject is eminently and distinctly Augustinian, and agrees perfectly with the definitions given by the Reformers, and latter, by the Remonstrants, and earnestly contended for by Wesley and elaborated by Watson. The accepted notion of sin pretty certainly determines that of atonement, and here again Calvinists and Arminians agree. The influence of sin in man to render him incapable of repentance and a holy life is most forcibly and happily declared in our article of religion entitled 'Of Free Will.' That article reads rather strangely if the Methodist doctrine of the 'will,' as taught by some, is to be accepted. 'The condition of man after the fall of Adam is such that he cannot turn and prepare himself, by his own natural strength and works, to faith and calling upon God.'

"Here is moral inability most clearly recognized and declared, by virtue of which man can neither initiate a new life, nor, after it has been given, pursue it except by divine power. Will any Calvinist ask more? The doctrines of grace are of the very soul of Arminianism—the spirit and life of Methodism; and yet some Calvinists have claimed them as exclusively their own, and some Methodists have half conceded the claim."

Here is a pretty broad ground of agreement. Why should two denominations exist as separate bodies who have so little to divide them? Surely, this ought not so to be. The "Advocate," it is true, says it is better that they have a "separate existence;" but we cannot see why, if they are so much in agreement; surely their "separate" state is not creditable to Christianity, which they both profess to love. The "Advocate" lays special stress on the fact that the two denominations are so agreed on the subject of man's "moral inability," stating the Methodist article on the subject, and asks, "Will any Calvinist ask more?"

We hope our readers will circulate our tract on Inherent Moral Depravity, which we have now placed among our Campaign Documents. Such depravity is just as impossible as for God to be the author of sin; but we will not argue the case here: read our tract and see. What saith "The Methodist," "Zion's Herald," and other Methodist papers to the statements of the "Christian Advocate?" Have the days of revolution come over Methodism?

The "Advocate" closes its remarks as follows:

"Since, then, there is this substantial agreement between the doctrinal systems held and taught by the Methodists and the Presbyterians of the land, there is no good reason why the two classes of Christians should appear as antagonists, or fail to extend to each other the most cordial Christian sympathy. The Captain of our salvation has evidently distributed these divisions of his militant hosts into distinct bands for wise purposes. Let each regard the other as fellow-workers in the same great calling, and let all labor on in harmony in the patience and faith of Christ."

This sounds well, just now; but the time has been when the war was waged without yielding on either side. Did "the Captain of our salvation" direct that warfare on both sides "for wise purposes?" If so, will the "Advocate" tell us what they were? It seems after the long conflict of a century it is discovered the conflicting parties have been at "substantial agreement." What, a "divinely-appointed" and "God-ordained ministry" carry on an almost relentless war with each other about non-essentials for a century! Is that what "the Captain of our salvation distributed these divisions of his militant hosts into distinct bands" for? We need another miracle to show that such a "purpose" was "wise."

Let no one suppose that we regret to see these sects approaching each other with olive branches of peace; for we do not. Let their oneness become a manifested fact, and embrace each other in deed and in truth. Join all your forces together—the closer the better, for the real battle has but just commenced. Your foundation dogmas of man's inherent immortality, and spiritual nature, with its consequent attendent, eternal torture to these spiritual and immortal beings, has to pass the fiery ordeal of investigation by the Bible and the reason to which God appeals when He says, "Come now let us reason together." God has given to man this faculty to be used; and all revelation is made to it; and that which plainly contradicts reason is not from God: the thing is impossible, for God is the author of both; hence there must be a perfect agreement between them. To deny this, is to deny revelation itself. Revelation brings to light that which man's reason could never have discovered; but when thus made known, reason is not shocked nor contradicted; but, if not perverted, is delighted and harmonizes with it; thus proving the revelation is from God; it needs not volumes written of theological and heathen speculations upon it to force it on the minds of men.

Such days of teaching, and such systems of hot-house theology, have nearly finished their course, and "the heavens and the earth" are to be "shaken," and the "things which can not be shaken" will "remain," let what will befall sectarian organizations and platforms.

THE HOPE OF THE TRUE CHURCH.

THE trial of the true Church of God was great when her Lord was personally taken from her; but great as it was, she was sustained by two promises: First, "If I go away I will send the COMFORTER unto you;" Second, "I will come again." These two promises are distinct, and not to be confounded as if one and the same thing. The first promise embraces that gift without which we would fail in our warfare and pilgrimage, and never would attain unto the resurrection of the dead. It is by the aid and constant working of the holy Comforter in us that we are enabled to become conformed to the will of God in all things. It is the Comforter that "sheds abroad the love of God in our hearts" (Rom. v., 5), thereby enabling "us always to triumph in Christ," in his personal absence, whatever trials we are called to pass through.

But all this, precious as it is, does not meet the desire of the true Church of God. Her Lord's personal absence is one of her sorest trials. Her affection for Him makes her long for His return; and that return is her only hope of deliverance from sorrow, pain, and death. To her it is "The blessed hope, and the manifestation of the glory of the great God, and our LIFE-GIVER, Jesus the Messiah" (Synac of Titus ii., 13), and for this the Church is "looking;" which expression implies, first, strong faith in the return; and, second, strong desire for it. The two traits of character are found in all well-instructed and living members of Christ's body.

When men are truly converted, they are changed from an earthly to a heavenly mind. The necessary things of earth are attended to, but they become secondary in importance, and only necessary as food and inn are to a traveller. This present state of worldly affairs no longer occupies his mind and attention as of any real importance, only as helps on his way, while waiting for his Lord's return. He has been turned from earth's idolatry "to serve the living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven, whom He raised from the dead, even Jesus." 1 Thess. i., 9, 10. The Bible-instructed Christian is not looking to go to heaven at death. Such an idea shows a defect in education, the tendency of which is, to turn off his eyes from the true hope of the Church to one without foundation in the revelation of God; and thus to cause him to cease from true faith in Christ's return from heaven; and in proportion as his mind is influenced by this mistaken idea of going to heaven when he dies, he ceases to desire his Lord's return, and his faith in the fulfilment of the promise of it is weakened or destroyed, or changed into the fancy that the promise means that Christ returns when the saint dies.

Thus is the hope of the true Church made void, and the desire for this same Jesus, who was taken up into heaven, to so return in "like manner" as He was "seen to go into heaven" (Acts i., 11), is destroyed; for no man, except under painful circumstances, can desire death; and so the return of Christ, according to such view, is not a desirable event: it is not "the blessed hope" of the Gospel. Let us all beware of such perverted views of the return of Christ. He comes not by death, but to destroy death and to give life to His saints by a resurrection from the dead, if asleep in the dust of the earth; or, if alive at that time, to change them to immortality and give them an endless life. Such is the hope of the truly-instructed Christian.

THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

THE next anniversary of the "Union" will be held on Thursday, September 2, in Springfield, Mass. We hope all our friends, far and near, who can possibly be present, will not fail to be there. The meeting this year will, probably, be one of the most important that we have ever held; and all who can aid in our work we shall be pleased to see, that we may consult together, and devise means for greater efficiency in the glorious cause of truth which we have been called of God to advance, as we firmly believe. Let us all so far forecast in our affairs as to give the time necessary for this anniversary.

"The National Advent Camp-meeting" is to be held at the same place, commencing August 28th, and to be continued till Sept. 6th. Many from all parts of the country will meet at that time.

TENT MEETINGS.

AFTER a season of prayer and reflection, have a few words to add concerning the tent meetings. In the first place, it is vain to send forth the tent without some one to go with it, to put it up, arrange the seating, and watch it night and day; being confident, that to send it from place to place, depending upon each place to care for it, would but prove a vexation to all who have the precious cause at heart, beside insuring the destruction of the tent itself.

In view of this, have written to Br. D. W. Littell, who so faithfully, and generously, cared for it at Springfield last year. If he can not go, some one else will be sought, who will come to this place, see the tent put up, and receive other instructions. The pay will be $10 per week, and all expenses paid.

Am satisfied by experience, that this labor and care can not fall upon the preaching brethren who minister in the tent: they want hours of rest, not watchings, after having preached to five hundred critics and non-sympathizers.

It appears to me duty—through the mercy of God—to assume this responsibility, asking at the same time the consideration of the church. This will leave the church in the place where the tent is pitched to provide a piece of ground, procure seating, and arrange for preachers and their entertainment; receiving aid to do the same as their need may require, and as the friends of Jesus may furnish.

To our mind, this will simplify the whole matter.

Br. Spencer, of Rochester, has some time since expressed his desire for that place for a three or four weeks' campaign; Sr. Wood, for Albany, and Br. Campbell for his vicinity. Let every one speak, that the wants of all may be supplied as far as time and means will permit.

We hope this will meet the approval of all.

E. WOLCOTT.

KEYPORT, N. J., June 26, 1869.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We heartily approve of Br. Wolcott's views about the tent and meetings in it. His offer is truly generous to furnish a man to take care of the tent and pay his expenses. May the Lord reward him. Will not others help in this movement? We trust they will.

FROM A. L. HOUGHTON.

FLORIDA, MASS., June, 23, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I feel thankful to God that He still spares you to labor in so worthy a cause as the instruction of men in the Bible truth of Life only through Christ, and that by a resurrection from the dead. I remember also those who write for the HERALD. May God direct them in all good works; and may they in all things, seek to do the will of our heavenly Father.

As I read of the opposition many have received from those who were previously their friends, and perhaps members of the same church, because they have embraced the Life views, it reminds me of my own experience since accepting the Bible doctrine of a future life only through Christ. When my mind was first awakened to this subject, I was a member of the Baptist church. Believing that the doctrine had some foundation in the Bible, I resolved, at all hazards, to see what was its teaching on the subject. I remembered the promise, "Seek and ye shall find." I went diligently to work, praying God to enable me to find the truth. The result was I found more Scripture to sustain the faith of Life believers than I could to sustain the old theory. In many cases I found the old system had no Bible testimony to sustain it; but still they clung to it. At length I came to the conclusion to let the old traditions of men go and settle on the Bible testimony. After coming to this conclusion, you can well imagine the consequences. I was soon arraigned with others before the church, charged with embracing error, which resulted in our separation from that church—they could not have us walk with them; its members have shown a coldness to us; old ones, whose hairs are white, who used to talk with me about the love of Jesus, do not speak to me now. But, if Jesus is for me what harm can this neglect do me?

I would ask them, if the spirit they manifest is right? Should one professed Christian treat another thus because of a doctrinal difference? I believe not: neither do I believe God is pleased with such a course. How much better the influence would be on the non-professors of religion should these church members manifest the spirit of love, remembering that "God is love," and that our minds should be in harmony with His.

After all, it is good to be persecuted for Christ and his words. He is glorified thereby, and in many instances friends are gained to the truth of Life only through Christ and kindred doctrines. We have more friends and advocates here than ever before: praise God forever and ever.

Dear Brethren and Sisters, who have taken on you the reproach of believing in Life only in Christ, let us prove faithful. We see that this truth is gaining. Let us not be faint-hearted, but press onward until we receive the crown of life, which the righteous Judge will give us at that day when He shall appear in glory. If those who oppose smite us on one cheek, let us turn the other also, remembering that "all things work together for good to them who love God." Your brother in Christ.

FROM CATHARINE C. WILLIAMS.

BUTLER, BATES CO., MO., June 20, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I am glad to have a chance to add one to the list of subscribers to the HERALD OF LIFE; which is such a rare circumstance, I feel like telling how it came about. A niece of mine moved from Mass. to Kansas some fifteen years since, and I had long since lost all traces of them; but somehow they learned our situation, and a fortnight since we were gladdened by a visit from them. On reading some of the interesting items of my HERALDS to her, and talking some with her, she seemed quite interested, and expressed a desire to take it. Accordingly she gave me a dollar to send for it six months for a trial. I hope it may create an appetite for more. Like many others, her husband seems to know no middie ground between orthodoxy and liberalism, I judge; and as he can't be orthodox, must take some form of the other extreme.

And is it indeed so, "that Saul is among the prophets?" Who would ever thought of finding such a summary on such a subject, in such a paper as the "N. Y. Herald?" I trust many will thank the editor for opening his columns to such light, a light shining in a dark place truly; and may many see it and be led to rejoice in it.

We now have a large nice school-house handy, and a Sunday-school started. I noticed in the HERALD of June 2d. a letter from Eld. B. Matthias, dated Lanesfield, Kansas, May 13th. I judge he has hitherto been a stranger to prairie sights and scenes. He seems charmed, delighted. It is truly a grand country. Olathe, that he mentions, is nearly west of us, and the R. R. of which he speaks runs about 20 miles west of us. It is not so far but what he might "come over," if not "into Macedonia," to Butler, and introduce another element or principle to the number already striving for the mastery; and as truth is proverbially mighty, it might bear the palm. We are so distant from town, and water-courses, frequently unfordable in such wet seasons as the present, intervening, and other preventive causes, we seldom get out to meeting. Our son, of whom I spoke in a former letter, still lives, but is feeble. I fear nothing can help him permanently. It is hard to see young lives wasting away, slowly, but surely; but human aid seems powerless to stay it. Oh, war, war! what has it not done; and what sacrifices has it not demanded? Living or dying, may he be the Lord's, is my prayer; then all will be well. In his hands I must leave him, and try to say and feel, "Thy will, not mine, be done;" after doing all I can, how desirable to live so as to be able to say at last, "Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit."

May the consolations of the gospel abound in you.

CELIA A. HICKS, New Rutland, Ills., writes: I am much interested in the Life theme as taught in the HERALD: am also pleased with the stand you take in regard to human organizations, laws, and resolves; although they may be of use to enhance a party interest; that they tend to move godliness or brotherly love, I doubt. I believe the word an all-sufficient rule, and if the love of God fails to constrain us, all that is gained by earthly means methinks will be as "hay, wood and stubble." May God bless you in your labors of love for the church, and grant to spare your life until the Prince of Peace shall come, for that day draws near. Soon the dear saints will be gathered to the marriage of the Lamb; and the language of my heart is in unison with all the waiting ones, who are crying, "Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly." Yours in Christian love and sympathy.

BR. J. W. MCCAGG, Warsaw, N. Y., under date of June 22d, writes: Bless the Lord. Br. Burbank's recent visit here looked like a failure to him; but I can see a greater interest in this section than ever. Our Clergy are getting waked up, and begin to fear that our efforts may injure them. Our minister spoke against us last Sunday, particularly about our sticking tracts into everybody's houses. Poor man, he means well, and my prayer is, he may get into the glorious light of the gospel. He would not do anything wrong knowingly. I feel much encouraged. I wish to do all I can for these glorious truths; and may God bless us in all our efforts that are prompted by the Spirit of Christ.

POLLY G. PITTS, Fredericksburg, Iowa, sends a new subscriber, and writes: "The HERALD grows better all the while; some new idea, some new beauty of Life in Christ, from God's holy word, is being brought out. May God keep all His faithful workers in the field till all are gathered into His everlasting garner, and swallowed up of Life. May God bless you abundantly with strength as your day is.

Poetry.

A Victorious Faith.

Oh for a faith that will not shrink,
Though pressed by every foe;
That will not tremble on the brink
Of any earthly woe;

That will not murmur or complain
Beneath the chastening rod;
But in the hour of grief or pain,
Will lean upon its God;

A faith that shines more bright and clear,
When tempests rage without;
That, when in danger, knows no fear,
In darkness feels no doubt;

That bears, unmoved, the world's dread frown,
Nor heeds its scornful smile;
That seas of trouble cannot drown,
Or satan's arts beguile;

A faith that keeps the narrow way,
Till life's last hour is fled,
And, with a pure and heavenly ray,
Illumes a dying bed.

Lord, give us such a faith as this,
And then, whate'er may come,
We'll taste, e'en here, the hallowed bliss
Of an eternal home. BATHURST.

Children's Department.

The Specked Apple.

MR. ARDEN had two daughters, Jane and Martha, one twelve years old and the other thirteen, at the time of the incident we are about to relate.

A little girl named Mary, about the age of Martha, also made one of the family of Mr. Arden. She was the orphan child of a friend, and had been received by Mr. Arden when quite young, and treated with all the kindness that marked his conduct toward his own children.

Mr. Arden was a man who understood very well that all the unhappiness in the world had its origin in selfishness, and that the true way to find happiness was to seek the good of others. He often explained this to his children, and taught them that, in preferring one another, in little as well as great things, they would feel more real delight than in selfishly looking to their own indulgence.

But this he found a very hard lesson for young minds to learn. Especially hard did it seem for Jane and Martha to prefer Mary in anything to themselves. They loved her, because she was a gentle, sweet-tempered girl, and therofore they could not help loving her. But they loved themselves better.

One day, late in the winter, at a time when fruit was scarce, Mr. Arden, on coming from his office, brought home with him three large mellow pippins. They were intended for Jane, Martha, and Mary. While at tea, Mr. Arden mentioned the fact that he had three large apples in his coat pocket for the girls.

"O give me mine!" said Jane eagerly.

"Give me mine, papa!" said Martha.

But Mary said nothing, although she looked pleased.

"After tea you shall have them," replied Mr. Arden. "But let me tell you there is something about these three apples that will test, to some extent, your characters.

"How can that be papa?" asked Jane.

"We shall see," replied Mr. Arden, smiling.

"No doubt they will test our love of apples," said Martha, who was a merry little girl.

"Not the least doubt of that in the world," said her father. "But take care Martha, in receiving your apple you do not lose your appetite for eating it."

"I shall if it is very sour, or has a poor flavor."

"That you will not find to be the case. They are as fine apples as I have seen for a long time."

"What a mystery papa makes about these apples," said Jane. "I am really impatient to see them."

"You shall both see and taste them, dear, after tea. But don't forget that there is something about these apples that is going to try your characters."

After they had risen from the tea-table, and the tea things had been cleared away, Mr. Arden brought out his three apples and laid them upon a plate. They were indeed tempting to look upon. They were nearly equal in size, but one was less beautiful in shape than the others, and had become "specked," or slightly decayed on one side of the stem. This defect though small, was quite apparent.

"They are very beautiful," said the mother, taking the plate in her hand and examining the fruit. "I think father has neglected me."

"O you shall have half of mine!" said Mary, quickly.

"And papa shall have half of mine!" said Martha.

"And to whom shall I give half of mine!" asked Jane. "O! I know—I will divide the half of mine between papa and mamma."

"By which means we shall get the largest share," said Mr. Arden. "So, mother, we shall not only fare as well, but better than the rest."

"And that will be all fair, for you ought to have the largest portion always," said Mary, while her eyes expressed the warm affection that was in her heart for her kind benefactors, who had been to her all that her own father and mother could possibly have been.

"Now Jane," said Mr. Arden, handing toward her the plate which held the fruit, "take your apple, dear."

Jane without pausing a moment took an apple from the plate.

"Here, Martha," and Mr. Arden presented the plate to his youngest dang hter, who took with a smiling lip and sparkling eye, the large golden apple her kind father had brought her.

"They have left the specked apple for you, Mary," said Mr. Arden in a slightly disappointed tone. "But never mind, dear, the ripest and richest fruit is soonest to decay. I have no doubt that the superior flavor of your apple will more than make up for its slight defect."

The two sisters, who perceived in a minute, from their father's remarks, and the tone in which he spoke, that they had acted selfishly in choosing the best apples for themselves, and that he had noticed it, immediately offered to change with Mary; but she said, with a pleasant smile, "O no, no! I am perfectly satisfied; I should have taken this one if I had been offered the first choice."

As she said this she took a knife from the table, remarking as she did so, that half of it belonged to Mrs. Arden.

While she yet spoke she pressed the knife into the apple, but somethihg toward the center prevented the blade from going through.

A slight pressure broke the apple in halves, and revealed, brightly gleaming in the center, a very elegant little brooch.

"Why papa!" exclaimed Jane, who understood in an instant what this meant.

"Jane, we are justly punished for our selfishness in taking the best apples and leaving Mary the worst," said Martha, the tears starting to her eyes even while she made this confession.

"These apples," as father said, "have indeed tried our characters. But let me look at your beautiful present, Mary."

Martha took the brooch, and while examining it perceived that there was an inscription on the inside. She read it aloud, "To the least selfish."

"It is yours, by right, Mary," said Jane, frankly owning what was daily seen by all to be true, "for you are the least selfish here."

Mary said nothing, but her eyes were full of tears.

"My children," said Mr. Arden, "this is a little matter, but it has shown you something of yourselves. I am rejoiced to find that Jane and Martha bear their disappointment in such a generous spirit, for it tells me that the lesson has done them good."—Children's Guest.

Search the Scriptures.—No. 2.

IN the former number I showed that Jesus and His apostles, in every mention made of the Scriptures, referred to the Old Testament. Their fullness, or completeness is plainly taught. They are "the words of life." "They are able to make one wise unto salvation." "Profitable for all things; for doctrine; for reproof; for correction; for instruction in righteousness;" ample and equal to any necessity: "That the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." They are a "sure word of prophecy." Because, "holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit." Josiah, a pre-eminent prophet, says, "To the law and to the testimony; if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." The Psalmist says, "The entrance of thy word giveth light," and "is a light to our feet." Daniel says, "Many (by it) are purified and made white." Jeremiah says, it "is a fire and a hammer." The New Testament says, "It is quick and powerful, a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart," and "the power of God unto salvation." If men "will not hear Moses and the prophets," they will not "be persuaded though one rose from the dead." For whatever things were written afore time, were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope." This view of things accepted, the Old Testament becomes pre-eminently the Scriptures of sound doctrines. Hence any doctrine assumed to be taught in the New Testament, before it can pass as orthodox, must be supported and corroborated by the Old.

Having this matter in what we hope will be accepted as a good shape, we trust all candid readers will reconsider their theories, and reconstruct them upon the Scriptures of truth.

By not observing the foregoing great fact, but, on the contrary, supposing that the New Testament is a revelation of new doctrines, a change of the divine plan and administration, a change of man's nature and the nature of his responsibility, and so on, the sects, from the highest to the lowest order and party, have come to the formation and adoption of doctrines and creeds that do directly or implicitly contradict every doctrine taught by Moses and the prophets.

This declaration is so near the exact truth, that it is hardly possible to suppose an exception. Creed-makers have dashed over the great body of Scripture divinity, as Fletcher says, "Jehu did over the cursed body of Jezebel." We hope they are honorable men, and fear God, and will accept of this humble hint, and accept the inevitable revelation. Come it must, and must be welcomed, or God will "smite the earth with a curse." Mal. iv., 6.

It will greatly please me if some who love to write will take this matter up, and show the violence done in particular instances to the holy Scriptures by the imposition of dogmas "which make the word of God of none effect."

The Scope of God's Purpose: as Revealed in the Gospel of the Kingdom.

AN INQUIRY BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

"And preaching the gospel of the kingdom." Matth. iv., 23.

THIS passage comprehends all that Christ taught. Other descriptions of his teaching are given, but they are only different ways of saying the same thing. The gospel, the gospel of Christ, the gospel of God, and the gospel of salvation, all mean the same gospel. The word, the word of God, the word of the kingdom, the gospel of the kingdom, the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, and the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, all mean the same thing. These different descriptions of the teaching of Christ and his apostles, are used interchangably, and refer to the one system by which God has purposed to govern the world.

THE GOSPEL. WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

The word gospel means, good news, glad tidings, a joyful message. In Isa. lxi., 1, it is said, "The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek." These good tidings are called the gospel, in Luke. iv., 18. In Isa. v., 27, it is said, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace, that bringeth good tidings of good, that publisheth salvation, that saith unto Zion, Thy God reigneth." These good tidings are called the gospel in Rom. x., 15. In Luke viii., 1, it is said of Christ, "that he went throughout every city and village, preaching, and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God." In our text these glad tidings, are called the gospel. The gospel, then, always means glad tidings, good news, a joyful message.

THE GOSPEL IS GOOD NEWS OF WHAT? THE KINGDOM.

It always pertains to the kingdom of God, It is of value only as the kingdom to which it pertains is a value. It cannot exist independently of the kingdom, for it is good news of the kingdom. When the good news of the kingdom is fulfilled, the kingdom will be in a better condition than it is in now. When Christ began to preach, he preached the gospel of the kingdom. "He came unto Galilee preaching the gospel of the kingdom of God." Mark i., 14. He continued to preach the same gospel wherever he went. "He went throughout every city and village preaching the glad tidings of the kingdom of God." Luke viii., 1. And after he was raised from the dead, he was with the apostles forty days, "speaking of things pertaining to the kingdom of God." Acts. i., 4. "He sent out his apostles to preach the kingdom of God, and they went and preached the gospel" (of the kingdom). Luke ix., 2–6. When the disciples were scattered abroad by persecution, "they went every where preaching the word"—the things concerning the kingdom of God, "and the name of Jesus Christ." Acts viii., 4–12. "And Paul spake boldly for the space of three months, of things concerning the kingdom of God." Acts xix., 8. Again, he says, "And now behold I know that ye all, among whom I have gone preaching the kingdom of God (for twenty five years) shall see my face no more." Acts. xx., 25. And again. "Paul dwelt two whole years in his own hired house, preaching the kingdom of God." Acts xxviii., 30, 31.

These proofs are sufficient to show that the gospel always pertains to the kingdom. Then, to apply the gospel to any thing else than the kingdom to which it belongs, is as manifest a perversion of its spirit, and purpose, as it would be a perversion to apply the history of one man or one government to anything else than the one man, or the one government to which it belongs.

THE GOSPEL OF WHAT KINGDOM?

It is the gospel of the kingdom which is promised to the saints. "As my father hath appointed unto me a kingdom, so I appoint unto you a kingdom." Luke xxii, 29. "Fear not little flock, for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." Luke xii., 32. "Hearken my beloved brethren, hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him." James ii., 5. The kingdom which is thus promised to the saints, is the kingdom to which the gospel refers. If we can learn what kingdom is promised to the saints, we shall know the kingdom of which we have good news.

WHAT KINGDOM IS PROMISED?

The kingdom promised to the saints, is the kingdom prepared when the world was made Come ye blessed of my Father inherit the kingdom. What kingdom? The kingdom set up at the Day of Pentecost? No. The kingdom which is the church? No. The kingdom set up in the heart? No. The kingbom in heaven? No. What kingdom then? The Saviour said it was the kingdom prepared for you, from the foundation of the world. It is not, then, a kingdom which is to be prepared in the future, but one that was prepared long ago. It is not a new kingdom which is promised, but an old one, one that has been in existence since the world was made. In the beginning God prepared the kingdom. He prepared the earth for the territory, He made man to be the subject, and He gave to the man the law of the kingdom, and God himself was the Supreme Ruler. Thus, the kingdom was prepared, which is promised to the saints. It is the Kingdom which is under the whole heaven, and over all people, nations, and languages.

The gospel is the good news concerning this kingdom, and of which the saints are now the heirs. This is the kingdom God appointed to Christ, and Christ to his people. To illustrate: I promise to give to my son the watch that was made five hundred years ago, when he shall become twenty-one years of age. Two things are necessary in order to fulfil the promise. 1. It must be the same watch. 2. It must be in existence at the maturity of the promise. So the kingdom promised to the saints must be the kingdom prepared when the world was made, and it must be in existence when the saints receive it.

WHAT WILL BE THE CONDITION OF THE KINGDOM JUST BEFORE IT IS GIVEN TO THE SAINTS.

It will be in rebellion. "The Son of man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity." Matt. xiii., 41. There will be in the kingdom things that offend, and them that do iniquity. "For he must reign until he hath put all enemies under his feet. And when all things shall be subdued unto him, then shall the Son also himself be subject unto him that put all things under him, that God may be all in all." 1 Cor., xv., 25, 28. There will be in the kingdom enemies, and things which need to be subdued. "And there was given him (that came with the clouds of heaven) dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him." These people, nations, and languages will not serve him before the kingdom is given to him. "But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom." The kingdom will be in such a condition of rebellion that the saints will have to take it by force. "I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them, until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High, and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom." Dan. vii., 14, 18, 21, 22. There will be a power in the kingdom that will prevail against the saints until it is given to them. "Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." Acts iii., 21. Every thing, and every condition of things which the prophets have said shall be restored in the times of restitution, will be in the kingdom, until the saints inherit it. The proofs I have here presented are sufficient to show that there will be in the kingdom, which is to be given to the saints, until, and at the time it is given to them, things that offend, and them that do iniquity, enemies and things that need to be subdued, in short, the kingdom will be in rebellion and a power (subordinate) will prevail against the saints until the time come that the saints possess the kingdom. It will be in such a condition that it will need the gospel to subdue the rebellion and restore it to loyalty.

HOW WILL THE GOSPEL AFFECT THE KINGDOM?

It will gather out of the kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity. It It will put down all enemies, and subdue all things unto God. It will secure the loyalty of all people, nations, and languages. It will enable the saints to take the kingdom and possess it forever. It will destroy the power that now prevails against the saints. It will restore all the things which God hath spoken by the prophets. The nations which now learn war, will learn war no more. The inhabitants who now complain of sickness, will complain of sickness no more. The gospel will so affect the kingdom that the will of God will be done in it as it is done in heaven.

WHAT RELATION DOES THE GOSPEL SUSTAIN TO THE KINGDOM?

It is remedial or restorative. It does not propose to change the arrangement God made when he prepared the kingdom, or to supersede it. But it gives assurance that the rebellion shall be put down, and loyalty restored, so that every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father. It is, to the kingdom which is now in rebellion, what the physician is to the sick man. It restores to health. As the laws of life and health do not change, or cease to have jurisdiction over those who transgress them, so the law of the kingdom does not change, or cease to have jurisdiction over its subjects, whether they are loyal or disloyal. The gospel proposes to pardon the sinner on such terms as will honor the law, that he may become loyal. The kingdom to which the gospel relates, comprehends the arrangement which God made for it when he made the world. The gospel comprehends all the means by which a complete reconciliation to God's plan of the kingdom can be secured. Thus we have the scope of God's purpose, as revealed in the gospel of the kingdom. The kingdom is the one prepared when the world was made, which is now in rebellion, and which needs to be restored. The gospel is the instrumentality by which it is to be restored.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

The Wisdom of Christian Faith.

IN September, 1860, the writer was walking, morning and evening, beneath the magnificent trees of the University of Bonn, on the banks of the Rhine. The leaves were beginning to fade and fall; and hard by, Mr. Bunsen, who had long occupied the highest positions in the diplomacy of Europe, and at the same time in literary and theological labors, was slowly declining to the grave, and a few days after was borne by his sons to his burial. In his last waning days of life, he said: "In spite of all my failings and imperfections, I have desired, I have sought, what is noble here below. But my richest experience is in having known Jesus Christ. How good it is to contemplate life from this elevation. This is the Kingdom of God. O my God, how beautiful are Thy tabernacles!" As his attention was directed to the beautiful sunset, "Yes," said he in English, "that is beautiful; the love of God is everything." "May God bless you," he added, in French. "Let us depart in Jesus Christ;" afterwards, in Latin Christus recognoscitur victor: Christus est, est Chrestius victor; and then in German, "Christ must become all in all. I desire nothing theatrical; but I wish to say a few words in the midst of my children and friends. I am going to die, and I long to die. I offer my blessing, the blessing of an old man, to any one that desires it. To belong to a church or denomination is nothing. I see clearly that we are all sinners. We are safe only as we are in Jesus Christ. All the rest is nothing—nothing."

So life ebbed away in a loving, peaceful trust. This is the whole. The life which we now live is by faith in the Son of God. What the Centurion had not, we have; the positive assurance and promise of the Redeemer. This has been verified by ages of human experience. Every man who has died in peace looking unto Jesus, is an irrefutable argument for the wisdom of faith. We know enough, we believe enough, concerning the Lord Jesus Christ, to warrant our implicit confidence. Let not the faith of a heathen soldier put us to shame. The simpler our trust in Christ for all things, the surer is our peace. There is a firm substance for the hand to grasp. Lay hold upon it and turn your eye to Jesus Christ, and find repose by the confession of your confidence in Him—From Conversations of Jesus Christ recently published.—REV. W. ADAMS, D. D.

Geological Discoveries at Rome.

WE give the following from a correspondent of the N. Y. World, dated at Rome, May 28th. It will interest some of our readers:

Some very interesting geological discoveries have been much discussed here lately. Without venturing into abstruse details of the science, I may give here a resume of what I learned the other day from an antiquarian friend here much given to the study of the antique world. Till lately it was taken for granted that the volcanoes of this part of Italy had ceased to exist before it was inhabited by man. Rome and its neighborhood, extending in some directions to a radius of twenty miles, is one great incrustation of lava, with above it a greater or lesser depth of vegetable soil.

Portions of the lava are of the basalt character, once having been in a state of fusion, and now the hardest of stone. Other parts were lapilli, or cinders, equally bearing marks of the action of fire; but they were ejected from craters and became consolidated by water and other agencies into a softer stone, tufa or peperino. This crust has often been pierced, but nothing was discovered beneath to show that the original soil had been inhabited by the human race before it received its uppermost volcanic stratum. Now, there is evidence, the proofs of which are multiplying daily, that this country was peopled before the activity of the subterranean fires had been quenched on the surface. It is even a question whether the latest eruptions should be thrown back to the pre-historic period, and not rather assigned to the times of the early kings of Rome, or at farthest to the time of Alla Longa. I hope to return to this interesting subject, but at present will content myself by mentioning a discovery made near Marino, a village, it may be remembered, that lies between Albano and Frascati, some fifteen miles distant from Rome. Under the lava, which was broken up for the cultivation of vines, was found a hut of not very elegant masonry, with vases ranged on ledges round the walls. Some of these vessels were of a rude description; others really beautiful in form, bearing marks of the Etruscan type. On the floor lay a skeleton, judged to be that of an old man. Archeologists suppose that, unable to flee from some sudden eruption, he was enveloped in the destruction of all around him, and thus met with a fate very similar to that of the elder Pliny on Vesuvius.

FRUITS OF THE HOLY LAND.—For many miles around Joppa the plain of Sharon is a vast and beautiful garden, yielding the most delicious oranges, lemons, plums, quinces, apricots and bananas. In the Vale of Eschol and on the Heights of Urtas are produced the finest grapes in the world, while around all the larger towns of Philistia, and in the environs of Hebron, Bethlehem, Jerusalem and Gideon, are the largest and richest olive groves, fig and almond orchards in the East.

The olive serves for food and furnishes a delicious oil, which is a substitute for lard and butter, and is employed in making soap and candles, and in lubricating machinery.

There are also cultivated, in all their deliciousness, apples, pears, dates, cherries, almonds, pistachios, and walnuts.—From Dan to Beersheba, by Rev. J. P. Newman, D. D.

THE DEVIL DRIVING HOGS.—But perhaps the most extraordinary use ever made of proverbs in the pulpit was in a sermon preached and printed by one Mr. Burgess, on the devils entering into the herd of swine. He entitled it "The Devil driving and drowning his Hogs;" and he divided his discourse into three heads, "insomuch as," he remarks, "the devil here verified these old English proverbs." 1. "The devil will play at small game, rather than none at all;" 2. "They run fast, whom the devil drives;" 3. "The devil brings his hogs to a fine market." And in spite of—or even, it may be, in consequence of—this more than homely illustration, those who have read the sermon pronounce it to have been not ill-adapted to impress a rude and uncritical audience.

THE sin you now tremble at, if left to yourself, you will commit therefore, be humble, prayerful, and watchful.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made near fourteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument, First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE DIVINE PLAN:

AN ADDRESS TO THE ADVENT-CHRISTIANS OF AMERICA.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

WE are living in strange times. Perils, momentous in their character, are the marked features of our age—perils which cause the nations to tremble with perplexity, and men's hearts to fail them for fear and for "looking after those things which are coming on the earth." But the portraiture of this state of things was long since drawn by the inspired penman, giving us timely admonition of the dangerous waters into which we should drift just prior to reaching the eternal portals of glory. All the strange peculiarities, which should mark the "last days," have been witnessed by this generation, and the world, in its onward, wicked career, has only added to its perplexity in attempting to solve the problem, "What are we coming to?" But the Christian mariner, with his eyes fixed upon that "light"—whereunto we "do well to take heed," 2 Pet. i., 19—clearly recognizes, in all the peculiarities of this age, the unmistakable evidence of our Messiah's return, in regal majesty, as the promised heir to David's throne.

Though this age is full of signs, betokening the Lord's speedy return, yet, undoubtedly, no evidence is so conclusive as the increasing tide of infidelity, which already bids fair to encircle the world in its unhallowed influence. The "last days" have surely come, when "men will not endure sound doctrine," but "turn away their ears from the truth," and are "turned unto fables." 2 Tim., iv.

The nominal church is, in a measure, responsible for this increase of infidelity. By a system of theology the character of God has been presented as one of such inhuman cruelty that reasoning minds, in this age of abounding light and knowledge, in numerous instances, become sceptical, and finally reject both God and the Bible. This is but the legitimate result of a system of interpretation which has destroyed the harmony of revelation, and completely obliterated the primitive hope of the church. To remedy this growing evil we believe nothing can be more effective than correct knowledge of the great truths of revelation.

The importance of correct knowledge must appear from the fact that doctrinal knowledge is the foundation of the Christian religion. All love to God, to Christ, and to man, arises from something taught in the Bible, and which is believed respecting those persons. Every exercise of humility and repentence arises from faith in the words of inspiration. Every degree of Christian zeal and devotion is kindled up in view of the sublime truth of revelation, respecting Christ, the plan of redemption, and the kingdom which lies beyond.

Again, all Christian duties arise from some doctrine taught in the pages of inspiration. The duty of loving God is based on the doctrine that He is good; and because He is the best of all beings, it becomes our duty to love Him supremely. Any doctrine which presents God in any other light than that of supreme goodness makes it impossible to love Him with the whole heart.

"GOD IS LOVE," is the supreme doctrine of revelation, standing forth, in golden letters of divinity, for man's consideration. This doctrine is like the attractive power of the magnet; that power which draws man to the service of Jehovah, and unites the heavenly creatures in holy adoration and praise of that Being whose whole nature is one of compassion and love. The impress of love is stamped upon all He does. It is love that puts into operation those great principles of recovering grace, to perfect His eternal glory, and preserve the peace and harmony of the restituted world throughout the ceaseless ages of eternity. Then God's will shall be "done on earth as it is done in heaven."

"God is love." On this doctrine there can be no doubtful disputation. When we lose sight of this great polar star, around which all the doctrines of revelation revolve in perfect unison, we are in a dangerous position, and are liable to drift into the whirlpool of destruction. To reject this is to reject God, for "God is love." To maintain any theory, or interpret any portion of revelation not in harmony with this sublime doctrine is to throw the whole system of revealed truth into confusion, and leave us on the broad ocean of life like a vessel on the deep, turbulent waters of the king of seas. No consideration from whatever source it may come, must be allowed to divert our minds from this grand beacon light of truth, while investigating any portion of the Scriptures.

Without the application, to the pages of revelation, of this divine principle thus set before the world, all is darkness and uncertainty. This, in fact, is the key which unlocks the words of life to a perishing world, and unfolds to view the beautiful harmony into which justice and love are blended in the character of Deity.

We venture to affirm, without fear of successful contradiction, that all God does, in dealing with the human family, is through love—that His purposes are based upon this attribute of His character. God works for a purpose. In all He does is connected some wise and holy design. And everything in the great work of redemption is being done according to the plan, or purpose of Jehovah, formed "before the foundation of the world." The revelation made to man is the manifestation of His purposes, and the surety of their full accomplishment is based upon the decrees which His Almighty power is committed to execute.

God had a purpose in the creation of the world. It was created for His abode, and, as a work of his own hands, was designed to glorify his holy name throughout eternity. But His purpose reached beyond this. His holy mind also conceived the creation of intelligent beings to have "dominion" over it, with whom He should dwell. Thus He contemplated a glorious purpose to bring forth visible praise from matter, which revelation shows will ye be fully accomplished through the restitution, when evil shall finally be exterminated, and His "tabernacle" shall be established "with men, and he shall dwell with them, and they shall be his people." Rev. xxi., 3.

The Scriptures present God as a being of foreknowledge. But that "such foreknowledge is equivalent to so many decrees," as some maintain, we emphatically deny. To avoid the fatal conclusion that "whatever is, is right," does not involve the necessity of denying God's foreknowledge; and, indeed, to take the opposite extreme, and maintain that His foreknowledge extends to all events, both great and small, would be equally unreasonable and untrue. To merely sustain the Bible view of the foreknowledge of God, we need only contend that His foreknowledge embraced a certain plan for the accomplishment of a desired work.

All the parts of God's plan, according to His foreknowledge, were formed "before the foundation of the world," and thus, in the beginning, He surveyed the glorious result to be obtained. God's plan and purposes may be considered as a whole, and yet be considered in parts, but have one aim, viz: to bring about His eternal glory by effecting a union of His creatures, "both which are in heaven and which are upon earth," and thus make this earth the grand centres from which should arise, in heavenly harmony, never-ending praise in exaltation of His name. The divine plan, to effect this glorions condition of things, may be considered in two divisions. First, His original plan, which was put in operation in the Adamic dispensation; and Second, His redemptive plan, put in operation after the introduction of evil into the world by the transgression of Adam. The Redemptive plan was formed only to be put into operation, in case of the introduction of evil into His newly-created universe to prevent the failure of His purpose in the creation of the world. This plan, centering in Christ—the promised "Seed"—contemplates the eternal destruction of evil, and offers eternal life to the dying, perishing posterity of Adam; that whosoever believeth on Christ "should not perish, but have everlasting life."

Again, God's eternal glory and the unending happiness of His creatures depend upon perfect harmony in His vast universe. To secure this desirable end, the loyalty of intelligent accountable beings must be tested, which involved the necessity of creating man as a free moral agent, with the capability of developing a moral character that should decide his eternal destiny. God foresaw the possibility of the introduction of evil, which this condition of man involved, and that His purpose in the creation of the world shall not fail, He forms the redemptive plan. Though man should prove a rebel to his Creator, fall from his exalted position, and thereby bring the world under the blighting effects of sin, yet God's original design shall not fail, for "the Seed of the woman shall bruise the Serpent's head." Thus we see that one principal aim of the redemptive plan is to bring about that long-prayed for period when God's will shall "be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

In this hasty review of God's purposes, we may readily comprehend the responsible position of Adam when placed on trial for an immortal existence. And the important question also presents itself for our careful consideration, viz: What was the nature of the Adamic law? Adam, as an absolute mortal being, created in "the image of God," was placed under a law—on trial—and immortality, by being permitted to partake of "the Tree of Life," was to be the gift bestowed upon him, provided he proved loyal to God's righteous law. The Adamic law was positive in its nature. There was no possible way set before him whereby he might escape the infliction of that penalty after he had committed his act of disobedience. The very moment he rebelled against God the decision stood recorded in the court of heaven, "Thou shalt surely die!" There was no escape possible. In due time the decision was executed, and Adam returned to the dust from whence he was taken; and there the Scriptures leave him in eternal oblivion. Now the question arises: Are we under the Adamic law? If the posterity of Adam were never under this law, they cannot suffer its penalty, according to the principles of justice. In looking at the operation of this law it is clear that if Adam's posterity had come under it there would have been no future life for any; and thus would God's purpose in the creation of the world have failed. But though they possess a nature, by creation, subject to death, yet they have a remedy set before them that was not within Adam's grasp. They are placed under a system of grace, looking to their recovery from the curse of sin. Through Christ, the Second Adam, and only through Him, they are offered a way of escape from the eternal state of hopeless darkness to which Adam was consigned. By the infinite love and mercy of God we are placed under a gracious plan, which offers a future life to man through Jesus Christ, the LIFE-GIVER—who, according to the decree of God, came in due time to bring "Life and immortality to light," which is the gospel tidings. "God sent not his only begotten Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might be saved." This plainly and emphatically shows that through Christ a way was opened, making it possible for all to be saved, by complying with the conditions. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not shall NOT SEE LIFE, but the wrath of God abideth on him." John iii., 36. Here is a positive declaration, from the lips of Jesus, that by unbelief some would remain under the abiding wrath of God—i. e., they "shall not see life." This is quite in harmony with Solomon when he declares that "the man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi., 16. "They shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and not wake, saith the King, whose name is the Lord of Hosts." Jer. li., 57.

Many greatly mistake the inspired word in supposing that the penalty for the Adamic transgression simply conferred on him "a dying nature." This cannot be true, for he never possessed any but a nature subject to death, and the sentence deprived him of the possibility of obtaining any other. He was created mortal, and without he obtained immortality would die as a natural consequence. The Adamic penalty was an eternal state of non-existence—death in the fullest sense. As a penalty of the same nature for disobedience is in force under the redemptive plan, the righteous can in no way suffer this penalty by a temporary confinement in the grave. "The wages of sin" is not dying, nor temporary death, but one eternal, unbroken condition. One class enters the land of darkness and silence with a bright "hope of Life"—the "incorruptible seed" dwelling in them, by which He who has conquered death will bring them forth, by the production of a new life—spiritual and eternal; the other class go down into the state of death "without hope"—"like the beasts that perish," and "shall never see light." Psa. xliv., 12, 14, 19. Hence they enter a state as hopeless regarding a future life as that to which Adam was consigned—an eternal state of darkness.

BY ELDER WM. S. CAMPBELL.

EXODUS xxviii., 15: Thou shalt make the breastplate of Judgment with cunning work. The 29th verse: And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel in the breastplate of judgment upon his heart, when he goeth into the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually. The 30th verse: thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urin and the Thummin; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord; and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually.

I have presented this quotation from the ordinances of the law, exhibiting the very life power of the Aaronic priesthood, which was the ruling force of the law, to enable me to show that the language of Paul, Heb. ix., 27, 28, refers altogether to Christ as our High Priest, as compared with the priests who were "men" and "not suffered to continue by reason of death." The high priest went in "once," every year, into the Holy Place, and was appointed to die once a year. The year being the time within which sin might continue, and for which the atonement should be made, but they offered the sacrifice of atonement year by year, continually; consequently a year was the term. The going once, then, was to make an offering or end of sins for the term specified. The judgment had a longer term; i. e., "continually;" for "Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually. Hence, after his going in would the judgment be in force; and as he went in once a year the judgment would continue from year to year.

Again, as the High Priest was appointed to die (if God did not spare him, by special grace) once each year, and as men were appointed to this office, "it was appointed [in the law] unto man [High Priest] once to die, and after this the judgment."

It is easy to see that the apostle in his argument presents Christ as our High Priest; and by the contract between the earthly and the heavenly shows the blessedness of Christ and his plan. The priesthood, in any case, is before the law; and of necessity must employ the law as a means of effecting the benefits which it brings to mankind; hence, Paul says, "For the priesthood being changed, there must, of necessity, be a change in the law."

The Priesthood first; the law second. So there was a great priesthood before there was any law. So in the law of Moses, as soon as the priesthood could come into view, it appears, then takes entire direction of the law. Then in the divine economy, which is arbitrary in the selection of plans, agents, means. The Divine priesthood is before the law of God. So it is after the law. For Christ, in the Melchisidec order, which was before, "abideth a priest continually;" and shall bear the judgment: "He shall bear the glory." He does not come and go like the Aaronic order, but was a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world, as a priest over the house of God, in all time. "Having obtained eternal redemption for us."

The apostle in this argument in Hebrews has shown the death of the High Priest upon the annual once (Atonement); and from this shows the benefit of Christ's going into the Holy place (heavenly) not made with hands upon the eternal once (Atonement)—"once and forever"—which under the figure of pacifying with blood, should be sanctified with better sacrifices than any that the High Priest, under the law could offer.

Now, Paul says that as the men were appointed to die, so Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many. If this refers to the death of men, generally, Christ would be a sinner and under penalty; with thy judgment to follow upon him then he could not die for us. If he were not under penalty, but in a misfortune, then he did not suffer death as a misfortune, in our behalf; for they committed a great crime in killing him. He died a violent death. Now in either case, his death could do nothing for the dying and dead sinners. But if he was offered up a sacrifice to bear the "judgment," and provide for man's life, by obtaining victory over death, as well as to bring the true blood of atonement before God, I can see some sense in it. So can you. Christ's death a misfortune! Nonsense. He was made a curse for us.

The judgment in Aaron: the blessing in Christ.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, June, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Having carefully read and pondered the HERALD OF LIFE for June 16th, I find many things to encourage us in the way, and much to increase our faith in the living truth of No life out of Christ.

On the article "The Value of Brains," I would say, I learned the benefit of perseverance, especially in our investigation of truth. Since taking up my pen, I have realized that the brain is the thinking part, for my head is full of dulness and pain, and I can hardly shape my thoughts; But I can bless God that He gave me brains, that I might think on my ways, and turn to the Lord. I hate vain thoughts, but God's law do I love. On "Quite-too Wise," I thought to what straits a man must be driven to support his theory, to fearlessly add to, and take from God's word. Oh may God forgive, and grant repentance unto the man that first took up his pen, and used his brain to think up the plan of a mortal resurrection for all; to go against the living truth of No life out of Christ. I feel like Job to say, "How forcible are right words! but what doth their arguing prove?" It proves to me that they are altogether vanity; that they are but flesh, a wind that passeth away and cometh not again; no, never; they are of the earth earthly. God bless the writer of the article.

O how reviving and comforting the article by Richard Newton on Math. xxiv., 29, 30. I never saw the signs of Christ's coming so plain before; i. e., in some points. Surely there must be a lifting up of Gentile rule from off the land of promise before all the signs are fulfilled. And it must be in the generation that see the signs, else why say to the believing ones, in that generation, "When ye see these things begin to come to pass; then lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh." Bless the Lord, the signs that have transpired so far, have lifted up my head above God's enemies, and my enemies round about; and I feel that it is drawing nigh.

When I read in the papers the aggressive power of Rome, and her stealthy advance, I feel alarmed; but when I turn to God's word I am comforted. I more fear Spiritism, for there is a power, or an antichrist to arise that shall deny both the Father and the Son, and that Rome has never done. While writing I think with sorrow on the abundant harvest that has sprung up from seed sown by the Protestant, and Romish churches; and "What a man soweth that shall he also reap." But, woe, woe, woe, woe, to the reapers. O these organized bodies! God grant that we may all and altogether come out from among them, that we be not partakers of their sins, that we receive not of their plagues.

I thought when I began that I would touch upon every article in the paper in this one short letter, but I must give it up. I would say my trust in God was strengthened while reading, "I think God hears when we scrape the bottom of the barrel." May God bless all the trusting ones, that the meal in the barrel may not fail. O may God turn our eyes from beholding vanities, and when the pride of the eye arises, may He help us to keep our eyes shut. May He clothe us with humility as with a garment.

I praise the Lord that He enabled Br. Matthias to write the article, "The Old Testament the Arbiter of Doctrines." O how it rejoiced my heart. It brought to my mind the challenge that I once had to produce one passage from the Old Testament that spoke of the first and second coming of Christ. I hope that many will read the article, and then search the Old Testament and see if they can find a "Thus saith the Lord" for the resurrection of the wicked, or the second death as a penalty. Yes, the second death in any shape. I prize the article, "Sectarianism." We should try and make our life of faith so attractive and lovely, that it would win sinners to Christ. I feel "There is no power in the gospel when God's people deny it in their lives." We mock the poor sinner, he sees nothing in us to desire.

How timely the article, "Consecration to Christ." I have been trying to feel lately the relation to Christ, as that of a wife to a husband; God grant that I may be wholly consecrated to Him. That I may look, and watch, and wait for His return from heaven, and be ready to go in to the marriage supper of the Lamb.

I have for many years believed that the throne of David was on Mount Zion, and that Christ, according to promise, shall take the throne of His father David, and reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of His kingdom there shall be no end. God's purposes are ripening fast; what puny arm dare raise up against God's plan that is pressing on to the consummation? Especially when the power that moves it is eternal, and will eventually purge His universe of sin and sinners. May He grant us all humility, to walk softly before Him.

How good it seemed to read the name of F. G. Brown the old pilgrim once more in the HERALD. How I have read his "Entire Consecration;" yes, read it with profit. It brought to my mind the years of long ago; when we first looked for the dear Redeemer; then my experience was something like his. O what oneness of spirit then existed among God's children, and I have never read that name since but I felt in some measure the same oneness of spirit. O my faith is strong to day, that there is many, yes, many a monument of God's mercy scattered through the land. He has set them here as lights, as the salt of the earth. How can two walk together, except they be agreed? O let us have the mind of Christ, and then we shall walk in Him.

May God bless Br. E. Wolcott in his undertaking, and from his Tent may be sounded out the words of Life, and may many be made wise unto salvation.

When we look at inconsistency, may we truly feel that consistency is a jewel. O may God give us the faith that works by love, and purifies the heart, and overcomes the world, and that has roots that is rooted in Christ, that all the floods of ungodly men, and the political winds that are now striving upon the great sea, shall never be able to tear from its mooring.

Now may the Great Head of the Church, who has all power in heaven and in earth, make us all earnest Christians, always triumphing Christ, both in this age, and that which is to come. And may God bless all the faithful brethren and sisters that write for the HERALD those stirring epistles, and all of His dear children scattered through the earth; and may Christ be so attractive to us that we may love Him with a pure heart fervently.

I wish Br. Storrs, Br. Grimm, Br. Spencer, or any of the competent brethren, would write an article for the HERALD on the first epistle of Paul to Timothy, third chapter, the first six verses, especially the sixth verse.

Your Sister in the bonds of the gospel.

A QUICKENING AMONG FRIENDS.

A CORRESPONDENT of the "Cincinnati Gazette," writing from Richmond, Ind., under date of June 14th, gives an account of a revival among the Society of Friends, which is quite interesting. He says:

The Friends ("Quakers") have, as you know, birthright membership, which makes them nominal Christians from the time they are born. But this revival in the Friend's Church has convinced them and others, who never thought of it before, that nominal Christianity is quite a different thing from actual Christianity, founded upon conversion.

The revival among the Friends began in their evening prayer-meetings, held during the week, a thing for them entirely novel.

At these prayer-meetings no one is called upon to pray, or lead in prayer, but the time is occupied with voluntary prayer, alternating with short remarks, experiences, exhortations, &c., from those who have recently been converted, who are exhorted by the leader, the earnest Chas. F. Coffin, to "tell the meeting what Jesus has done for them." This goes on with marked effect till 10 P. M., when the audience is notified that some time will now be spent in earnest, solemn prayer, and such as do not wish to remain during the prayers "may now have an opportunity to retire." Those who desire the prayers of the congregation are then requested to come forward and kneel. For several evenings, recently, the invitation for coming forward was a signal, sufficient to fill the aisles with a crowd of young ladies and young men rushing forward to be prayed for.

Thus the conversion of most of their own members never before converted has been effected, while many of the most prominent citizens, some of the most intelligent men and the most fashionable ladies have been converted in this plain, earnest congregation of Quakers.

To see whole families coming forward, one after another, till finally the parents, the grown sons and daughters, and the younger children, may be seen kneeling, praying, weeping, whispering in one another's ears of Jesus, or shouting, and embracing one another in their joy, is a scene that has more effect on an unconverted person than a hundred cold sermons. When any one in the congregation feels inclined to sing, that one begins to sing, if nothing else is then in progress, and others join in. Thus singing is fairly and permanently introduced into this society that has "borne testimony against it" for so many decades. This old "society," as they call themselves, in some places almost fossilized, is here gloriously revivified, and again goes on rapidly adding to its membership as well as contributing its birthright members.

NOTE BY ED. OF HERALD OF LIFE.—Gospel religion is a very simple affair: an affair of the heart with God in Christ. The simple means employed by the Friends, in the above cause, look so like the work of the Spirit, that it gives us joy to record it.

"IT IS GOOD FOR US TO BE HERE."

ALTHOUGH we are assured that Peter knew not what he said, we may believe he knew why he said it. The Transfiguration itself was a glory such as no mortal eye before had seen; there were Moses and Elias, there were James and John; more than they, there was Jesus himself, the source of all light and knowledge and excellency, the consolation of Israel. And this, though so glorious, was but the foretaste of the greater glory that should follow, in the full fruition of heaven, when He should be set down at the right hand of the Father, with the holy angels. "And they spake of His decease which should be accomplished at Jerusalem." Wonderful topic, wonderful speakers, and wonderful indeed must have been the words there spoken. No marvel, then, that Peter, always impulsive, should have desired to make tabernacles, and there abide. And though it would have been neglecting his life-work, and the claims of God upon him, we cannot but admire his affectionate eagerness in thus acknowledging the wondrous beauty and blessedness of the scene; he only failed to remember, as Christ's followers often do, that strength is born of labor and conflict, not of rapture.

Here, too, how tenderly beautiful does the character of Christ appear, in His thoughtfulness for their frailty, when, being sore afraid, they had fallen on their faces. "He came and touched them, and said unto them, Arise, be not afraid;" the well-beloved Son, the Elder Brother, in one glorious person; and though not in "garments white and glistening" always, yet He is ever with His own, and "it is good for us to be here."

In the closet; with the preparation of heart, and words of the mouth which are from the Lord, is held that close and living communion with Him which brings heaven down to earth; where the victory that overcometh the world is gained; where grace for the trial, and strength for the temptation is found; "it is good for us to be here."

In the sterner conflict of life; battling valiantly for the right and the true in God's name and strength holding up the standard against the incoming tide of wrong and oppression, strengthening the weak, and cheering the desponding; "it is good for us to be here."

In the furnace; though it be heated seven times hotter than its wont, though the weak hands are stricken off from the human helps to which they clung so trustingly; if the bands that bound them are consumed, if the "form of the fourth" is seen, if that glorious promise is fulfilled, "I will be with thee in trouble," with the assurance from Him whose words fail not, that afterward it shall yield the peaceable fruits of righteousness, and work out a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory,—even then, in the deepest distress, "it is good for us to be here."—Selected.

Some of my Experience.

Holden, Me., June, 1869.

Br. Storrs: We often hear it remarked, that no one will ever be converted under the preaching of "No Life out of Christ."

I do not claim to have been converted by such preaching, but I do claim that I was converted or reclaimed under such preaching, and while studying to find out if these things were so. I made a profession of religion when a child, but for some years had been almost indifferent on the subject of religion. I read your first work on the resurrection, some years ago, but was not convinced of its truth. I confess, I hoped it was true, for I never expected to be saved: so, of course, did not desire a re-living. Last winter the same work was again placed in my hands, also H. L. Hastings' work to oppose it. I determined to give them an impartial reading, and did so, as far as was in my power, changing my mind as often as I did my books. I really thought I could not tell which had got the truth.

But when I got the Spirit of God in my heart, and could get down humbly on my knees, and beg of Him to lead me into truth, I believe He did so. Really my Bible seemed like a new book, and such a light broke in upon me. I received such evidence of its truth that I can but wonder how I could have been so blind before. Praise God for the truth of the Gospel. I have since been asked if I could not be made to believe it was the devil transforming himself into an angel of light? Answer: If we ask bread will He give us a stone? If we ask a fish will He give a serpent? "If ye ask and receive not, it is because you ask amiss." May God give us eyes to see, ears to hear, and hearts to receive the truth. And now, dear brethren and sisters in the Lord Jesus Christ, I thank the Lord that through His goodness and mercy, I have been led, even in these latter days, to embrace the truth as it is in Jesus; that I have learned to look for, and love the appearing of the Lord and Saviour. What peace in believing, what joy in the Holy Ghost. How glad I am that I have chosen rather to suffer afflictions with the children of God, than to enjoy the pleasure of sin for a season. Although there are many things in these last days, calculated to draw the mind away from God, yet we have an Advocate with the Father, an High Priest who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, who hath been tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin. O, how important that we should examine our hearts, and see to it that we have on the whole armor of God, taking the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God. The precious word of God, how sweet are the truths which it contains. We drink, and drink again, and yet we thirst for more. Truly the love of the truth is far above all sectarianism, or party spirit. When we open our hearts to receive the truth, we lay aside all prejudice, and our cry is, Give us the truth, Lord; no matter whether our friends believe it or no. I thank God that I was willing to receive the truth of No life out of Christ into my poor heart. What a joy I received when my heart it believed! what a heaven in Jesus' dear name! We meet with much opposition here; but this is God's truth, and it will triumph in the end. May God help us, with all the saints, to fight the good fight of faith, that we may obtain the crown that is promised to uch as love his appearing. E. R. O.

Life of Jefferson Davis, with a Secret History of the Southern Confederacy; Gathered "Behind the scenes in Richmond." By Edward A. Pollard, Author of "The Lost Cause," etc, etc. Published by the "National Publishing Company," 26 South Seventh street, Philadelphia.

We have previously noticed the "Advance Sheets" of this work, and have now received the whole. Mechanically, the work is well executed. It contains curious and extraordinary information of the principal Southern characters in the late war, in connection with President Davis, and in relation to the various intrigues of his administration; also a Photograph of Mr. Davis.

The work will be read with deep interest by all who wish information on the subjects of which it treats. It is strongly Southern in its leanings; but lays the blame of the failure of the Confederacy on Jefferson Davis.

The Publishers give notice that it will not be for sale at the book stores, but is sold by subscription only; they therefore desire an agent in every county. An excellent chance for active men, out of employment, as the work will doubtless have a large sale. The price is not stated.

THE HERALD OF LIFE

NEW YORK, JULY 14, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Curious Devil Logic.

A very singular piece of logic appeared in the "World's Crisis," of last week, to prove the existence of a personal spirit-devil. It is as follows:

No Devil—No Baptism—No Temptation.

"The record (Math. iii. and iv.,) tells us of the baptism and temptation of Jesus. In baptizing there must be a baptizer, one baptized, which together make up the baptism. "John the baptizer" did baptize. Jesus was here the one baptized, and that made out the baptism here recorded. So much is plain.

Thus "the temptation" embraces the tempter, the devil, satan. "The tempter came to him"—Jesus. . . . "Then the devil leaveth him, and behold, angels came and ministered unto him."

Note. If no devil, there was no "tempter." If no tempter, there could have been no temptation, nor one "tempted." Then, of course, the whole is as a Shaker's dream. And then the birth, baptism, burial and resurrection of Jesus, float off into the myths of mysticism, by the same boat.

All the parts must be consistent; all real, or all alike unreal. See Rev. xxii., 18, 19; Isa. viii., 20. Let no one "sacrifice to his own dross." J. B. Cook.

We have a high esteem for the piety and sincerity of Br. Cook. These two traits in his character are not to be called in question. His logic is of the head; not of the heart. It is therefore open to criticism. That the article was aimed at our position on the devil question, we know, because nearly the same language was used by this good brother to us, in what we supposed to be a private note, a short time before. The logic put in syllogistic form runs thus:

There was a water baptism and a temptation.

But there were neither, if there is no personal spirit-devil.

Therefore, there must be a personal spirit-devil.

Can any logician see how the conclusion follows from the premises? The major premise, in the syllogism, is a truth; but the truth of the minor premise is by no means a self-evident one, and is denied. The truth of the conclusion always depends on the truth of the major and minor premises. If either of these is doubtful, even, the conclusion may be an error. But if either is false, the conclusion is false. Take the following illustration of a correct and logical syllogism:

"All excess is sinful. All gluttony is excess; Therefore all gluttony is sinful."

Here the conclusion necessarily follows from the premises; there is no room for doubt and no evading it. But it is far otherwise in Br. Cook's premises and conclusion. His minor premise is erroneous on the face of it. Does any man believe "if there is no personal spirit-devil" there was neither "water baptism nor a temptation?"

We will now take a direct view of our brother's statements. In the case of the baptism of Jesus two persons were present, visible and tangible, and the element of water was equally so. Here was nothing to admit of a doubt as to what was done, and by whom. How about the temptation? Was there more than one person known to be present? If so, is that other person known to be a spirit-devil, "a fallen angel?" Is it true, "If no" personal spirit-"devil, there was no 'tempter?'" If so, will our brother tell us how this once "holy angel" ever became a devil? If he is a "fallen angel" he must have been "tempted," or fell without a "temptation." If he was tempted, there must have been a "tempter" before him, if our brother's logic would hold together. Hence, "If no devil, there was no tempter" leads back to a devil preceding the theological devil, and so to another back of that ad infinitum to a self-existent devil, or else to making God the first tempter. But James says, "God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man." James i., 13. Will our Br. say, God tempted a "holy angel," and thereby made a devil of him? But if not, who did tempt that angel? Where did temptation begin, and how did it begin? Our Br. says, "If no devil, there was no tempter."

But here is a "holy angel" changed into a wicked angel, as "orthodoxy" has it; and Br. C. is "orthodox" here, it seems. Pray let us into the secret of how temptation began, seeing it could not be without a tempter; for our Br. says, "If no tempter, there could have been no temptation, nor one tempted." So it would seem to follow that a "holy angel" sinned without a tempter, or there has been a line of devils from "all eternity," existing as long as God has, and consequently self-existent like God! Is our beloved Br. Cook prepared to rush on such a position? We do not believe he is, for he believes the devil is to be destroyed utterly, by-and-by. He once thought him immortal, and that sinners of the human race were also immortal, and would eternally dwell with this theological devil in the theological hell of torment; but some twenty-five years ago he waked up to the fact that such a hell was "a shaker's dream," or "heathen fable." Having abandoned that fable, it seems wonderful to us how he has clung so tenaciously to a personal spirit-devil, who was the lord of the theological hell. Br. C., it seems, is disposed to let the mythological devil live a while longer, notwithstanding he has abandoned the mythological hell. Alas, for the poor homeless devil; who can blame him for tempting people, seeing Br. C. and the rest of us have shown him to be without a habitation!

"If no tempter" (no personal spirit-devil), "there could have been no temptation, nor one tempted," says Br. C. Will our excellent Br. ask James if that is so? Let us hear him. "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust [desire], and enticed. Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin; and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." James i., 15.

Thus we have a Scriptural and easy solution of the process of temptation, and learn what the "tempter" is; and the personal spirit-devil is as useless and as nameless in James's theology as an immortal soul and endless torture. Sin ends in "death:" that is the Bible hell. The "tempter" is our natural desire, called "lusts," not because they are sinful of themselves; for every desire God has implanted in our nature is good in itself; and they were designed to be a source of pleasure and enjoyment; but they were to be controlled and regulated in harmony with God's will. Every one of them was given us to be inlets of pleasure and to be gratified in a lawful way, and in a temperate manner. When thus used and gratified, Godi s well pleased, and we should give him thanks for them all. Those desires are all strong, as well as sources of pleasure; and hence have need to be constantly watched lest we seek their gratification in an intemperate manner, or in a way that God has prohibited. All his prohibitions are the result of wisdom and love. He knows how and in what manner our highest happiness can be promoted, and has prohibited nothing but that which he knew would infringe on our highest enjoyment. For us to reject his counsel and overstep his directions and prohibitions, to seek the gratification of our desires, is being "drawn away" of our "own desires," or lusts: and when we have "conceived," suffered the thing to find a resting place in our minds, the next step is the act, which is "bringing forth sin:" this done, the result is "death."

Thus we have a plain, scriptural, rational and common-sense explanation of the process of temptation, and learn what the tempter is, and leave all the "Shaker's dreams" to fanciful minds, who have so long taught the doctrines of inherent immortality, eternal torments, going to heaven or hell at death, with an omnipresent fallen angel, who besets the mind of the little child in its mother's arms, and never leaves it till the day of its death, and whom men (who really believe in such an existence) fear more than God himself, and seem to do him homage with greater zeal.

As to our Lord Jesus' temptation in particular, we ask all to read our remarks on it in our tract on the "Devil, Satan, and Demons." We cannot give even a synopsis here. Please read and compare it with the Scriptures of truth. Remember, "He was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin." We often yield to temptation. He never did; no matter how strong it was. Do we, did any man ever talk with a personal spirit-devil? If not, why say Jesus did, when he was tempted like as we are? Holy angels often appeared unto men and women, and conversed with them face to face. Where in the Bible is any account of "fallen angels," theologically called "devils," ever appearing unto men in like manner? Where and when was this spirit-devil ever as manifest to human eyes as "John the Baptizer" was? Does water baptism stand on the truth or falsehood of the existence of this spirit-devil? If so, we do not wonder our Br. seems so fearful of losing him. "Let no one sacrifice to his own dross."

Our brother says of the baptism and temptation, "All the parts must be consistent; all real, or all alike unreal." Does he believe the spirit-devil really "took Jesus up and set him down on the pinnacle of the temple," just as he supposes "John the Baptizer" took hold of him and placed him in water? Was Jesus carried by this theological devil "into an exceeding high mountain;" and did this spirit-devil really "show Jesus all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them in a moment of time? Was this "all real?"

These are a few questions that arise out of our brother's extreme "all real or all alike unreal." He has made the "waters" so high and deep that "the birth, baptism, burial and resurrection of Jesus, float off . . . by the same boat." Truly, it is somewhat dangerous to have too much water in one's theory, lest it should, at its flood, sweep away the whole divine life of the gospel of God. Such sweeping statements do no credit to the gospel, and are well calculated to "float off" all respect for it.

If the Bible is not to be received as any other book of truth, i. e., facts sometimes illustrated or set forth by figures of speech, then we may despair of ever arriving at truth. When it is manifest that a literal construction of words is an absurdity, then some other construction must be used, or the account itself rejected. The idea that a personal spirit-devil—a fallen angel—did all the things spoken of in the account of our Lord's temptation, by his personal presence and power, is an absurdity too great for even the devil believer, Dr. Adam Clark, who has to admit some of the "representation must have been visionary," vi.z, the showing "all the kingdoms of the world" to Jesus; for, says Dr. Clarke, "The highest mountain on the face of the globe could not suffice to make evident even one hemisphere of the earth, and the other must of necessity be in darkness."—Note on Math. iv., 8.

The fact of Jesus' temptation and victory is what concerns us to know. The precise manner in which it was carried on is of no consequence farther than to know that he was "tempted in all points like as we are." The man who will examine the process of temptation in his own mind will have a better idea of the process of temptation in our Lord's case than any professional theologian can give him, while his mind is filled with the notion of "a fallen angel spirit-devil," who is omnipresent, whom no man ever did see, or hear speak; who is a "myth" of superstition, and who is the scape-goat on which is laid all the sins of men in the world, not excepting members of churches. All, alike, sin because of this fancy devil. If it had not been for him they would all be holy and harmless!

Methodists and Presbyterians Again.

A short time since we noticed the approach of these two bodies in "Words of Christian Salutation." We are rejoiced to see a spirit of brotherly love being cultivated between them; but let it be sincere and hearty. In the "Salutation" by the Methodists to the Old School Assembly of Presbyterians we find the following remarks:

Nor is this friendly greeting unnatural. It is true we differ in some points of doctrine, but we agree in many more. We agree in all the great essentials, we differ in a few non-essentials. Shall we make more of the non-essentials about which we differ than we do of the many essentials in which we agree? Thus we are one in regard to the great doctrine of the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, a vicarious atonement, total depravity, justification by faith alone, and future rewards and punishments. . . . . . .

The sons of John Wesley are happy to greet the sons of John Calvin, and bid them God-speed.

Here are some expressions remarkable in the mouths of Methodist ministers; especially when we consider the tenacity with which their early preachers in this country opposed the tenets of the "sons of John Calvin" in points which these "sons of John Wesley" now call "a few non-essentials." Contending for these "non-essentials" with untiring zeal was what made the Methodists a distinct and great people. If they are convinced their fathers in Methodism erred in that matter, it is noble in the sons to confess their mistake, and to treat the "sons of Calvin" as brothers. It is a good sign—a sign of progress, which leads us to hope they will yet see some other "non-essentials" in their creed, that may lead them to advances still more important. Nearly every one of their "great essentials" may need modifying, if not to be transferred to the class of human speculations as "non-essentials." Some of them have no higher authority than Synods, Councils, Conferences, or Popes; all fallible sources, and not binding on any man to receive on that account. We do not design to say which or how many of the points named by them as "essentials" are of mere human authority, or only partially true. It is enough to see that Methodist preachers have now abandoned much which in time past has been considered by their fathers essential, and which produced their ecclesiastical organization, as a separate body from the "sons of John Calvin."

It will be seen that the return of Christ from heaven and the resurrection of the dead are not named among the "great essentials," and we are left to conclude that these are "non-essentials" in their estimation. No wonder they should think so; for, if the saints go to heaven at death, where "there is fulness of joy" (Psa. xv., 11), why make Christ's return "from heaven" (Acts i., 11; Phil. iii., 20; and 1 Thess. iv., 16) an essential in their theology? That which both Christ and his Apostles made the great theme of their ministry, and to which all the prophets pointed as the consumation of all their hopes, has no place in "the great essentials" of modern Methodism and Presbyterianism! This looks like progress backward. But it is not strange. They have so long worshipped the great "Diana," inherent immortality, that the ripe fruit of it has at length fully appeared. There is no longer among them a "Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ" (Titus ii., 13,) to "change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto His glorious body" (Phil. iii., 21), but death is glorified, and made the deliverer of a fancied soul out of the vile body, to be carried up into heaven; and this, by some of them, is called "the coming of Christ!" Instead of "our vile body" being "changed" and "fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body," the coming of Christ "from heaven" is to take an immortal soul out of "our vile body" and leave that body corrupted forever; or, at least, it is "non-essential" when, if ever it is to be made like unto the body of Christ's glory.

If this is not "turning things upside down" (Isa. xxix., 16), who can tell us what is? One can hardly fail to think of the language of this prophecy of Isaiah, which runs thus:

"The Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes: the prophets and your rulers, the seers hath He covered: and the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot for it sealed: and the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I am not learned. Wherefore the Lord saith, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precepts of men: therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid. . . . Surely your turning things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter's clay," etc.

Surely this coming of Christ at death, and going to heaven at death, while the coming of "this same Jesus in like manner as" the apostles saw "him go into heaven" is ignored, or made only a "non-essential;" and virtually setting at naught the resurrection, or adding it to the "non-essentials," is "turning things upside down," and will yet be found to be "as the potter's clay." It has been manufactured out of the "precepts of men," that man has a soul-entity which is inherently immortal: that doctrine is not among the "non-essentials" of the theology of these days; and we wonder the Methodist Preachers did not make it No 1 in their "great essentials" in their "Salutation" to Presbyterians. Has the doctrine of immortality only by a resurrection "at the last day" so pervaded the Methodist body, as to make it dangerous to assert the inherent immortality of man? If so, we may look for a "Salutation," by-and-by, from the same body, though many of them have long fought us on the subject of Life future and eternal only in Christ, and by a resurrection from the dead, when "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv., 16–18.

How unlike the traditions of men as taught in these days by all the popular religionists; yet how easily understood when once the great Bible truth of man's entire mortality, by natural generation, is accepted, and immortality, is seen to be the gift of God in Christ at the resurrection.

"You are Immortal."

Our remarks on the Tract with the above head, in our last issue, are responded to by Br. Wm. R. Warner, North Cambridge, Mass., with a request to have them put into a tract: He says:

"I wish to have some of them for the officers of the Am. Tract Society. I believe it will set some of them to thinking; if they do not think, it will certainly set others to do it, and to search the Scriptures to see whether these things are so. If you will issue your remarks on that subject, in a tract, I will pay the expense."

We will do the best we can about getting out the desired tract. If we had time to devote to such work, and funds to carry it on, other tracts would be added to our list. Matter enough could be selected from the six volumes of the Herald of Life to make a hundred valuable tracts. Shall they be multiplied? It cannot be done without two things, viz., funds, and a person to attend to it.

Br. Warner adds, in a P. S.—"We are passing through the waters of deep affliction at the present time. Six of our dear children are down with the scarlet fever all together. The three youngest have the whooping cough terribly. Eight sick. We are pretty well worn with watching day and night for the last two weeks; but God's will must be done. It is always well to trust in the Almighty."

"Immortality of the Soul."

We have received from our Br. A. G. Hudson, Lake City, Minn., a sermon on the above subject, preached in that place by "Rev. W. B. Dada, before the Young Men's Christian Association:" also a "Review" of it by Br. Hudson. Let the two travel together. Mr. Dada's discourse is common-place and worn out assertions, not calculated to carry conviction to any thinking mind in search of truth. The Review disposes of the whole thoroughly, and the Life cause is likely to be furthered by the effort to arrest it by the above-named sermon. Silence is the safest course for believers in the notion of an immortal soul in man. Ventilating that idea in these days does not prosper only so far as it helps Spiritism and Pantheism, the doctrine is the root of both of those destroying errors.

The Gospel Echo,

Published at Macomb, Ill., a monthly of some 48 pages, armed with three editors, viz., J. C. Reynolds, J. H. Garrison, and E. L. Craig, is among our exchanges. Its issue for July has the following notice of our paper, by "J. H. G.," to which we shall respond by notes:

The Herald of Life,

Published by "The Life and Advent Union," at No. 87 Park Row, N. Y., and edited by George Storrs, comes to our office weekly. The mechanical execution of the paper is unexceptionable. Its matter relates almost exclusively to the peculiar views held by the Advents (or a party of them, at least), which they generalize under the phrase, "Life only in Christ." I presume they use the word "Life," to mean future existence. (1.) If I have not greatly misconceived, the phrase "eternal life," as used in the word of God, means more than eternal existence. (2.) I propose this query for the "Herald of Life" to answer:

Do the terms "life" and "death," as employed by inspired writers, always signify existence and non-existence? (3.)

The "Herald of Life" contains some good things, but much, we humbly conceive, to call attention from the great, practical truths of the gospel. (4.) Here is a proposition that is of great moment, that we can agree upon: Future happiness "only in Christ." (5.) If that is true, then how to get into Christ and live in him, are the great themes to discuss. (6.)

Response by the Editor.

(1.) We "mean" a future living existence. There is existence without life; but a future life embraces something more than mere existence.

(2.) Certainly it does. In that you are right, and we are agreed.

(3.) Those terms include these. There can be no life without existence: death is the extinction of life. It may or may not be attended with "non-existence," but it is the "non-existence" of life, because where death reigns life does not at the same time exist. All terms are sometimes used figuratively. Hence, sometimes life and death are in the Bible. But when used in the sense of reward or penalty, such construction is not allowable. In such cases, life means living a existence; and death is a non-living existence. What more is included in a future, living existence than life itself, is to be learned, not by the phrase "eternal life," but from the "great and precious promises" so fully presented in every part of the Bible. Yet without a future, living existence, none of those promises would ever be inherited by man. A future life, then, is the first and chief promise of God, and this insures all the rest. This is what we mean by "Life only in Christ;" it is only in him that this future life can be secured: "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son; he that hath the Son hath life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." 1 John v., 11, 12; and John saith, "He that believeth not God hath made him a liar, because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son." Verse 10.

Those who reject Christ as the Life-giver (the Syriac for Saviour), reject life, and give God the lie; and hence, "shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on them." John iii., 36. They have rejected him who is "the resurrection and the life," and closed up the only avenue into a living existence "out from among the dead;" while those who receive Christ as God's appointed medium into a future life, emerge from under death's dominion, or are "born from the dead," and "cannot die any more," and "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx., 36.

(4.) This is a matter of opinion. We think differently from the "Echo" on this point. We do not mean that we indorse all that correspondents say. We hold ourself responsible only for what we write or select.

(5.) "Future happiness" inevitably follows a future living existence, in our mind; so that we have no need to discuss that point. Christ saith, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you: whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day." John vi., 53, 54. A spiritual and living union with Christ is the only way to secure a future life; for this "eternal life is in God's Son," and is to be had only by faith in him to whom "God gave the Spirit not by measure" (see John iii., 34), and through whom, the same Spirit is imparted to those who believe in him; so that "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii., 11.

(6.) "The great themes to discuss, we think, are, first, to show men they are perishing—going out of life without a Bible hope of a future one; then show them that Christ is the only medium God has appointed whereby any soul of Adam's race can ever come into life again; and that if they refuse or neglect this heaven-appointed way, they will "utterly perish in their own corruption;" 2 Pet. ii., 12; that, rejecting God's medium of giving life, "like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them—. . . they are like the beasts that perish; they shall never see light." Psa. xlix.

Let these solemn truths be urged home on the hearts and consciences of men, and their dream of inherent immortality be broken, and if they are not awakened to see and feel their lost condition, and to hasten to Christ for life, their case is hopeless; and it may be said of them, as of some of old, "they are joined to their idols," and "let them alone." "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," said Jesus to the unbelieving Jews. So it is with many now.

Life.

BY ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

There is a new force in the position of Jesus Christ when we see that he gives the life that belongs to future; and, of consequence, the whole life to come depends upon the reception which we give to him and his truth.

This carping and caviling about life that is not life—life to come, that does not belong to the world to come—life after death, that is not a recovery from death, that is in death, that is death itself, in fact, because it is mortality; this living in Adam when there are no laws of life in him that can operate; life from Christ, which Christ can never give; life that is only given to men that they may suffer, that they may die; life given by one to die by another, or on account of another; all this contradictory nonsense is out of the question, if we look at the Saviour as we ought.

The whole complete condition for the future is in Christ alone; not in Adam at all. Hence "in him was life, and the life was the light of men." Now, this shows us plainly that by the light of the gospel we come to the life of Christ. The idea of Christ giving life in an arbitrary manner, without any faith before, is not taught in the book. "I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish." But what is this? and how is this? "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Now how will the sinner live who has no life in him? The Adamic life, about which they talk, and which is the opposite of Adamic death, as they talk, is exhausted—all gone. The men are dead. Now, how can he live again without some other life within? If of that they have none, then of life in the future they will have none.

Now, suppose the sinner could be made alive (no hope being found for his life in the gospel, as some admit), what kind of life would it be? It is not in Christ, for he says, he "that believeth shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." "He hath eternal life." The sinner does not believe. He is in damnation already. How can he live a life by Christ?

It is not in Adam, for the life that Adam had was in "his own likeness." That was to be born of a woman; never having lived before, not having died out of being, but this is a restored life—a life from the dead, a life by the Christ, if a life at all. But he cannot give such life. It does not belong to him; there has been no begetting.

It is not, hence, a mortal life, for mortality has existed, involving certain conditions and limitations, which have all been met in the living and dying of the man as a child of Adam. Now, this is a restoration to a life which, if it is capable of ceasing, is not mortal, because it overcomes the conditions and limitations of mortality. It is the overcoming of death, for the individual, at least, for it takes him out of it, if only for a moment. If after being in the dust the being of the man ever revives, it must be by more than mortal power; he cannot be re-begotten; he cannot restore himself; he cannot rise from his ashes. To have a mortal life, after being raised, it must result from mortal power. It is not by a power in Christ, with whom God has left this matter. Not with Adam, for he is gone. How then? The simple truth that Christ gives life to men—all life for the future, that any one can obtain—is the beauty of the inculcation.

Resurrection Faith.

"For what saith the Scripture? Abraham believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness." Rom. iv., 3. In every age God has given something to try the faith of the children of men. From Adam to Noah it was, "the seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head" A truth in the fewest possible words. None could know in what way, or by whom it was to be done. But God had said it, and that was enough to constitute an Abrahamic faith. To Noah was given the astonishing revelation that God would bring a flood of water upon the earth and destroy it. Well might the infidel philosopher have laughed in his sleeves, wondering where he would get water enough to cover so big a world to the tops of the mountains. But God had said it; Noah believed it; and his faith and works saved him.

Further down the stream of time, it was revealed of Sarah, when she was past age and barren, that she should have a son. As contrary to nature as the prediction might appear, she did not philosophize on the possibilities or impossibilities, but come at it in a shorter and easier way; as Paul tells us—"She judged him faithful who had promised." Heb. xi., 11.

Again it was revealed that a virgin should conceive and bear a Son. Another impossibility, says the scoffing philosopher. But He was still faithful who had promised, and in due time the promised Son was born. Again it is written, "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise," etc. That is, the Lord's dead men shall arise again to life. But there is no promise that the devil's dead men will ever rise to life. The Saviour also has said, "My sheep hear my voice, I give unto them eternal life, and I will raise them up at the last day." But there is no promise that he will, at any time, raise up the goats.

These things have been given to us from time to time to try our faith; not to try our ingenuity, to find out how, or by what means they are to be brought about. The want of true faith has been very prevalent in all ages of the world. Many at the present time pray earnestly for God to bless them, and claim the promise that he will hear and answer; but do not believe he will until they can see the horse and cart in which the blessing is to come.

All we need to do is to ask in faith, and leave God to use his own means in his own way, and we shall get a blessing whether we know by what means or not.

Just so of the resurrection of the dead. It is an astonishing thing, and has ever puzzled the brains of philosophers to find out how it is to be accomplished. All professed Christians pretend to believe it, but very few only when they think they have found out the way in which it will be brought about. One says, at death the immortal soul of the righteous escapes the body, its prison house, and goes to heaven, or some other good place, and the body returns to dust. And at the last day the soul returns to the earth, and knocks on the old grave, and calls out a spiritual body that never lived or died, and enters it. And this they call a resurrection of the dead; a union of two things that never died. This is their "horse and cart" which they will have to bring them the blessing.

Others say, all must be raised, the wicked souls brought forth from hell-torment to be judged, and sent back again, or punished more or less in proportion as they have sinned more or less, and then die again. Other some will have them all sprout up in a mortal state to be judged, the wicked to die again, and the righteous go up into immortality. This is their "horse and cart," in which is conveyed the most desirable blessing of the righteous. Take it away, and they have no faith in the resurrection. Some have the righteous and the wicked all come up at once; others a thousand years apart. Some will have the righteous come up out of the ground in a moment, all clothed with flesh and blood; and some say they will have no blood, but flesh and bones only; and no need there, of course, of heart, lungs, brains, veins or arteries. Others, a very few, throw up all these theories, and will have the righteous only born again, by a retrograde generation—"Instead of the fathers shall be the children."

And now what can we know about it? Nothing except what is revealed in the word of God. Therein it is clearly and distinctly stated by the Lord Jesus himself, "that he gives his sheep eternal life, and that he will raise them up at the last day; and those that are worthy to obtain the future world, and the resurrection of the dead, are equal unto the angels, and will die no more." Therefore, they are all righteous, and the first resurrection breath they breathe will be the breath of the eternal life, which Christ gives to his sheep, the immortal life-breath.

Let us throw away all vain speculations, and lay hold of the Abrahamic faith; with that and a few grains of common sense all is plain. The righteous dead will live again in immortal glory. This is plainly revealed, and easier believed than understood. The wicked will remain in the congregation of the dead, is as clearly revealed and as easily believed hy those of the Abrahamic faith. For one, I believe it because God says it.

And now when one tell his long yarn, how the dead are raised, and with what bodies do they come, tell him, he is a "fool," for Paul says so. For God gives to every seed its own body, which is sown in corruption, and the same that is sown, is raised in corruption. Not sprouted in mortality in the world to come, and then raised to immortality. We are all sprouted here in this world in mortality, and in the world to come the righteous sprouts will be launched into immortality by a resurrection from the dead.

The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, is taught in the Scriptures of divine truth, has ever been the most difficult thing to make men believe; because it is one of the most wonderful things revealed; and is the most distant from all human reasoning. Very few at the present day believe it without incumbering it with a great deal that does not belong to it. Strange to me that people of common sense, especially professed Christians, cannot be persuaded to believe God rather than man. But we are truly living in perilous times, when even the very elect are in danger of being deceived.

Little of anything yet is known of the modus operandi of the resurrection of the dead. The simple fact is clearly revealed: the righteous dead will be raised to an immortal life But there is no such revelation made of the wicked; therefore the true faith is to believe only what is revealed, whether we understand the mode or not.

I am aware that from the nature of the subject, there very naturally arises some variety of opinions. But these ought not to split up and divide the body of Christ. I admit that all true Christians have the one faith and the one hope, found in Acts xxvi., 6–8. This embraces the resurrection, and none has a right to say, you are not a Christian because you do not believe the mortal resurrection of all men. This looks too much like pulling out what we may ignorantly judge to be tares before the harvest. I do not like to judge any one: but I do not like the knock-down and dra-gout principle accompanying that which at most is but a mere matter of opinion. It cannot spring from a pure fountain. Such a spirit in the church has done much mischief, and brought many a worthy soul to the stake, and heads to the block.

May God grant that the time may soon come, when his watchmen may all see eye to eye; and the knowledge of the Lord cover the earth as the waters do the sea.

Brethren and sisters; we need to be more Christ-like, and less Adam like. I have known churches, one out here in particular, to die out for want of religion; starved to death, feeding on husks that the swine would not eat. If we cannot be one here in Christ, we cannot expect to be one in him in his kingdom. How can we pray "Thy kingdom come," when we despise one another for some difference, on some uncertain and unsettled opinion? Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly, and save thy people.

"We're Going Home."

"We're going home, we soon shall be
Where the sky is clear, and the soil is free—
Where the victor's song floats o'er the plain,
And the seraph's anthems blend with its strains,
Where the sun rolls down its brilliant flood
And beams on a world that is fair and good;
And stars that dimmed at nature's doom,
Will sparkle and dance in the New Earth's bloom;
Oh that beautiful home! Oh that beautiful home."

The sweet melody of these lines passed away in the evening stillness, when I first heard them, but the words, so comforting and so true, have ever since been ringing in my ears. Yes, we are going home! "Here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come." Heb. xii., 14.

We are glad that this world is not our home—for "we would not live always" in this carnal, sinful sphere. Who would like to think that our brightest hopes and fairest joys were already realized. Amid trials and temptations, when bereavement saddens and sin oppresses, it cheers the heart to feel that there is reserved for us "an inheritance, incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away." 1 Pet. i., 4. We think of this, and our hearts are glad.

"Going home!" This is the cheering motto of the Christian's life. He sighs and longs for home. The days grow long, as in weariness he waits and watches. On wings of hope the heart mounts far above the fleeting scenes of earth, and by faith grasps that "beautiful home" of rest, which is the perfection of all happiness. Often we meet the bereaved Christian from whose sky the sunshine has passed away, and he wanders in the clouds of gloom and sadness. The sweet buds of hope have withered in his presence, and briars have sprung up in his pathway. Hope has ceased to shed its radiance around him. But such should remember that blessed promise—"Weeping Mary endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Psa. xxx., 5. "Joy cometh!" Oh think of it! "There is fullness of joy in the presence of God." The night is far spent and the morning begins to dawn. Already its golden rays begin to stream upon the eastern sky. "Joy cometh!" But if you realize it not in the night of earth's groaning existence, you will; it is reserved for you in that home whither you are going. The pleasures of home will amply repay you for all the troubles, cares and temptations attendant upon your homeward journey. Then "shall God wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow or crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things have passed away." Rev. xxi., 4. What a glorious prospect! This ought to encourage all to be "patient in tribulation" Rom. xii., 12; for "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed in us." Rom. viii., 18. Christ is soon coming to be "glorified in his saints, and admired in all them that believes." 2 Thess. i., 10.

"Going home!" Let us comfort one another with these words, "When he who is our life shall appear, then shall we appear with him in glory." Col. iii., 4. In our happiest hours let us remember how insecure are life's fleeting joys, and let us ever consider that more perfect and purer pleasures are reserved for us in the future, when we shall be at home with Jesus. And the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." Isa. xxxv., 10.

Religious Monomaniacs.

Br. Storrs: To discover our own aberrations of mind or irregularity of life may wound our vanity or pride, if any such weakness or folly remain in us. But if we really love the truth and desire to be conformed to the image of Jesus Christ, or transformed in the renewing of our mind, and molded according to the transforming power of the grace of God that brings salvation, a discovery of any irregularity of mind or unholy temper, or improper conduct, either in ourselves or others, will create within us sorrow and pain very unlike those feelings that agitate and exasperate the heart of a vain and proud mortal.

There is a fund of weakness and imperfection in some best known to themselves, that grieves them sorely, and keeps them humble. They hate and abhor whatever is contrary to truth, and desire that freedom and liberty which truth imparts. They know that where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty; and that if the Son makes them free, they are free indeed. They dread not the reproach of the world, nor grieve because they are not highly esteemed. They desire not the applause or admiration of the world. They hate and abhor lying, and love the law of liberty. They love God—love one another—esteem others better than themselves; see more weaknesses and imperfections in themselves than they behold in others. They forgive injuries, and love their enemies. They have the Spirit of Christ, and desire daily to walk as he also walked. Self-denial is their daily employ; self-government according to the perfect law of liberty. They see in themselves no cause for self-laudation, but every thing that humbles them and makes them thankful for the grace given them to keep under subjection their body. Gratitude is one of the most delightful emotions they realize; it is the twin sister of love, enabling them to give all the glory to God.

How different are the views of others, whose love of praise and flattery are so prominent. It sticks out, or words out, or acts out, in almost all their acts. And flattery or commendation has on them effect, not unlike exhilarating gas, and when dosed out largely and unsparingly, will inevitably produce Monomania—religious monomania—arising from ignorance of self and ignorance of those Christian graces which exalt and dignify and make Christ-like—humility, meekness, gratitude, and a forgiving spirit. Take, for example, an individual who loves to be praised of men; let him possess great fluency of speech, and a memory so extraordinary that he can memorize one of Chalmer's sermons in two hours, and stow the cells of his memory with the treasure of other men's brains, and send him as a missionary, with some flattering commendations, and in a little while you will behold him a poor monomaniac, or something more painful to behold. Perhaps if he does not fall into some folly too gross to name, he will be an Egotist of the first water.

Will a few examples by way of illustration suffice to establish the above position? They may be found in the Bible. And the following are not irrelevant. W. A., years ago a wealthy man, supposed to be pious and devout, took it into his head he must preach; that a wo was pronounced on him if he did not preach the Gospel. The church of which he was a member granted him one hour to exercise his gift. This did not satisfy him. He wished to have a general permission to occupy the pulpit in twenty-eight churches. In a little while he was anxious to dispose of his surplus money (no small amount) by way of loan or trust, but exacted good security. None in all the country were good enough. He would not loan it to any one unless he gave Jesus Christ as security! The Lord appeared to him several times—gave him daily some new revelation; told him to loan money in no other way; and among the revelations he received were these: 1st, he (W. A.) was the real penitent thief that was crucified with Christ; 2d, he was actually the prodigal son; 3d, a prophet highly exalted, receiving daily and nightly messages from the Lord, who always appeared to him. Numerous were his visions, ecstacies and extraordinary illuminations.

On one occasion I was preaching twenty miles from my residence, and noticed the venerable prophet as he came in at the south door of the church; but, to my best recollection saw no more of him till I had concluded the services, when he ascended the pulpit and whispered to me, Dr., I want to preach—the Lord sent me here, etc. Well, brother A——, then I will announce an appointment for you at candle-light. Will that do? Yes, yes, was his brief answer. So I announced the appointment. I did not attend, but some of the brethren who came from a distance heard his revelation, how the Lord appeared to him; told him to go to the M. B. Church, walk right up to the pulpit, shut his eyes and fist, and knock three times on the pulpit, and then a door would be opened to him. Those who saw him come into the church when I did, told me he walked according to his instructions from the Lord, and gave three such raps on the pulpit as might be heard at some distance, but I never heard them. But how came his insanity?

Perhaps it is no easy matter to tell, unless it is this: For years of his professed conversion he had given way to lust, and was guilty of—, though nobody suspected him. He was apparently moral, upright, spoke evil of no man, minded his worldly affairs, managed them admirably, owed no man anything, was looked upon as honest, upright, truthful; gave dinners to the poor and needy—feasts—and invited none of the rich. Now, after his religious course of several years, he went to his church, and in conference, stood up and told the brethren and sisters he must make his confession! He did make it! though his aged friend, S. H., endeavored several times to stop him. No, no, he would not stop for mortal man; the Lord appeared to him and told him to go and confess all his sins to the church, for he was pardoned on such conditions. His confession was too scandalous and filthy to put in print.

Several cases of insanity have come under my observation, and from all I can gather, I am disposed to believe that, in many cases, if not in all, the persons are given over to strong delusion, so as to believe a lie, because they took pleasure in unrighteousness, or indulged in the gratification of some secret sin or evil propensity. Even within the course of a few years, I have had the treatment of several cases of monomania, or religious insanity, and find that in some peculiar ones, if you doubt their revelations, or tell them plainly their fancied revelations are but strong delusions, they will hate you, and despise you; and, if a physician, will have none of your prescriptions or advice. Oh, it is painful to witness.

I could mention other cases—but it is not necessary. It is enough to suggest the idea, that some secret sin, or some sinful indulgence is the cause of monomania or delusion.

Monroe, N. C., July, 1869.

Note by the Editor.—We have given place to the foregoing communication of Dr. Lee to put persons on their guard against being led astray by those who claim special revelations from the Lord, that they are some great ones. These are days to expect such delusions. Let all sincere souls take heed that they be not deceived and led to destruction by such "monomaniacs." "God is not mocked." If you follow such you will reap the bitter fruits in the end.

The Life and Advent Union.

The next anniversary of the "Union" will be held on Thursday, September 2, in Springfield, Mass. We hope all our friends, far and near, who can possibly be present, will not fail to be there. The meeting this year will, probably, be one of the most important that we have ever held; and all who can aid in our work we shall be pleased to see, that we may consult together, and devise means for greater efficiency in the glorious cause of truth which we have been called of God to advance, as we firmly believe. Let us all so far forecast in our affairs as to give the time necessary for this anniversary.

"The National Advent Camp-meeting" is to be held at the same place, commencing August 28th, and to be continued till Sept. 6th. Many from all parts of the country will meet at that time.

The Dorcas Mission.

We are at work among the garrets and cellars, sheds and shanties, and tenement houses, warning and beseeching the people to turn to the Lord. It is also our purpose to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, administer to the wants of the sick, and to visit the widow and fatherless in their affliction. We shall hold neighborhood meetings, and lead as many to Christ as we can. This kind of labor finds me in my element. The Lord has blessed it heretofore in a wonderful manner, and he will continue to bless. I solicit the prayers of God's children, that wisdom and discretion, grace and strength, may be imparted to me. Srs. Reeves and Helginson, with whom I labored in these same places for over three years, will again co-operate with me in the blessed work.

Yours in Christ,

New Rutland, Ill., July 6, 1869.

Br. Storrs: I wish to say, through the Herald, to our Brethren in the West, more particularly, that my health is still slowly improving. I have got so I can do a little. As soon as the travelling is suitable, I shall open the old "Book of life" and death to all that will hear. We have been completely confined at home this season on account of rain: it seems as though the windows of the heavens have been opened, for the rain has descended in torrents to this time. Our crops are nearly spoiled in this vicinity. Sadness is plainly depicted on all faces. The floodgates of wickedness are wide open. Character is being developed. And now that class of persons that Peter speaks of, that have obtained like precious faith with us, and are in possession of the divine nature, are not very highly esteemed by the religionists of the present day; which, it does seem to me, are clearly described by Peter in his 2d Epistle, chap. ii., 10, and onward to the end of the chapter. This is what I think a faithful and true representation of the moral condition of professors in the West, so far as I am acquainted, with the few noble exceptions.

Next, I want to say to our preaching brethren in the west, first you are all entire strangers to me; not one have I ever seen. I should like to get acquainted. Would it not be advisable to call a meeting in some central place, easy of access, where we can hold forth the truth for a few days, and then supply all, who wish, with Campaign Documents to carry home with them? By so doing, we can get acquainted with each other, and perhaps the result of such a meeting will be good. Brethren if you will make the effort, I will help all I can for a while. Perhaps some one can help me to a chance to settle; for I am out, so far as a home is concerned. I expect to visit the free lands of Iowa soon in pursuit of a cheap place for my family. If any brother can render me aid in this direction it will be gratefully received. My P. O. Address is,

Br. Storrs: I send you to day a copy of a sermon on the immortality of the soul and a review by myself. We are gaining in this place; and the fact is, we have the best men. We have men that can beat them in argument. And another very important thing about it is, they do not furnish any chance for the orthodox to find fault with their conduct. How very important it is that we all disarm the enemy at this point. If we would all steal, lie, swear, and cheat, we should not trouble orthodoxy half as much; but so long as they know we have the argument backed up with consistent lives, they seem to wish the evil one had us. They were so stirred up here, and were so persistently called upon for proof, the effort was made by the Congregational minister. They call him "Rev." I call no man that. The "Young Men's Christian Association" unanimously voted it should be published. I did not, of course, undertake the answer because I thought there was anything to it; but orthodoxy clapped their hands and really seemed to think the big gun had been fired, and the "no soulites" were annihilated. I devoted but two evenings to the reply. I am in the store, and my time is taken up so that it is not as perfect as I could wish, and the great difficulty was to get my answer into a small space. It does not take long to say, "that man stole." Yet it might consume the time of the court and jury a long time to show he did not. If we did as they do, we should say he did not, and let it go; but the education is against us; so we have to be patient and keep at work. I often feel that ours is an unthankful position to be placed in, and we can well say, "If in this life only we had hope, we should be of all men most miserable.

You may think me too sarcastic in places; but in this locality we have quit the defensive and taken the other side. The review is eagerly sought for here. I give them away, and already some have discovered, for the first time, the foundation of orthodoxy may be rotten. Br. J. M. Willis is a valiant worker for the truth. His standing and ability unite to give him strenght. He is a thorn in the enemy's flesh.

Poetry.

"The Saviour's Always Waiting."

My Dear Young Friends: These were the words heading some little verses which Mollie Stumbaugh, a blind girl, handed me a few days ago. I read them to the children's meetings, and all seemed much interested with them. While I was reading them one of the good ministers here lifted up the blind girl so that all could see her, and it almost seemed as if she were repeating the words she had witten. I could hardly believe at first, that she had really, herself, all alone, written them, and so I asked her teacher about it and found that it was quite true. Before you read them I want to tell you a little about her. She was one of those who came to the first children's meetings, here, to hear some stories. But Christians had been praying most earnestly that God's Holy Spirit might lead all to feel their need of a Saviour, and that, without Him, they must be lost forever. At the close of the first meeting I asked all those who would like the Christian to speak and pray with them, to hold up their hands, and nearly all the children at once held up their little hands, and some of them were weeping while they did so. Among those who were weeping most bitterly was this dear little blind girl.

A good many others from the Institute for the blind were in tears; but I saw none weeping so bitterly as this dear little child of twelve summers.

She seemed to think that she was "So wicked" that God could not forgive her all her sins. But I told her how Christ had died for just such wicked sinners as she, and that "He was waiting" to save her, if she would only let Him take her as she was.

She believed all that was told, and knelt down and asked God for Christ's sake to forgive her sins; and her little prayer was at once answered, and her heart was filled with joy and peace, and ever since she has been among the many workers trying to lead others to love and trust the dear Saviour.

But I will not keep you any longer from reading her verses:

The Saviour's Always Waiting.

The Saviour's always waiting
To take us by the hand,
And lead us from this sinful world
Into the Better Land.
When great temptations try us,
And sinful we might be,
O, listen to His loving words,
"Come, children, come to me."

The Saviour's always willing
To make us pure and good,
And wash our guilty sins away
With His own precious blood.
Though oft the Tempter cometh,
And leadeth us astray,
O, listen to His holy word,
And never turn away.

The Saviour's ever ready
To listen to our prayer,
The Saviour ever waiteth near
And watcheth us with care.
He loves us as a Shepherd
Doth love his lambs and sheep,
He leads us where the pastures green
Are ever fresh and sweet.

He knows each thought and feeling,
And every word we say;
O, let us through the days of life
His holy word obey.
And, when the Tempter cometh
To bid us go astray—
O, listen to His holy word,
And never turn away.

A Little Incident.

A few evenings ago I went down to town to sit an hour with a very intimate friend. I rang the door-bell, and was without ceremony invited into the family-room. Soon after being seated, the little ones began to prepare for bed; after being clothed in their night-dresses, each one went and kneelt by their mother, and said their little prayer. The two youngest, a little girl and boy—one perhaps about five years old, and the other three—kissed their mother good night, and got into their little bed where they usually slept. Presently I heard the little girl cry out, "Mother, Johnny, struck me! Johnny replied, "Katy struck me first!" The mother said to them, "Lie down and go to sleep; I will settle with you."

In the government of my own children, I try to reason with them, and make an appeal to their feelings. I have generally been successful in making them yield. I thought I would try it with those two. I turned to the little boy and said to him, "Johnny, I am very sorry you struck your little sister. I did not think you ever did such a naughty thing. God is sorry too. God does not love little boys that fight their sisters. God never made those little hands to fight little sisters. Now, Johnny, you have just said your prayers, and asked God to take care of you through the night. Now, if you want God to love you, you must be sorry for striking your little sister, and ask him to forgive you."

The little fellow had never taken his eyes off of me; he looked as though he was trying to fathom my very soul. Suddenly his eyes fell. He jumped out of bed, ran to his mother, kneeled by her side, and with his little head hidden in her lap, burst into tears, and cried out, "Muddy, I want to ask Dod to fordive me for trikin' my tister Katy." The mother, with tears streaming down her face told him what to say. He arose from his knees, and went sobbing to his bed.

All this time I had said nothing to Katy; but she had been an attentive listener, and by the time Johnny got back to his bed, Katy was up, with her arms around her mother's neck, sobbing and crying as if her heart would break. She said: "Mother, I struck Johnny first. I want God to love me, and I want to ask him to forgive me, too." She then knelt down by her mother and asked God to forgive her, arose and kissed us all, and went to bed happy.—Selected.

Faith in the light of the Scriptures—or the Old Testament.

It was in higher use in old times than in later days, except the brief period of the sojourn of the apostles. The whole fact and being of faith was better understood by the ancients than by the multitudes of our times. It originated with them, or was delivered unto, and served a purpose, and reached an end in Abel, Enoch, Noah, Abraham, and others without number. More recognized a power in it more efficient than the works of the law. For this commandment which I commanded thee this day, is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off; it is not in heaven, that thou shouldst say, Who shall go up for us to heaven and bring it unto us, that we may hear it and do it? But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it. Deut. xxx., 11, 12. In this account of faith it is a convenient power, easy used and efficient in genial heads and hearts. St. Paul's comment will help us just here. He says, Moses saw Christ in the faith. "Say not who shall ascend into heaven (that is, to bring Christ down from above); or who shall descend into the deep (that is, to bring up Christ again from the dead) . . . the word is . . . in thy mouth and heart; that is, the word of faith which we preach; that if thou shalt with thy mouth confess the Lord Jesus, and believe in thy heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved; for with the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation. Rom. x., 7–10.

This faith was in use through long ages before. It fell to the Gentiles, who have perverted it out of its meaning, and it seems impossible to get it back again. St. Paul has shown its use and aptness in every kind of trial and conflict in the history of believers, from Abel down to the period of the seventy weeks. Heb. xi. The life of whose faith was, that they looked for a resurrection through the Messiah, and a resurrection to an inheritance and incorruptible kingdom.

Let any fair-minded man in Christendom read thoughtfully Heb. xi., and he will be (he can't be anything else) convinced of the following divine doctrines; 1st, that a promise made by the Creator forms the foundation of the superstructure of "the faith;" which promise is referred to repeatedly in said chapter. This same promise, by the way, makes no part of the faith or hope, nor forms a motive to practise with the sects, as a rule, at this day, nor for the last thirteen centuries, and likely for a longer period.

2d. That these believers looked for their reward at the resurrection. Heb. xi., 8–10, 13, 16, 24–26, 35.

3d. They will find, also, that this is the only commendable faith. "By it the elders obtained a good report," left a good record. Verse 2.

4th. No other will please God. "Without faith it is impossible to please him." Verse 6.

"It is the substance of things hoped for." It made a verity of Christ before he was, comprehended, his mission and use; and it appropriated him. Enoch did this to the utmost. Faith with them made Christ as available in their day as Peter and John did when they healed the lame man in the name of Jesus of Nazareth.

Let us keep in mind that the gospel of God was preached to the Jews, and the whole nation, as if exclusively theirs, and for a while not offered to any other, even not allowed to be, "Go not in the way of the Gentiles, nor to the cities of the Samaritans; but only to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." On their refusal of it, it was offered to the Gentiles. Not another gospel, or a gospel revised and altered, or amended to suit the Gentiles. No, but to take a people from them for "His name." Acts xv., 14. "To make them fellow heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ by the gospel." Eph. iii., 6. The sure cure for heresy is to go to the law and the prophets."

Any one that will take the pains to understand Paul's account of faith in the chapters referred to, and accept of the definition there given of faith will find a power he never dreamed of; a power for all good uses. Mark the definition:

"Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen;" verse 1. And the elders practised it, put it to use; did, and succeeded in various campaigns of faith and sublime adventures, as if already immortal and glorified: "subdued kingdoms" without the loss of a man. Men of faith, of those times, single-handed, have more than once or twice put to flight the armies of aliens; and women have received their dead raised to life again; anticipating the resurrection day. They quenched the violence of the fire; became (for the time) immortal by faith, Daniel was transported over and beyond the reign of death and the ravings of wild beasts, where the lion and the lamb will lie down "together." The Creator himself framed the world by faith. "So that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." And Enoch, a most dexterous believer, realized the full benefit of faith for all time to come. He had a vision of the glory of Messiah's coming to judgment, with ten thousand of his saints, and had a desire to depart and to make one among them; and faith gave him this pre-emption from death and pre-eminent privilege.

The definition supposes faith has an aptness for drawing on the future, as if a believer had a letter of credit, a draft, a check, by which they can anticipate the things promised, much or more, according to their faith or daring.

If "faith is the substance of things hoped for, is not this a sound doctrine?

From Wm. H. Whitman.

Galesburg, Ill., July, 1869.

We once knew two men, one was an illiterate man, but had read and studied the Bible a great deal. The other was a college-learned man, and considered himself a very smart preacher. He preached on type, and antitype, and the illiterate man heard him. The learned preacher said, that the travels of the children of Israel from Egypt to Canaan was a type of the travels of the church in this vale of tears. He said, Israel being in bondage in Egypt was a type of individuals being in bondage to sin. That crossing the Red Sea was a type of water baptism. Their travels in the wilderness was a type of the Christian's warfare in this wilderness of sin. Their entrance into Canaan was a type of the Christian's entrance into heaven. That Jordan was a type of death. And Moses was a type of Christ. The type he called a pattern, the antitype he called, the garment, and the garment, he said, must be just like the pattern.

The sermon looked very nice to those who do not think for themselves. We afterward heard the illiterate man criticise the learned preacher in this wise: "That, if Moses was a type of Christ, and the children of Israel a type of Christians, then when the Christians all get to heaven, as Israel went into Canaan, Christ must stay back outside of heaven; for you (the preacher said), the garment, must be just like the pattern. Moses the leader of Israel did not go into Canaan; therefore, according to your own reasoning, Christ, the Christian's leader must stop on this side, and not enter heaven." The preacher seemed completely caught; though he never reconciled the difficulty, nor acknowledged it; but soon after attempted to injure the illiterate man's standing among his brethren, and accomplished it to some extent. Now, we wish to ask the Editor of the Herald, or some of its readers, a question: if you were the illiterate man, and the learned preacher should happen in, and stay all night with you, would you ask him to pray in your family, and return thanks at your table? The learned preacher also said in his sermon, that the church lie. The one he belonged to numbered near 700,000. Now, if you will apply type and antitype to this, there will be two and one third out of his whole church saved: for only two out of 600,000 soldiers that were baptised into Moses ever entered Canaan.

The Last Dollar.

He gave it to his wife with a sigh, yet with a look of resignation.

"It is our last dollar," he said, "but the Lord will provide."

Rev. James Spring was minister in the little mountain village of Thornville. He was poor, and his congregation were poor. Often before he had been very near his last dollar, but he had never actually got to it until today.

"So you've been always saying," sobbed his wife; "but what is to become of us when this is gone? They won't trust us any more at the store; and your salary won't be due these three weeks, even if you get it then. Why do you stay here, James, where the people are so poor?"

"I have no other place to go, nor money to travel to it, if the Lord opened a way. My work for the present is here. He feedeth the young ravens, he will surely feed us."

"I wish I had your faith, but I haven't, and it won't come to me. Oh, what shall we do?" And she rung her hands despairingly. "My poor children!"

"Once I was young, and now I am old," solemnly said her husband, speaking in the words of the Psalmist, "yet never have I seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread."

As if in answer to his pious ejaculation, there came a sudden knock at the door. All the while the minister and his wife had been talking, a storm had been raging outside. On opening the door a traveller, quite wet through, entered.

"I was coming through the forest from Maryville," he said, "and ventured to stop at the first house I saw. My horse is in the shed. Do I take too great a liberty?"

"Not at all," answered the master of the house. "We have a poor shelter, as you see; but such as it is, you are welcome to it; there is a good fire, at any rate."

It was in the kitchen where this conversation took place. Indeed, this humble home boasted no parlor, and the kitchen was dining-room, drawing-room, and all.

The stranger proved to be a man of education and intelligence, and in conversation the minister forgot his trouble, and was reminded of earlier and brighter days, when intellectual companionship had not been the rare thing it was now, up among these hills.

At last the storm abated, and the stranger arose to go. His host accompanied him to the gate, and watched him till he disappeared behind a turn of the road.

"See here, James," said his wife, eagerly, when he returned to the house. "I found this on the table near where the gentleman sat."

It was a fifty-dollar greenback, wrapped in a bit of paper that looked as if it had been torn from a pocket-book, and on the inside of the paper was written the verse of the Psalmist, which it was apparent the traveller had overheard.

"I thought he was writing the directions asked for," said the minister. "He means it for us. Thanks be to the Lord! Did I not say, my dear, he would provide?"

His wife burst into tears.

"God forgive me," she said, "I will never doubt again. The Lord surely sent this stranger to our aid."

"And he will still provide," replied her husband. "Whatever my lot may be, here or elsewhere, in him I trust."

A month after a letter, a rare event, came to Rev. James Spring. It was as follows:

"Rev. and Dear Sir: The church of Maryville has unanimously called you to its pastorate. The salary is fifteen hundred dollars, and a good parsonage house."

The letter concluded by saying: "The writer of this first came to know you by your hospitality to him during a storm, a few weeks ago. He overheard you, in a moment of great ditress, speak with such full faith, that he feels you are just the person for this charge, and on his recommendation this call has been made."

Maryville was the county town, a rich and thriving place, in a broad and fertile valley, at the foot of the hills. It was a far fitter sphere of labor for a man of the minister's abilites than the wild village in the mountains. So a young man, as yet without family, took the missionary church among the hills, and Rev. James Spring accepted the call.

But he does not forget the past, and often, when people show want of faith, tells the story of his last dollar.—Ex.

"What Have They Seen in Thine House?"

A Lady had just parted with some friends who had been her guests for a few days, and with a feeling of loneliness sat down in her now deserted drawing-room. Looking around for some book, her eye fell upon a Bible. She opened it and read the words (Isa. xxxix., 6), "What have they seen in thine house?" Strange words! What do they mean? She glanced through the preceding chapters and learned how graciously the Lord had delivered Hezekiah, first from the dangers of battle, and then from sickness. She then read how visitors came with presents from the king of Babylon, and how Hezekiah entertained them. What did he show them? "Not the Lord's doings," said the lady to herself, with a rising feeling of self-reproach.

"Surely," she thought, "the Lord must have sent these words to me. Do not I resemble Hezekiah? Two years ago, the Lord delivered me in my terrible conflict with unbelief, and brought me out into the liberty and joy of a child of God. Last summer, when I lay in my darkened chamber, sick nigh unto death, I earnestly entreated Him, and said with my heart, 'Oh! that I were now allowed to tell all my friends of this glorious Jesus, His love, His death, His righteousness, and all His marvellous riches and grace.'

"Mrs. R—— and her daughters have been my guests. I fear they are too much like the visitors from Babylon. And now the Lord asks, 'What have they seen in thine house?' What have I to answer? Last night, a dinner was given for them. I remember how every one admired the new paintings in the dining-room. After dinner, I showed them all our water-color drawings; and then I took Mrs. R—— to my boudoir to see my new carpet. I do not remember what they saw on Tuesday, excepting that I showed to Mrs. R—— that beautiful set of jewels my uncle gave me. We spent Wednesday afternoon consulting what our children should wear next spring. What an opportunity I lost of telling her of the spotless robe of the righteousness of God. And poor Marian has gone home longing to have a bracelet like that she saw on my table, and hoping to persuade her papa to get her one. Had I been faithful, she might have left me to speak to her father of Jesus and His glory.

"What have they seen in my house?

"Alas! vanity, idleness, worldly treasures.

"And what have they heard? True, they heard family reading and family prayer. But it must have seemed a mere formality. They must have thought that we had far more delight in the vain songs which were sung, and the gay conversation which the form of family worship scarcely interrupted. Although I thought about Jesus, and often longed to speak about Him, yet they have left me having seen nothing better than the visitors from Babylon saw at the house of Hezekiah.

"Is this not a word to my soul?"

Reader, is it not a word to your soul? Look around you, and see how many things you have gathered around you which war against your soul. Review your social intercourse, your entertainment of guests and visitors, and then to God answer the question.

"What have they seen in thine house?"

Oh! that the robe of Christ were the rich apparel we delighted to show; and that the word of Christ dwelt in us so richly that we could not refrain from testifying of Him—Selected.

Making and Keeping Resolutions.

The power to make a resolution is a part of the machinery of the nature of the human beings; how to keep that purpose in eternal motion is the thing to be sought. A man can make a water-wheel, but where is the water to carry it? Your resolution is good for nothing except as you can get the power of God upon it. Backed up by the Spirit of God, moral power becomes omnipotent, and you can do what you please. Paul, referring to this reinforcement, spoke the literal truth when he said, "I can do all things through Christ who strengtheneth me." By receiving the strength of eternal life into your moral power you can overcome any passion; you can face any danger; you can ride the whirlwinds without fear. This was Paul's secret philosophy. He thoroughly understood that spiritual power can enter into moral power and make it almighty. This points out to all, the way of deliverance from seventh-of-Romans experience, and every snare of the devil. When you form good purposes, talk with God about them until you know that he has adopted them; then they become his and not yours. Transfer them to him and your righteousness becomes his. Give up, to begin with, the idea that you can keep your resolutions yourself; put them into God's hand; then you have nothing to boast of yourself, and yet you are omnipotent in righteousness.—Selected.

How to Prevent Hydrophobia.

A physician in this city, in whose judgment we have great confidence, sends us the following:

Thus far all attempts to cure patients attacked with this fearful disease have been futile. The latest novelty, the use of the vapor bath, proposed on theoretical grounds by a Frenchman a few months since, and trumpeted by all the papers as an infallible cure, has been found, in one instance, at least, in this city, to hasten the fatal issue of the disease. While, therefore, medical science confesses her inability to cure, she none the less claims to be able to prevent it in a very simple and easy way. The late Mr. Youatt, well known for his treatises upon the management of the various domestic animals, used to affirm that a perfect means of prevention lay in a free cauterization of the wound made by the rabid animal any time within twelve hours after the injury. This was to be done with a red-hot iron, strong nitric acid or nitrate of silver, better known as lunar caustic. In proof of his assertion he allowed himself to be repeatedly bitten by rabid animals—seventy times in all, if I remember correctly—and yet by the use, each time, of the lunar caustic he escaped all evil consequences. It has been long agreed by scientific men that a comparatively long period of time elapses between the reception of the wound and the appearance of hydrophobia—a period varying from one week to six—more commonly about forty days. This indicates that the poison, whatever may be its nature, lies dormant for a time in the wound before it is absorbed by the general circulation and pervades the whole system. If, then, at any time between the reception of the wound and the infection of the circulation by the deadly virus, the part containing it be removed by cutting it out, or be destroyed by caustics, the mischief is nipped in the bud, and that which would otherwise produce hydrophobia with all its horrors, remains a simple dog bite.

Many persons, it is true, fear hydrophobia after being bitten by an animal supposed to be mad, who are never attacked by the disease; and it is also true that very many die from this cause who supposed themselves bitten by some perfectly harmless dog. Hence it follows that no one after receiving a bite from a dog, whether known to be mad or not, which lacerates or bruises the flesh, no matter how slightly, has any right to neglect giving the wound a thorough and efficient cauterization. After that, judging from Youatt's experience, he may have a reasonable certainty of escaping an attack of hydrophobia.—The Advance.

The Dance.

What a strange thing this dancing is, after all, when you look at it from a philosophical, or, if you please, unsophisticated point of view. The other day Insulanus asked a lady how it came to pass that the entrance upon the floor of the ball-room made such a wonderful change in the usual manners and habits. She asked him what he meant, as she did not understand. He asked her, Suppose I introduce you to a friend of mine, a stranger, and he would not only take your hand, but put his arm around you, what would you do? You may imagine her look and answer! What would she do? All your lady readers know what they would do, and what the father, husband or brother of such a lady would do. But, said Insulanus, as soon as you enter the room of the "hop" or ball, you permit a perfect stranger who is introduced to you at the time, not only to take your hand, but to put his arm around your waist, and to sail round the room with you in the giddy mazes of the dance, and your father brother and husband think it all right! The lady admitted that she had not exactly looked upon it from that point of view, but gave Insulanus no other information than that things were allowable in the dance which are not so in ordinary life.

How wonderful that delicate ladies can dance from 9 to 12 p. m., square dances and round dances, and wind up with a sherry cobbler and yet feel too weary to stand up during prayer in church!—Moravian.

"Beastly, Beastliness.—We translate (Cor. xv., 44), 'a natural body;' some have regretted that it was not rendered 'an animal body.' This is exactly what Wiclif meant when he translated the 'corpus animale which he found in his Vulgate, 'a beastly body.' The word had then no ethical coloring; nor, when it first acquired such, had it exactly that which it now possesses.

"It is sowen a beestli bodi; it shall rise a spiritual bodi.—I Cor., xv., 44. Wiclif."—Dean Trench.

Be not discouraged by past failures in duty, but confess to God, beg his interference, and try again: "The way of the Lord is strength to the upright."

Six Sermons on the Inquiry, Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

PARADISE.

THE term paradise, Heb. pardes, Gr. paradisos, signifies, literally, a garden or pleasure ground planted with trees, flowers, etc. Dr. Adam Clarke, in his notes on Gen. ii., 8, states that Wilmet supposes it to be a Persian word; and the Dr. says, "in Arabic and Persian it signifies a garden, a vineyard." The Septuagint render Gen. ii., 8, thus, "God planted a paradise in Eden." Dr. Albert Barnes says paradise is a word of Persian origin, and means a garden, particularly a garden of pleasure, filled with trees, shrubs, fountains and flowers. Just such a garden, a paradise was created by God in the beginning and given to man conditionally as his abode. It was a sample of the condition to which the whole earth would have been brought by Adam and his posterity had man, by obedience, developed a character in harmony with God. To a race enjoying Edenic advantages, the whole work of subduing the earth and making it like the pattern furnished by the Creator would have been delightful and glorious. By disobedience, however, sin entered, and the curse fell upon man, and upon the ground for his sake. Unto Adam God said, "Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree of which I commanded thee, saying, thou shalt not eat of it, cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life: thorns, also, and thistles shall it bring forth to thee. . . In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground. . . Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden (paradise) of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken." Gen. iii., 17, 18, 19, 23. Thus it is seen that when, after the fall, the curse was pronounced, paradise ceased to be. Since the fall, there has been no paradise in existence, because the curse has not been removed. The two cannot exist together. When there was a paradise there was no curse; while there is a curse there can be no paradise. Now, if the word of God brings to view a time when the curse will be removed, then we may know of a certainty that paradise will be restored, re-established. The term occurs three times in our E. V. Bible, viz., Luke, xxiii., 43; 2 Cor. xii., 2; Rev. ii., 7, the last of which we will consider first.

Many years had elapsed since the death, resurrection and ascension of Christ; the gospel was being preached to the various nations, and the Christian religion was rapidly increasing when John, an exile on Patmos, received a revelation from him "that liveth and was dead." The revelation was of "things which must shortly come to pass," and opened to view the events of various periods reaching to the second coming of Christ and the setting up of the heavenly kingdom. "He that hath an ear," saith the messenger, "let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches: to him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life, which is in the midst of the paradise of God."

When paradise existed at the beginning the tree of life stood in the midst of it; and in the passage just quoted, a promise is made to them that overcome, and it is that they shall eat of the "tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise." The book of Revelation is wholly prophetic. The things that were revealed to John were then in future; they were things which should "come to pass." When John heard the above words of promise he had not yet come to the paradisaic part of the vision, but was simply told of a blessing that awaits the faithful. He saw kingdoms strong and mighty set up and cast down. He beheld woes, and plagues, and judgments terrible inflicted upon nations and peoples, and great anti-Christian powers were annihilated. He saw the faithful subjected to persecutions bloody and diabolical, and finally beheld "a new heaven and a new earth," and the "new Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. . . In the midst of the street of it . . . was there the tree of life . . . and there shall be no more curse." Here, then, we have the unfailing word of God for it, that paradise shall be restored, but not until the Lord shall gather out "all things that offend, and them which do iniquity;" not until everything opposed to the just, holy and beneficent reign of Zion's glorious King shall be trampled under foot to rise no more forever. Having shown that paradise ceased to exist at the close of Adam's Edenic experience, and that it has not yet been re-established, but will be when "the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ," let us, keeping these facts in view, notice the two passages which many believe prove the present existence of paradise.

Jesus' reply to the dying thief was, "Verily, I say unto thee, to-day shalt thou be with me in paradise." Luke xxiii., 43. Those who contend that this passage just as it stands correctly represents the promise of Jesus to the thief, are compelled to assume, firstly, that there is a part of man which does not die; and, secondly, that there is somewhere a place called paradise, to which this undying part repairs at the death of the other part. The former, we assert, is wholly unjustifiable in view of the fact that the word of God always represents man as mortal and the race as perishing, naturally, while the latter is, of course, nowhere taught in the Bible. Was the promise, as it stands recorded in our translation, ever fulfilled? To those who hold that heaven, the dwelling place of God, and the term paradise in this text, are synonymous, we quote the language of Jesus himself, who, after his resurrection, said to Mary, "I am not yet ascended to my Father." John xx., 17. To those, on the other hand, who believe paradise is where the righteous remain in conscious existence between death and the resurrection, we reply, Christ did not go there. David said, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell (sheol, grave); neither wilt thou suffer thine holy one to see corruption." Psa. xvi., 10. Did David here speak of himself? Peter says he did not. On the occasion of that remarkable outpouring of the Holy Ghost, he quoted the above language of David, and said, respecting it, "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried [then he is not in paradise], and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore, being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he, seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell" (hades, grave). By what authority do men claim, in opposition to such direct, inspired testimony, that Jesus went to paradise when he died? Is it not something more than nearly allied to folly? Is it not folly? They do not, it is true, assert that he went there personally, only his soul; but the Holy Ghost says, his "soul" was made "an offering for sin," and that God on the third day after Christ's death, having promised that he would not leave his "soul in hell" (sheol, grave,) brought him out of it by a resurrection from the dead.

Did space permit, we might go farther, and show that the thief did not die that day. In no sense was such a promise to the thief fulfilled. But there was a promise, and it will surely be fulfilled. What was it? Jesus had for years been teaching that at a future time he would come and reign as king. For example, "when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." Math. xxv., 31. Of this fact the thief was not ignorant, and seeing Jesus beside him, and doubtless being impressed that he was no deceiver, he cried unto him, "Lord, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." We have seen that the establishment of Christ's kingdom will be the re-establishment of paradise, and the Saviour's promise, "thou shalt be with me in paradise," is, therefore, in perfect harmony with the thief's prayer. The only support afforded by the text to the view that Christ promised an entrance into paradise that day, consists in its punctuation. We must remember that while the words are the words of Jesus, the punctuating is done by the translators, the original being without it. There was no approach to a regular system of punctuation until the sixteenth century. Place the comma after day instead of after thee, and we get the correct idea; the meaning of the text being that Jesus assured the thief that day that he should be with him in paradise when he (Christ), should come in his kingdom. Dr. Scott, Dr. Barnes, and others, we think, admit that the thief expected his prayer would be answered at a future time; either at Christ's resurrection or second coming. Dr. Adam Clarke says, "men of great learning and abilities have taken the position that the comma should be placed after 'to-day;' the sentiment of the text being that Christ gave the assurance that day that the thief should be with him in paradise after the resurrection."

It may be urged that such a use of the expression "to-day," is superfluous; it being apparent to all who heard Jesus that he was giving the assurance that day without his saying it, but a little research will satisfy any inquirer that such expressions are common among almost all peoples down to the present time. A case in which the same use is made of it that our Saviour does is found in Deut. xv., 15. "And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee: Therefore I command thee this thing to-day." All who heard it knew the command was given that day. Properly understood, therefore, there is in this text, so much relied upon, absolutely nothing favorable to the popular theory of glorification in death, but much against it.

The only remaining text in which the term paradise occurs is the following: "How that he was caught up into paradise, and heard unspeakable words, which it is not lawful for a man to utter." 2 Cor. xii., 4. As evidence that some orthodox theologians, at least, do not regard Paul as claiming that any part of him had actually been admitted into heaven, we again quote from Adam Clarke. He says, Schoetgen "has shown, that ascending to heaven, or being caught up to heaven, is a form of speech among Jewish writers, to express the highest degree of inspiration . . . If we may understand St. Paul thus, it will remove much of the difficulty from this place, and perhaps the unspeakable words, ver. 4, are thus to be understood. He had the most sublime communications from God; such as would be improper to mention." The Greek preposition rendered "up" in this text is eis, and "properly signifies at . . . It sometimes means being at, either as close beside, or actually within . . . But it likewise denotes motion or tendency toward an object, so as to arrive at it; and then may be rendered to or into when applied to place: Bible vs. Tradition. That this was a vision, Paul himself declares in ver. 1: "I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord." He saw two things in connection, viz., paradise and "the third heaven." We have seen what paradise is; now let us consult Peter regarding the "third heaven." He says, "by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water: Whereby the world that then was (before the flood) being overflowed with water, pershed: But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word, kept in store, reserved unto fire . . . The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works that are therein, shall be burned up. Nevertheless we, according to his promise, look for new heavens and a new earth." Dr. Clarke and others understand, and we think rightly so, "heavens" in the forgoing, as also in other passages, to r late to the atmosphere, etc., which surrounds the earth. Now what has Peter told us? Why, that the first heaven and the first earth were destroyed by water, "the flood;" that the second heaven and second earth, now existing, shall be destroyed also, and God has promised, after that, "new heavens and a new earth." The third heaven, therefore, which Paul saw is the one which shall be when the present heavens are passed away: after the return of Christ.

Paradise and the "third heaven," then, are co-existent. We have seen that the preposition eis, rendered up, in the passage, denotes motion or tendency toward an object so as to arrive at it, and may be rendered to or into when applied to place. Paul, in his vision, seemed to be transported beyond intervening time and events, to paradise and the third heaven, and saw them and the glory of them just as if they already existed. How very plain is the passage, when not mystified by human tradition, and is consistent with other portions of the word of God. Men sometimes scoff at what they are pleased to term the "gross idea" that this earth is to be the inheritance of the saints, but when paradise shall be re-established; when the hills shall laugh in their beauty, and the valleys sing the Redeemer's praise; when the "wilderness shall be glad," and the "desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose;" when the whole earth shall be robed in garments of unfading loveliness, and become one broad highway of holiness, one great paradise with no spot on all its wide extent to send up the wail of sorrow; when "the throne of God and the Lamb shall be in it" and the redeemed shall "see his face; and his name shall be in their foreheads;" when "the ransomed of the Lord" shall "come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy," scoffers shall have ceased their scoffing because of the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God." Our Lord and master said, "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth;" and God, by the mouth of the prophet, had long before promised "the meek shall inherit the earth, and delight themselves in the abundance of peace." It is here that the "Son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory;" and where our blessed Lord and Saviour reigns as King, and unless in righteousness, there will the saints find it ineffable delight to be.

May we all in loving words and by consistent lives direct unbelievers to a preparation to meet the Lord "when he shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe;" faithfully admonishing them to "repent ye, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out, when the times of refreshing shall come, from the presence of the Lord; and he shall send Jesus Christ, . . . Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." L. C. T.

THE DIVINE PLAN:

AN ADDRESS TO THE ADVENT-CHRISTIANS OF AMERICA.

BY WILLIAM H. SPENCER.

[Concluded.]

WE have already proved, from numerous portions of Scripture, what God purposed regarding Adam's posterity who should prove obedient to the divine law; but, to place this matter beyond all doubt, we will introduce the testimony of Paul. He says, "God hath chosen us in him (Christ) before the foundation of the world, . . . having predestinated us unto the adoption of children by Jesus Christ, . . . that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on the earth; even in Him in whom we have obtained the inheritance, being predestinated according to the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His own will." (Eph. first chap.) This language, having sole reference to Christians, plainly unfolds to us the purpose God had formed in his mind, "before the foundation of the world," regarding all who should develope a character in harmony with His will. This purpose was even their adoption into the heavenly family by an eternal union formed in Christ. But when He predestinated the saints as subjects of a resurrection life, did He at the same time form any plan regarding a future life for those who reject Him—reject the offer of Life—and continue in rebellion against His righteous law? This important point is worthy of our candid consideration. Where is His original purpose recorded to perpetuate their existence eternally in torment, their misery and wretchedness to increase with the increasing ages? Or where can we even find in His original purpose that He would grant them a brief existence beyond the grave, in mortality and wretchedness without a single beneficial design connected therewith; but that He may mock at their misery, and finally, in His divine wrath, return them to the same condition from whence they were awakened? Could we look upon this as an act of love?—for "God is love!" They are sentenced to everlasting punishment,—eternal death. The Christian heart now shudders at the thought of such cruelty, and the sight of such a scene of woe, even though it be of short duration, would forever destroy the happiness of the redeemed family. No parent could be happy while beholding their children in such a scene of mortal woe; and eternity could not efface it from an immortal memory, and thus would banish the joy of the future world. Again, such an act on the part of Deity would blast the supreme doctrine of revelation, that "God is love." We cannot so dishonor God as to believe, in the absence of positive testimony, that He has purposed any such destiny for the finally lost. As the wicked have no principle of the resurrection life abiding in them, according to the divine plan, they will forever be holden of death as the "wages of sin."

So sustain the facts that we have already adduced, we will bring forward more testimony from the inspired apostle: "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose. For whom did foreknow He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the firstborn among many brethren. Moreover, whom He did predestinate, them He also called; and whom he called, them He also justified; and whom He justified, them He also glorified." Rom. viii., 28–30. This passage clearly shows (1.) God did foreknow that some would comply with the conditions of salvation, for, as Albert Barnes justly intimates this has sole reference to the saints of God; (2.) those who should thus become the people of God He "did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son" by being "called" from the grave; and (3.) all who are embraced in this call, being justified, will be glorified. Therefore the saints alone are predestinated as the subjects of a revival from the dead, God "having predestinated them unto the adoption of children." Eph. i., 5–11. We are aware some raise an objection that this "call" has reference to the calling of sinners to repentance; but that this is a wrong conclusion is evident from the fact they are called to be "conformed to the image of His Son," which can only refer to the resurrection, when they will be made "like unto His glorious body." This passage refers to an undivided company. All who are called are justified, and all who are justified are glorified. This call comes only to sleeping saints, and when divinity utters that call they shall feel the mighty throb of immortality pulsating through every fibre of their nature, and they shall come forth, formed and fashioned like unto the glorious body of Christ. "If any man have not the Spirit of Christ he is none of His; . . . but if the Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in you." Rom. viii., 8–10. Many other sublime portions of Holy Writ show that God's people alone meet this salvation from the grave. Christ's resurrection was the subject of God's decree, and He has also decreed that death shall not "prevail" over those that are Christ's. "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept." All that are "in" Christ shall be made alive; "but every man in his own order, Christ the first fruits, afterwards they that are Christ's at His coming. 1 Cor. xv., 22, 23. Christ was the first fruits of the resurrection harvest, and the harvest must correspond with the sample. A sheaf of wheat cannot be a part of a barley harvest; therefore the immortal resurrection of Christ involves the immortal resurrection of all who are the subjects of a future life.

The ideas which we have just presented on the nature of the Adamic law, and on the subject of the resurrection, may introduce the question—"What is the nature of death?" This point has been the subject of much controversy, but only two positions can consistently be taken in regard to it. Death is either the suspension or destruction of life. One or the other must be true. Large numbers of those who believe in the Bible view of man's nature and his unconsciousness in death, are rapidly drifting into the position that death is the suspension of life and therefore, advocate the theory that mortal life will be restored to the entire race at the resurrection. If this be true Adam will live again; but not a word to this effect can be found in the Scriptures. The entire Bible stands directly opposed to the supposition that mortal life will be restored to any at the resurrection. "The dead shall be raised incorruptible." This inspired declaration includes all who shall be rased from the dead. "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." This testimony shows that death must be different from a mere suspension of life. Not in one instance is it declared that the body is raised mortal. Dr. Merrill, while editor of the "Methodist Quarterly Review," gave this excellent testimony:

> "All death is eternal in the nature of things. This is implied in the fact that it is the destruction and not the mere suspension of life. It must be so unless there is something in death that will destroy itself and bring back the life it took away. But only having a negative existence it can have no such power. Stripped of the trapping, of fancy which lively imaginations have thrown around it, death appears without form, attribute, quality or being. It is an effect and not an agent. Hence, if death once occurs, whether in the vegetable, animal, or spiritual kingdom, it will reign forever unless arrested by divine power in the production of a new life."

This we conceive to be the truth. "The wages of sin is death." "Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death." The punishment for sin is not dying, but death—not a condition, but a state. The righteous gain eternal life—life from the dead; the wicked suffer in eternal loss of life. As death never ends of itself the wicked go down into the state of death without any hope of escape, for they have rejected Him who alone has the keys of death.

Again, all deliverance from death must be by the production of a new life. Mortal, or blood life, ends in the grave; but Christ has become the author of a resurrection or spiritual life, obtained through the "new birth." Hence, the gospel makes a resurrection from death conditional. Faith and obedience are the gospel conditions of salvation, and a disregard of these by a rejection of Christ—who is "the Resurrection"—consigns man to an eternal and hopeless state. All who shall live again will live by virtue of a new life. "That was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterward that which is spiritual." 1 Cor. xv., 46. Throughout this chapter Paul contrasts the present or "natural" life with the resurrection or "spiritual" life. "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." "And as we have borne the image of the earthy, we shall also bear the image of the heavenly." As we have born the image of Adam in partaking of his mortal nature, we shall, in a resurrection from the dead—"born again"—partake of the immortal nature of Christ, the Second Adam.

As another conclusive proof of the correctness of our position, we adduce the fact that the Atonement offered by Christ excludes the wicked from a future life. The word, Atonement, signifies to be made ONE, or AT ONE, and therefore implies an offense committed by one party against another, and that mutual agreement has been restored, so that they are at one. Man is the offending party, God the aggrieved one. Man, in his controversy with Deity, stands under a fearful sentence, even the forfeiture of life—Adamic or blood life—without the pledge or promise of another. Justice demands his life, and while in this situation no future life is possible. Man in this condition has nothing to offer the aggrieved party as an equivalent for the injury which he has sustained. To restore harmony between the opposing parties, a third party—Christ—offers His life as an expiration for the offending. He offers a life upon which justice has no claims, and therefore proposes reconciliation. Arbitrary conditions, however, are proposed by the offending party to which the offending party must comply in order to make the atonement offering an equivalent for the offense committed. Therefore, none are embraced in this atonement but those who comply with the conditions. "God so loved the world that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not His Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through Him might he saved," John iii., 16, 17. By complying with these conditions they become the children of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ. But the wicked, by rejecting the conditions of the atonement, offered to the whole world, stand in the same relation to an offending Deity as though Christ had made no atonement by a sacrifice of himself. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him."

We are aware that large numbers of our brethren argue the resurrection of the wicked on the theory of a "general atonement," by the assumption that Christ is the Saviour of all men. We know of no passage in the Bible that declares Christ to be the Saviour of all men. If he really saves all men from the grave, then is Universalism true, for Christ distinctly affirms that those who shall be "accounted worthy" to "obtain that world and a resurrection from the dead . . . are as the angels of God, being the children of the resurrection." Luke xx., 35, 36. The force of this passage cannot be easily evaded. If all are "accounted worthy" of a "resurrection from the dead, then we have Christ's own words that they "are as the angels of God, being the children of the resurrection."

In conclusion, reader, we kindly invite you to carefully consider the facts herein presented, and glorify God by zealously searching for truth. Our present unpopular position has not been taken hastily. Mature and careful investigation of the Scriptures, covering no brief space of time, has thoroughly settled our mind, and we offer these pages as containing a few of the reasons for the hope that is within us. The limit of these pages has necessarily crowded out a vast amount of Scriptural testimony, and also an examination of objections, which are ably treated in other works, to which the reader is referred. "Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit unto unfeigned love of the brethren, see that ye love one another with a pure heart fervently."

Saints, lift your heads! the day is near
When your Redeemer shall appear,
To take the Kingdom and the crown,
And make his ransomed church his own.

FROM JAY FRANCIS.

CHICAGO, ILL., July, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I have been an interested reader of the HERALD for a year, and have come to love much of its teachings, believing they are scriptural. On the question of the non-resurrection of the wicked dead—for it is a question with me—I am desirous of light.

When talking on the subject with those who hold the idea of an universal resurrection, I always take ground opposed to them; for two reasons: First, because I want to get all possible light; second, because the doctrine of the non-resurrection of dead sinners is, in its natural and reasonable aspect altogether pleasing; and accords with common sense. So I have come to be regarded by numerous good Christian friends as decidedly a believer in the idea you advocate. This impression is incorrect, though; for, so far as I can see, there are certain texts of Scripture which do most unequivocally teach the resurrection of the wicked. It is unnecessary for me to quote or even name them, but I refer to the matter, to ask an explanation of those few texts, which are considered strongest and plainest on this point. I have read some attempted interpretation of them, but nothing that satisfied my mind, and I still can only regard the declarations that "there shall be a resurrection, both of the just and the unjust"—that they that have done evil shall come forth," etc., as teaching clearly the re-living of dead sinners. If there is a consistent, scriptural way of understanding these texts so as to teach the opposite of their plain, legitimate reading, as we have it in our common version of the Bible—as is the case with numerous other passages on other subjects—I would be very thankful for instruction, and will use the light God may give me, whether through you or other instrument, to extend the fame of Jesus and to glorify God's name.

Bless the name of the Lord for the precious truth we have concerning a risen Saviour, a coming King, and an eternal inheritance in life. Glory to God! I rejoice in truth, or anticipate the coming day of deliverance with great joy. Dear saints, hold fast, live purely, and "hope to the end," or, "perfectly,' as one version has it.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—That there should be difficulties with certain texts, in relation to the doctrine of a future life for the wicked, is no more strange than that there should be in relation to many other doctrines believed by Adventists and "Orthodoxists:" yet we believe there are very few theories that have less difficulties than that which excludes the wicked entirely from a life from the dead. Not one text can be produced that saith they shall live again. Not a few positively affirm they "shall not see life"—that they "shall remain in the congregation of the dead," etc. The general tenor of the Scriptures, and the known character of God forbid the belief that they should live again. But from our old traditions we cannot be made free all at once; so it takes some of us years to see all things clear on this subject. In our mind, at present, it is a truth, undoubted, that there is no future life to such as refuse it through Christ.

A future life is a gift of God's grace; and is given only of grace or favor. If any one lives from the dead, it is a favor granted. Such life cannot be a curse. If given at all, it is for the good of him who receives it: "the dead are raised incorruptible," and "in glory," which excludes all suffering, etc., consequently, another death is impossible: and our Lord saith, "neither can they die any more." Such is the result to all who are made alive from the dead. Thus we believe, and thus we teach.

A MIRACLE OF HONESTY.

AT a party one evening, several contested the honor of having done the most extraordinary thing; a reverend gentleman was appointed judge of their respective pretensions.

One produced his tailor's bill, with a receipt attached to it. A buzz went through the room that this could not be outdone, when

A second proved that he had just arrested his tailor for money that was lent him.

"The palm is his," was the generous cry. Then the third put in his claim.

"Gentlemen," said he, "I cannot boast of the feats of my predecessors, but I have returned to the owners two umbrellas they left at my house."

"I'll hear no more!" cried the astonished arbitrator. "This is the very acme of honesty, it is an act of virtue of which I never knew any one capable of. The prize—"

"Hold!" cried another, "I haved one still more than that."

"Impossible!" cried the whole company. "Let us hear."

"I have been taking my county paper for twenty years, and have paid for it every year in advance."

He took the prize.

We hope, if the age lasts, to find hundreds of just such "honest subscribers." A good share of them have come up to the above standard for six years past. A few only have come short, and we never send "Bills" to them or "Duns," knowing that such things are an intimation that they are not likely to "take the prize;" but if any should find their paper ceases to reach them, the fault is in the mailing or Postoffice departments, or else they have not been careful to renew by a remittance. "A word to the wise."

FROM CHARLES HOPE.

WEST BERKSHIRE, VT., June 21, 1860.

BR. STORRS: Please send me $2 worth Campaign Documents. I wish to scatter them in this dark neighborhood. I hope it may have the desired effect on some minds. Sectarian bigotry and immortal soulism are at a fearful height. I would like to see it have a mighty fall. Methodist and Baptist ministers keep it up so strongly that the people are afraid to read the HERALD OF LIFE, and cannot be persuaded to do so. I highly prize it. It is all the preaching I get. Thank God for the great Bible truths it contains. May the Lord continue you to give light to the world, and to remove the fog of mysticism spread over the word of the Lord by sectarian teachers. Thank God for the spread of truth, by which that fog is being driven away. May those who are promulgating these glorious truths be armed with energy and power to proclaim them to the world at large; so shall they have many stars in their crowns, in Christ's kingdom. Soon eternal life will be given to all the faithful. I trust, through Christ, to meet you in the kingdom.

HON. O. S. HALSTED'S address is, "Box 91, Newark, N. J." Any persons desirous to obtain his work, "THE THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE," should send to him direct. We cannot undertake to get it for any one. Please do not ask us to do it any more. We have all the business we can possibly attend to without going or sending out for others. If you are a subscriber for the HERALD OF LIFE, send Judge Halsted two dollars, as directed above, and he will send you his work free of postage. If you are not one of our subscribers, send him three dollars, which is the regular price of the work.

THE HERALD OF LIFE

NEW YORK, JULY 21, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND PATRONS.

THE present volume is fast coming to a close, and our anniversary is at hand. We desire to come to it clear of debt, as we have uniformly done hitherto. To do this now, it is desirable that the sums pledged be all paid as early as possible.

From the interest felt in the HERALD OF LIFE, last year, its "DIRECTORS" advised a continuance of the paper to subscribers who had not actually paid in advance, according to our terms. Many of these persons have since paid, and thanked us for continuing to send it. Some others are still receiving it without having made any remittance. These we shall feel called upon to discontinue if not heard from soon; a few such have already been discontinued.

The liberal plan of continuing papers not paid for in advance, has increased the expense of publishing, and hence, we hope none will fail to help in this matter who are able. We are sending the paper to many more persons than at any previous period of its history. Shall these not be continued and much increased, if not doubled, at the commencement of the next volume.

An interest has been awakened on the Life question in the last twelve or fourteen months far exceeding anything in previous years. Much of this has been accomplished by our "CAMPAIGN DOCUMENTS," which have been scattered by thousands on thousands, and still they fly. But how is this work to continue without the HERALD OF LIFE? Important as those works are, the HERALD is far more so as a medium of constant intercourse with all parts of the country. It is only by such communication that we can expect to carry forward the work of spreading evangelical truth through the land. We use the term "evangelical" that friends and foes may understand we do not give that language to be claimed, without dispute, by the promulgators of inherent immortality and its legitimate consequences.

Let all our friends feel that we are, whatever our situation may be, individually under obligation to do all we can to spread abroad the truth of God as we understand it.

THE THEOLOGICAL EARTHQUAKE.

"He hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven . . . that those things which cannot be shaken may remain." Heb. xii., 26, 27.

THAT the theological systems are to be shaken, as well as the political ones, is, to us, the clearly-announced testimony of revelation. The earthquake shocks in both are distinctly heard throughout Christendom, and are indicative of the near approach of that "kingdom which cannot be removed." Heb. xii., 28. Our comfort is, that these theological earthquakes are under the control of him who sitteth in the heavens, and are designed to clear away the theological rubbish of eighteen centuries: rubbish which has accumulated by the introduction of a false theory of man's nature and destiny; the principal of which has been, the assumption that man is a part of God, and is therefore not liable to extinction of being; or, in other words, cannot be annihilated or made to cease from a living existence.

That doctrine has lead, through various windings, to two extremes, equally corrupting Divine truth, if not equally dishonoring God and corrupting the minds of men. Those extremes are, eternal torments on the one side, and universal restoration to holiness and happiness on the other. Both spring from one root, viz., the assumption that man possesses by his creation or natural birth a portion of the divine nature which cannot become extinct, or cease to be a conscious being.

This is the basis of both theological systems, however each party may seek to modify their language to avoid the shocking conclusions that inevitably follow from their premises. Both theories draw after them absurdities which implicate the character of God, and represent him as practising duplicity or deception toward men, which in transactions among men would be branded as the blackest hypocrisy and most consummate villainy.

The theory of endless torment, as held by those claiming to be "orthodox," we have battled against for the last thirty years; we trust not in vain. Its hideous head has been "wounded;" if not unto death, yet so that its "deadly wound" is not likely ever to be "healed." While we have been thus employed, we have put forth but little direct effort against the twin doctrine of universal restoration, supposing that would almost naturally die as the true Bible doctrine of "Life future and eternal only in and through Christ" prevailed.

Some of the English ministers commenced opposing the doctrine of inherent immortality about the same time it commenced in this country, only perhaps a very little later. None of their works, however, appeared in this country till after the subject was considerably under way here. So far as we know, we imported the first of their works on the question about 1846, and opened a correspondence with Dobney, Ham, White, Moncrieff, Dr. Lees, and others in England and Scotland. For some reason or other, this correspondence nearly all ceased some ten or fifteen years since, and almost entire silence reigned as to what was going on in England, so far as we were concerned. We made several efforts to get information from that quarter; but we could learn little else than that those early correspondents had settled down into a kind of waiting position to have things come round to them, or for some other reason unknown to us.

As we had taken hold of the work of warring against inherent immortality and its consequences, we could not stop to inquire too much into the affairs and course of our English friends, and kept to our work, advancing from one point to another in our attacks, till we became satisfied that there is no future living existence to any of Adam's race except in and through Christ alone: all not joined to him by faith, and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, where he is preached, or by the Holy Spirit where the outward preaching has never come, will "remain in the congregation of the dead" (Prov. xxi., 16), and never enter into a living existence, after the present is extinguished; believing that the indwelling Spirit of God is essential to a future living existence, leaving all infants, or persons incapable of personal action, in the hands of God; who can, if that is his pleasure, put his Spirit in them and give them, future and eternal life.

This is where we stand at the present time. Rumors have recently come to us from over the Atlantic Ocean that there has begun to be a reviving of the Life question, and we have sought for several months to get definite information as to the movement, but almost in vain. We have received, at last, "THE RAINBOW," for "July 1, 1869." This, however, leaves us much in the dark as to the real state of the Life views in England. It has but one article directly on the subject, and that written in opposition to "THE DOCTRINE OF ANNIHILATION."

"The Rainbow" is "A magazine of Christian Literature, with special reference to the Revealed Future of the Church and World, edited by WM. LEASK, D. D." Only a small portion, it seems, is to be devoted to the Life question. From the number before us, we learn that a MR. MAUDE has been writing in support of the idea that Future Punishment consists in annihilation. His opposer, in the July "Rainbow," is ANDREW JUKES. We know nothing of either of these men only what we learn from the latter's article before us. Mr. JUKES is ingenious, but his ingenuity seems to us to unsettle all faith in revelation. His leading assumption is, that all men are "sons of God." This is his "philosopher's stone" that converts the language of the Bible, such as life, death, etc., to mean anything or nothing, just according to his central notion. We give the following extract from his article, by which our readers will see what his drift is. He speaks thus:

What is man? Till we know this we cannot know what death is to him. Scripture answers, "Adam was the son of God" (Luke iii., 38), "made in his image" (Gen. i.. 26, 27), yea, even now in "His image." (1 Cor. xi., 7); and therefore, though fallen and mortal, with a life, like its Begetter, which is and must be eternal. For God is an eternal Spirit, and as that which is born of the flesh is flesh, so that which is born of an eternal Spirit is eternal spirit. Adam, says Luke, was the son of God. . . . It is this divine parentage which makes man what he is, a spirit, which, though fallen, has an eternal destiny; a being who can indeed become either like a devil or equal to the angels, but who is eternal; because he is a son of God."

Mr. Jukes's long and labored article rests on the above statement of what man is. If this statement proves untenable, his whole superstructure crumbles into ruins. Is it true that "Adam was the son of God?" The only direct proof of this is, by Mr. Jukes, found in Luke iii., 38. Surely his appeal to that text is sufficient to throw discredit on his position. We know nothing of this gentleman's learning, and know not, but he is perfectly sincere in his appeal to Luke iii., 38, in support of his idea that "Adam was the son of God." It would seem more appropriate to make a first appeal to an earlier period of Bible history, and show some direct testimony from "the law and the prophets" that such was the fact in relation to Adam; but as he has chosen Luke iii., 38, for his foundation, if that fails, all that is built thereon falls to the ground.

Did Luke, then, utter the language Mr. Jukes attributes to him? We answer, No. Luke's words are simply, "tou Theou"—of, or, from God: i. e., God was the author of his being or existence. The words, "the son" are not in the original; and their being put there by our translators is of no authority, and contradicts the Mosaic account of Adam's creation, as it does also the text, partially quoted by Mr. Jukes from our Lord's discourse with Nicodemus: a text which demonstrates the incorrectness of his position; for our Lord had said, "Except a man" [any man, Adam of course,] "be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." Why cannot he see it? Because "that which is born of the flesh is flesh:" therefore, "except a man be born of . . . the Spirit [or from above], he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

Thus a second birth, a birth of the Spirit, is made essential to life in the kingdom of God; for the first birth gives to no man any other than a fleshly nature; such only had Adam to convey to his offspring: and on this fact our Saviour builds the necessity of a man's being "born again." Hence Mr. Jukes' assumption of man's being a "son of God," either by creation or birth, is found to be without foundation; man by creation has no such "divine parentage" as he affirms. "The first man was of the earth, earthy;" 1 Corth. xv., 47; such must of necessity be the condition of all his offspring, till a new birth takes place by the Spirit of God begetting in them a new life principle; that only can make a man possess a spiritual element; and it is a gift of God through the second Adam; for, "that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural (literally, animal;) afterwards that which is spiritual . . . the second man was the Lord from heaven," etc. 1 Corth. xv., 46, 47. Mr. Jukes sees this difficulty and endeavors to destroy its force; he says:

The apparent contradiction arises from the varying senses in which the same word "spiritual" may be used—either to mean a being with a spirit, or a being with the mind of God, and so what we call spiritual—and also from the fact that Paul is speaking here of fallen man and of that which "is sown a natural body," in "corruption" and "dishonor," not of man as he was, before he fell, and died to God and lost his image."

Thus our friend labors to extricate his theory from its palpable contradiction of Paul's testimony. But Paul is speaking of man before he fell; for he tells us, verses 44, 45, "There is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body; and so it is written (where? Gen. ii., 7), the first man Adam was made a living soul (literally, a soulical being); the last Adam was made a quickening spirit;" then Paul adds—"Howbeit, that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural" —animal, etc. Thus Paul was clearly speaking of the constitution of the two Adams; one was animal, the other was spiritual: the first had only an animal nature; the other was made a quickening spirit, or was possessed of a spiritual element, of which the other was destitute when he was made and before he fell. Man at his creation had no spiritual nature; there is not a testimony in the Bible to sustain such an assumption. He has not, never had, and never will have a "divine parentage," unless he is "begotten again by the Spirit of God."

On the text Luke iii., 38, Mr. Jukes may urge that though the words "the son" are not in the text they are implied, or understood. We reply, that must depend on circumstances which do not appear. If Adam had elsewhere in the Bible been distinctly called "the son of God," and the relation was a self-evident one, then the plea that the expression "the son" is implied here would be valid. For an example: It was a known fact that "Seth was the son of Adam." That fact had been explicitly stated in the early history of the race, and, therefore, though the words "the son" are not in the original in Seth's case, or any of the others named in the genealogy, yet the previous history makes it certain that the phrase "the son" is understood and properly supplied. But the case of Adam is entirely different; no Scripture affirms that he was "the son of God;" and hence it is not allowable in Luke iii., 38. Adam was of, or from God by creation, not by generation. God has but one Son by generation, so far as made known to us by revelation. That one Son was not the first Adam, but the second; "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son," etc. John iii., 16. That excludes the first Adam from being "the son of God;" and we are astonished at Mr. Jukes' assumption in building a theory on a text where the original does not warrant the interpolation of the phrase, and which contradicts Christ's own words, that to himself belongs the honor of being the "only begotten Son of God." This text completely destroys Mr. Jukes' assumption that God was the "Begetter, by his eternal Spirit, of Adam's life" in a sense which he affirms, viz., to make him "the son of God," and hence to make him eternal "because he is a son of God." He builds on the sand, and the floods of truth have swept away his foundation, and his superstructure goes along with it into the dead sea of a fancy theology.

We shall give Mr. Jukes' theology further notice hereafter, as we have time, that our readers may see what an "earthquake" in theology is at work to rid itself of the horrible doctrine of eternal torment, and yet keep all men in an eternal living existence. Let the war of elements rage on: God's eternal truth shall shine the brighter for it all.

THE "UNPREACHED GOSPEL."

THE following letter, received some two weeks since, we did not think to publish at the time; but having received "The Rainbow" from England, in the meantime, we have concluded to let Eld. Parry speak as to the effort in this country to go in for "another gospel" than that which the Apostle to the Gentiles preached. Eld. J. PARRY writes as follows:

SANDY HILL, N. Y., July 3, 1869.

BR. STORRS: The HERALD OF LIFE did not come to me last week. If you have a copy to spare, please to send one. I do not like to lose a link in that golden chain. Eld. J. Blain has been here for three weeks. I have seen him nearly every day. He is very zealous in advocating his Unpreached gospel; which I think with you is another gospel. I told him he was on the high road to the final restoration of all the race; and, if he lived a little longer, he would arrive just there. The notion has taken strong hold of his mind; and what people want to believe is easy to accomplish. Eld. B. was a "Hard-Shell" Baptist, and the notion of election, unconditional of a class, is still a prominent point in his creed.

Here then is first, an elect church, as rulers with Christ: second, all men raised on probation—most of them ultimately saved, so as to give Christ the majority, and cheat satan of his supposed victory, and make the character of God more glorious. This was the theme of his discourse with me: and knowing I was a believer in the future age, he was in hopes I should jump into his notions. I asked him a few questions he could not very well answer. How long is this probation to last, 30 years, 1,000 years, or 360,000 years? How was this immense multitude of mortals to be fed during that period? Were they still going to increase and multiply during this time? Would not real estate be at a premium? etc., I was glad to see your remarks in this week's HERALD OF LIFE on this subject. Those who advocate a mortal resurrection of all men, are likely to fall into this snare. Universalism, final Restorationism and Spiritism, threaten to wash the board. Orthodoxy has no artillery to silence these foes, and must knock under in the strife. "Life only in Christ" is the only sure defence against this mighty army. May God give us grace and strength to fight the good fight of faith, in hope of final victory. Truly the popular doctrine of the immortality of the soul, is yielding an abundant harvest of tares to smother the good seed of the kingdom.

But still the Lord reigns, and will make all these turmoils subserve to his glory, and the good of his people. Your's in hope of life.

J. PARRY.

A PROCLAMATION.

THE following curious document appeared in the "World's Crisis" last week. We give it entire, and respond to it by notes and counter documents.

SPRINGFIELD CAMP-MEETING.

As the time draws near for our Annual Convention and Camp-meeting to be held at Springfield, we shall be under the necessity of carrying out the object of the meeting,—what it was started for in the commencement; not to give every one who wishes, the privilege of pitching a tent on the ground, in which to hold separate meetings and conventions, as some have claimed of late. (1).

The privilege never was asked in the letters that we received, nor by the delegates from the brethren holding the "Life" views (so-called). (2) I see by an article in the "Herald of Life," from the pen of W. S. Campbell, of June 23d, presuming or hoping that a portion of the time at this meeting would be given to their interest. (3). Now for myself, without consulting either of the committee, I do not believe that any two parties so antagonistic in their views can work together in harmony. (4).

The brethren who have paid their money felt very much displeased with their course pursued last year and will feel still more so this year, if the purposes of the "Life" brethren (so-called) are carried out; who are now claiming more than they asked for at the first. (5).

I saw this morning, for the first time, Bro. Storrs' article in his paper of Sept. 23d, of last year, entitled, "Light Wanted," calling for the money paid by the so-called "Life" brethren to fit up the ground. Bro. Storrs not having seen the vote on the subject taken by the committee, presumed too much, I think. And as he calls for the money, after having had all the privileges asked for before a blow was struck toward fitting up the ground, and after reading the two articles above referred to, I am led to say to those brethren who paid in money to fit up the ground, and who authorized Bro. Storrs to call through the "Herald of Life" on the committee to refund it—Let all such present their bills to me, and you shall have your money back, if I have to beg it. I am satisfied that we can never work together in the capacity or a Camp-meeting and do any good. (6).

I have written the above on my own responsibility, without consulting the other members of the committee.

And again, I believe it is the right of the committee to say what publications shall be circulated on the ground; and only such as are calculated to build up the cause of Christ should be permitted a place there. (7).

HIRAM MUNGER.

(1). Let the author of this statement tell us of whom he speaks. If he means it for writers in the HERALD OF LIFE, it is not truthful. That he did mean it for them, the next paragraph seems to indicate.

(2.) Very well: then why insinuate what you have in the first paragraph?

(3.) Had you read W. S. Campbell's remarks with an unprejudiced mind you would not have made this erroneous statement. Every word Br. Campbell said on the subject is contained in the following paragraph:

"If we have our convention at Springfield, we shall need our Tent there. I am sure that nothing will be done by the Camp-meeting Committee that will either require us to withdraw it, or make it an object to do so. The suggestion of the R. I. Conference will not be acted upon this season, in all human probability."

Does this language justify you in saying what you have? Not at all. By the term "convention," Br. C. meant the anniversary of the "Life and Advent Union," which occupies one afternoon, and does not interfere with any body's business on the Camp ground. "The suggestions of the R. I. Conference," to which Br. C. refers, were suggestions to have us excluded from the Camp ground.

(4.) We are glad you speak only for yourself. It would have been much wiser, we think, if you had not spoken till you had "consulted" every one "of the committee." "One-man power" is not safe in these days. Please consult the committee, and let them make an official report, at once, if they intend to "cast us out of the synagogue." If one half of those who attend the camp-meeting were like yourself we should prefer not to be there; for you seem determined to be as "antagonistic" as possible. Eld. Grant, editor of the "Crisis," preached in our Tent, Sabbath morning, last year, and we found no "antagonism;" we seemed to "work together in harmony." All of us felt so, and we think he did. We do not think he partakes of your spirit, though presumed to be of your "party."

(5.) It is not true that we are "now claiming more than asked for at first." "The brethren who have paid their money," are, numbers of them, supporters of the HERALD OF LIFE. They certainly were not "displeased with their course pursued last year;" and their rights are not to be set aside because a few imbued with your spirit do not feel pleased with us.

(6.) In response to this paragraph we will, in the first place, give the article of "Sept. 23d," to which reference is made, and follow it with the reply from R. E. Ladd, who was, at that time, one of the Camp-meeting Committee. Read carefully, and see whether the above statement of H. M. is anything like fair.

LIGHT WANTED.

ELD. J. V. Himes, speaking of our preaching at the Springfield camp-meeting, among other things, says,

It should be understood, that some of the friends of Br. Storrs applied to the committee for the privilege to pitch their tent on the ground in connection with the annual Camp-meeting. They have paid a portion of the expenses of fitting up the ground, and enjoy the right of holding their own meetings, in subjection only to the general rules of the camp. The committee treated them in a liberal and Christian manner, though it is understood that they do not give countenance to their views of the non-resurrection of the wicked.

This statement is liable to mislead. If any of our "friends applied to the committee for the privilege to pitch" the LIFE AND ADVENT MISSION TENT on the camp ground at Springfield, it is unknown to us. We went there of right, as all of our "friends" understood it. They had been invited to help fit up the ground, and some of them had been appointed on the committee to help in the matter, and to solicit funds for the purpose; and, if we are not misinformed, members of the Life and Advent Union actually paid more than $500 for that object. Are we now to be told that we went there as a gracious privilege granted by a "Christian committee," provided we would behave well, and not violate "the general rules of the camp?" If these things are so, and Eld. Himes seems to know, we ask that "liberal and Christian manner"-ly committee to return to our friends the money they have received under "false pretences," or disavow such insinuations as proceed from Eld. H. We wish to deal with honorble men.

We have had enough, and more than enough, of this deceitful pretence of "brotherly love" while stabbing us by insinuations. We condemn no man because he dissents from our doctrinal views; nor withhold fellowship from him merely on that account. But the man who wilfully misrepresents our position, and deliberately covers up his own, holding to a mortal and simultaneous resurrection of all Adam's race, and yet spreads those views covertly, is a tax on our charity, we confess. We are sorry to be compelled to say thus much. But with Paul, we would say, "Let no man think me a fool;" if they do, let them "suffer fools gladly, seeing ye yourselves are wise." 2 Corth. xi., 16, 19.

"LIGHT" FURNISHED.

BR. STORRS: I noticed in the HERALD of Sept. 23d that "Light is wanted" concerning the relation the Life and Advent Union brethren sustain to the late camp-meeting in Springfield. As one of the Camp-meeting Committee, I would say, that no one, to my knowledge, ever applied to us for the "privilege" of pitching the Mission Tent there; but Br. J. C. Day and myself went to Br. Munger, of the Committee, to ascertain from him where it should be located, he being in charge of that department. Br. Munger aided us in selecting the very pleasant and desirable spot where it was pitched, and generously offered us our choice of any unoccupied place. It should be understood that we were not fully assured that Br. Wolcott's tent could be had until very near the time of the camp-meeting, and all the large tent locations had been selected. But I believe our brethren were well pleased with the spot selected, and would prefer it to either of the others on the ground.

I wish to say, in behalf of the brethren of the Committee, that they have never intimated, directly or indirectly, to my knowledge, that we had not the same rights and privileges on the camp ground that others had; and when they change their position in this respect I shall be among the first to know it, and "will sound the alarm." But it will not come. The "feeling" among brethren is surely becoming modified, and kindness and courtesy will subdue and overcome the opposition to the views we hold. It is only a question of time with every true child of God. They will all, sooner or later, "come to the knowledge of this truth," and rejoice in it as we rejoice. Only let us be patient, "forbearing one another in love."

There is but one sentiment respecting Br. Pratt's remarks at the close of Br. Storrs' discourse, and that is, it was improper, uncourteous, and out of place; but although it was designed to prevent any influence favorable to the doctrine of "Life only through Christ" being accomplished by that sermon, it had directly the opposite effect, for two or more persons, to my knowledge, who had previously doubted the truth of the non-resurrection of the unholy dead, and relied upon John v., 28, 29, for their proof were convinced by its quotation by Br. Pratt, at the time and place, and with the spirit manifested, that it was not in harmony with the doctrine that "God is love," and therefore could not be the teaching of that passage, and they are now firm believers of "Life only through Christ."

RANDOLPH E. LADD.

SPRINGFIELD, Mass., Oct., 1868.

Such is the true statement of the case; and our readers can judge where the truth lies, and what right the Camp-meeting Committee have even to insinuate an exclusion of us or our Tent from the camp ground: much less, has one man, who is so "antagonistic" that he can not speak peaceably of us, any right to attempt our exclusion.

As to what he says of our calling "for the money," paid by our friends, "after having had all the privileges asked for before a blow was struck toward fitting up the ground," our article of Sept. 23d, reprinted above, shows on what conditions we asked for it; it was only on the ground of their refusal to carry out honestly the stipulations on which our money was advanced; and now we are told that we have "had all the privileges asked for," etc; as if our friends paid their money for the privilege we had last year, and were to have none thereafter!

If such is H. M.'s idea of moral honesty, we have need of caution in dealing with him, and we shall by no means venture to trust him to give us "back the money" we paid toward fitting up the ground. Besides, it is not for his party to say we shall sell out our right at their bidding. They invited us to go in with them in the matter, with the assurance of unmolested occupation; and until we consent, freely, to go out, no power except mobocracy can put us out. They and retire and leave us, if that is their will; or, they can ask for a mutual conference, and we can separate by agreement. The latter is the proper course, if they wish a separation. Till then, we claim our right to pitch our Tent on our location of last year. If driven away by others, let the responsibility rest on them, and they will be likely to say, as did Cain, "My punishment is greater than I can bear." Gen. iv., 13.

(7.) The intolerance of this paragraph is too manifest to need comment. Its author would do for the dark ages, but is too late in his imperial enterprise.

THE PASSOVER SUPPER, ETC.

BR. STORRS: We have been desiring for some time to ask a few questions on the above subject. 1st. Have not "Life Believers" been observing the Passover, or Lord's Supper, at the first full moon after the spring equinox, for the last four or five years?

2d. Then why did they change it last spring to the second full moon after the spring equinox?

3d. When the first full moon after the equinox comes in March, what authority have we for changing the time one month later; or shall we all unite on the full moon in the month of April every year to observe the feast? The second full moon after the spring equinox nearly always comes in May, which seems to make it too late. All we want, is harmony on the above subject.

We have been arguing the yearly observance of the Lord's Supper at the first full moon after the spring equinox, for several years: now shall we turn around and change the time to the second?

Did not Moses command Israel to keep the Feast of the Passover on the 14th day of the first month, (Abib, or Nisan) and does not the year begin at the new moon nearest the spring equinox? And did not Jesus eat the Passover at the right time with his disciples? and did He not institute the Lord's Supper at that time, the night in which he was betrayed?

Another query we wish to present. Is "Life Believers" the true, and scriptural name for the followers of Jesus? Will it not lead into sectarianism to acknowledge a name that is not authorized in the word of God? Why not adopt a Bible name? "The Church of God" embraces all the true followers of Jesus wherever they may be: but "Life Believers," many of them, may not belong to "The Church of God." But light, and harmony is all we desire on the above subjects.

W. H. WHITMAN.

GALESBURG, ILL., June, 1869.

RESPONSE BY THE EDITOR.

To question "1," We answer, Yes.

QUES. "2." It was changed for reasons we gave in the HERALD, March 17, page one, 3d column, last paragraph; which, please see. But this change was not binding on any who do not see sufficient reason for it.

QUES. "3" is answered in the reply to question "2." The reason there given seems, at present, conclusive; but we do not consider it essential which moon is selected; yet it is desirable that we should be agreed on one or the other. Br. Whitman may be right in fixing on the first, or Rabbinical time.

As to the name "Life Believers," we care nothing for it only as designating those who profess faith in "Life only in Christ." It may lead to sectarianism, which we should regret; but so may the name "Church of God." We have seen that in Pennsylvania; holding that name, they are as sectarian as any others. If all names could be dropped, and all believers in Jesus, in a given location, be called "The Church of God" in that place, we would rejoice greatly in such a manifestation of unity. But we despair of seeing that take place in this age. There is no binding authority for calling believers "The Church of God," though the apostle Paul did so call them in the various places where they were located. But, in these days, for any class of believers to assume that appellation would be thought extra sectarian, and most likely would result in sectarianism of the strongest character. But let all things be done in charity. We believe any class of Christians are strictly prohibited from taking a man's name for their motto.

So far as we accept the name of "Life Believers" we feel justified, from the fact that the term SAVIOUR literally signifies LIFE-GIVER; and the term "save," as applied to benefits received by Christ, signifies life: divine life communicated embryotically in this present state, and fully developed and made permanent at and by the resurrection "at the last day." Christ being the author and finisher of all this is truly the LIFE-GIVER, and it is to believers in Him that this result pertains; and we know the scriptures command men, where this gospel comes, to "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt have life." The person therefore may properly be called a "Life Believer" without the violation of any Bible principle or command. The expression is scriptural in fact, if not in form; hence, we sometimes employ it to save words, and not for any sectarian purpose; but no one is bound to accept or use it, if conscientiously scrupulous about it.

To organize churches, and give them this name, is another matter; and we would be opposed to it, with present light.

A STRAW FOR THE DROWNING.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

EZEK. xviii., 26. "For his iniquity that he hath done shall he die." The believer in "torment after death," such as shall kill the sinner after he has been dead once, endeavors to show that here we have proof that the sinner will die again for his sins, as he had once died in them.

Let us look at the whole subject. "The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him" [not on his son]. "The wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him" [not on another]. Now, to make this sentiment clear, and state it strongly, the prophet, by the Spirit, states that, "If the wicked turn from his wickedness . . . he shall surely live. He shall not die." Does this torment man suppose that the Spirit means to say that after the wicked man has turned to sin, and is dead, as a man, he shall not die? or, he presents that the confirmation by saying he shall not die, after having said he shall live? A moment's reflection and thought upon the expression of Scripture would be sufficient to settle this question.

"When a righteous man has turned away from his righteousness shall he live? In his trespass that he hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die." To show the strong contrast in the condition, as well as the certainty of God's judgment, the declaration is virtually repeated. "He shall die in them," on the one hand; "He shall not die," on the other.

Now, in the great passage in which he says the sinner shall die for his iniquity, he also says that he shall die in them; and the dying in them is twice mentioned, in this connection, as a penalty. The reason for this dying is given; "For his iniquity that he hath committed he shall die."

There is no reason given why the iniquity for which he dies is not the same one in which he dies; nor is there the least reason to suppose that the death in his sins is not the same as that which he dies for his sins.

There is a way to torture certain passages till they will serve the purpose which people wish; but this, like the one in the New Testament, is like "drowning men catching at a straw." The one in the New Testament is the remarkable new rendering in 1 Cor. xv., in which we are so gravely told that "end" means remainder, and so, catching at a straw, the whole force of the apostle's language is neglected; for the apostle talks of an order, or "regiment," of which Christ is the "first fruits," or first-born from the dead.

Here there is an order; but some will catch again, and tell us that two classes will not make an order, as two trees will not make a row. That Christ, the first fruits, and they that are Christ's at his coming, are not enough to make an order.

They might say that Aaron's priesthood was not an order, because it took in Aaron and his descendants; or that there was no order of Melchisedec, because there was but one man in it, and much more so, for Christ was the Second in it, and it was an order for about seventeen centuries before that. But we have three classes here, if they will insist upon it; the straw will float out, 1. "Christ the first fruits;" 2. Those who were raised when he was; for they were saints. 3. "Afterwards they that are Christ's at his coming."

I have heard this passage in Ezekiel paraded by men who, I really thought, presumed on the credulity of the hearer.

THE OLD TESTAMENT SCRIPTURES.

BY ELD. B. MATTHIAS.

I AM assured in my mind, beyond all doubt, that the Old Testament is a perfect system of doctrines, for faith as well as for precepts and practice; and suitable for all time and all nations. This was evinced in the conduct of our Lord; for this, He sent forth the twelve and seventy to preach the gospel of the kingdom to the Jews exclusively. It was not a new subject to them. They had no dislike to the subject: but the proclamation was in favor of Jesus of Nazareth as the legitimate heir to the throne of David. Him they opposed because he insisted upon the authority of the Scriptures, and would not accept of the tradition of the elders.

Furthermore, when the gospel was refused, in other words, when they would not accept of the kingdom, and it was necessarily postponed for a season, He determined to fill up the period intervening by offering it to all other people. Hence, he sent forth the same preachers, with the same message, without alteration or amendment. The guests must be had; the subjects must be politicaly educated; all nations duly informed that God had a kingdom in abeyance for this world, and a King, after his own heart, to reign in this kingdom. Kings and rulers are admonished of it. "Yet have I set my Son upon my holy hill of Zion," etc. Psa. ii.

"This gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come." Math. xxiv., 14. It is rendered in Mark, "And the gospel must first be published among all nations." The relation stands in Mark. It was done before the rise of abomination of desolation.

It appears to me, it is our right to demand of all Protestant opponents that they go to the same authority that Jesus accepted, and sent every body to. The apostles also bowed reverently to the holy scriptures, and proved every doctrine they paeached by the scriptures. Our Lord told the Saducees that they erred, not knowing the scriptures. All apostacies are from the same cause. The Romanists, interdicted its use, and all Protestant sects, unwillingly, but very stupidly, have done the same thing without intending it. All Sabbath schools, and many poor people, and the heathen world, have been impressed with the idea that the Old Testiment is like last year's almanac—peculiar to another age, and an obsolete people. By publishing New Testaments, and distributing them, they say to the world, "This is the important Book for the common people; they can't understand the Old." I have times without number heard appeals from the Old to the New Testament in argument, as if the Testaments were antagonists. I know another thing among preachers: the measure of their dignity was guaged by their indifference to the prophecies.

LANESFIELD, KANSAS, July 1869.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—While we fully agree with the writer of the foregoing in the importance of the Old Testament scriptures, and the impossibility of understanding the New without them; and, also, in his condemnation of the neglect of the study of the Old Testament and appealing to it as a standard of doctrine and prophecy, we must dissent from what seems to be his idea, as expressed in his first sentence, viz., "A perfect system . . . suitable for all time and all nations." So far as doctrine and prophecy is concerned that is true; but so far as very many ordinances, regulations and practices are concerned, it cannot be true, if we accept the New Testament testimony. Many things were "imposed on them (the Jews) until the time of reformation." Heb. ix., 9, 10. When the Priesthood was "changed there is made of necessity a change also of the law." Heb. vii, 12. Again, "the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope," etc.: verse 19. The general position of the value and importance of the Old Testament is not to be questioned; but we must not make the two witnesses clash: the same Spirit inspired both, and they must therefore be in harmony.

Letters and Extracts.

FROM ELD. WILLIAM ROWORTH.

DETROIT, MICH., July 10, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I cut the following remarkable statement from the "Detroit Post" of July 9, 1869. If you think it worthy of an insertion in our excellent paper, you will oblige by putting it in.

There is a rock in Jacksonville, Alabama, discovered two years ago, that has plain ciphers of 1870 in large figures upon its face, and the ciphers are evidently formed there by the same hand that formed the rock; for it is plain that it is no device of man. And equally mysterious, the discoverer was directed to it by a voice from a person that he could not see, and the voice said, the ciphers were a living witness of a new era in the world's history, and of the terrible day spoken of, soon to come.

I had the privilege last Sabbath of preaching to a congregation in Detroit, who call themselves the "Church of God" formerly they went by the name of the "Tabernacle Baptists;" but they have dropped that name. I spoke to them in the morning on the Second Advent, as I understood there were some among them who believed in the nearness of the event. In the afternoon, I spoke from Daniel ii., 44, on the setting up of Christ's kingdom, and showed them the nearness of the event. After the sermon, before I closed the service, I took the opportunity to state that I had a number of "Campaign Documents," which they could have gratis. Some came and took them; but others were afraid to touch them. Several were very much interested in the truth I presented, and were anxious to read on the subjects; especially, among the sisters. God bless them; they are always foremost in the Master's cause.

Since I left home I have been scattering some good seed; but I find some that fight hard against the truth; but we have got to sow by the side of all waters, not knowing whether this or that will prosper, or both be alike good. I have heard some four sermons since I left home; and I find the preachers still talk about the "Death that never dies;" and Paul's desiring to depart, as a disembodied spirit, to be with Christ. Such nonsenses Oh, my heart is pained to hear such preaching. May the Lord open their eyes to see the truth. I find I can do more good in talking to people privately, as it gives them an opportunity to ask questions. I never felt stronger in the truths of "No life out of Christ" than I do now. This is to me the crowning truth. May the good Lord speed it, is the prayer of your unworthy brother in Christ, the great LIFE-GIVER. Amen.

NOTE BY THE EDITOR.—We have inserted the item Br. Roworth sent us simply as a curiosity, to let our readers see what fancies men can hatch up when not contented with the word. The man who made the professed discovery was, no doubt, carried away with some fancy of his being some sort of an "Elijah." Plenty such can be found this side "Arkansas."

FROM M. M. EASTMAN.

LANDAFF, N. H., July 11, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I send $2, and wish you to send me the HERALD OF LIFE. I am not in full faith with you about the wicked dead not being raised to life, yet I love to read both sides of a thing, and am willing to investigate. It is a blessed doctrine, if true, to let the dead wicked remain forever dead, who have spurned the offers of life. All that a man hath will he give for his life; and "the wages of sin is death:" and I am sure it is a punishment to lose life, to fail of an entrance into that blessed paradise of God, promised to all who seek for eternal life. Yet there are some passages not quite explained to my satisfaction about the second death; all that are in the graves shall come forth; they that have done evil, as well as they that have done good.

We received tracts from your office last March. I read them with much interest. I have been convicted upon the subject ever since. Before I read them, that doctrine looked like awful infidelity to me. I wondered how you could believe it; but the spirit of your writings sounded good, and much sound reasoning; and I much hope it is all true.

Many people in this town remember you well. We should like to see you here much. I saw you and Mrs. Storrs at Springfield last fall, and I never saw two of your ages, before, look so young and fair. I saw you some eight or ten years before, and you look younger now than then.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—We well remember Landaff, N. H. That was the first circuit we ever travelled as a Methodist preacher. We went there in June, 1825. There our only and beloved son was born, who now lies in the dust, "asleep in Jesus," waiting for the resurrection morning. He fell asleep in Feb., 1867, aged 41 years. God has preserved our life; and it is true that we look younger now than we did ten years ago; but we cannot go through so much continuous labor. Our life and health are consecrated to God and his beloved Son, while it lasts.

We would much like to visit old Landaff and proclaim Jesus and the resurrection among the old places where our first labors were put forth, according to the light we then had. God has wrought wonders for us since. All glory to His name for the heavenly peace, and love that He has given us in these last days.

FROM O. O. ROGERS.

BETHEL, VT, July 11, 1869.

BR. STORRS: To all the brethren and sisters scattered abroad, peace be multiplied unto you. I love to hear from you through the HERALD OF LIFE, as the Spirit of holiness shall move you to write. May we all have greater hungerings and thirstings after righteousness, that we may be filled with love and peace, and have joy and rejoicing in God the fountain of all good. Glory to His name for his mercy: his loving kindnesses endure forever. It was one of His mercies that gave the HERALD OF LIFE to the world. Truly it is a herald of the life to come; and as the approaching anniversary of the Life and Advent Union draws near, I pray God that its members and friends may be filled with that love that moves the world and keeps it from destruction; and will, until the time appointed of the Father, when the just shall be hidden in their Saviour, the tower of the flock. Alleluia to His name. He then will come to bring us into the inheritance, Eden restored, Paradise regained, the earth made glorious for the inhabitants thereof, that none shall say, I am sick; where eternal youth shall for ever bloom. What but love and mercy would ever move any Being to make such provisions for His creatures; and He has said, "No good thing will He withhold from them that walk uprightly." Glory to his name for ever and ever. When our hope is changed to the blessed reality, then will we shout "Glory, honor, majesty and power be unto our God, for ever and ever."

Brethren and sisters, live rejoicing, meet in love, dwell in unity and part in peace, that we may all meet in glory with our blessed Head, and be crowned victor with Him, with immortality, eternal life. Glory to God for the promise of such beautiful realities. Yours in hope of "inheriting all these things."

FROM WM. FORRESTER.

DUNDEE, N. Y., July 12, 1869.

BR. STORRS: I am truly thankful for the favor of living in this day and age when so many of God's servants are running to and fro, and knowledge is increasing very fast in the world; not only in the arts and sciences, but wise in religious investigation. I feel to praise the Lord daily for what I see and hear from various sources, about home and abroad. I feel that I am highly favored of my Lord and Master with his Holy Spirit, the blessed Bible and Christian society; also, two of the best religious papers which are published in America, viz., the HERALD OF LIFE and the "World's Crisis." I do hope and pray the Lord to help the editors of both to stand fast in defence of all Bible truth, until He shall say, It is enough; enter thou into the Coming Kingdom, which is soon to be set up under the whole heavens, when the wicked shall cease from troubling Christians, and all the faithful weary shall be at rest.

I am truly glad to see my brethren and sisters are not getting weary in well doing in writing so many good letters, which are so well calculated to stir up our pure minds by way of remembrance of the position we are occupying. I was very much pleased to see Br. J. Lewis is yet in the good old field of labor, with his face Zionward. He once came and staid with me, a few years ago, two weeks and preached several good sermons, in the Six Nations' school-house, on my farm, near Tyrone, N.Y., with good, full houses, and good results.

It seems we don't see eye to eye yet, in all things; but the time, I think, is very near, if we rightly understand our chart; as we certainly should, as Columbus did his when he was in pursuit of this Continent. I think that is a most beautiful figure of illustration.

I sent to Br. Spencer of Rochester for a lot of his new Tracts. He sent them to me, viz., the DIVINE PLAN. It is truly an excellent work, and others say so who read it generally, as I have given away the most of them in order to let the light shine, as our Saviour says. Math. v. I attended a good Methodist camp-meeting at North Hecter, on the east side of Seneca Lake, on June 25th, last. I gave away nearly twenty copies of the HERALD and "Crisis," where I thought they would be appreciated. In the fear of God, I am bound to reflect light as committed to our hands. The people will read and hear, if we only present it in the spirit and love of God. Several have told me, lately, they would go some miles to hear an Adventist preach; and some of the best men in this country have told me so; but we have none of that kind of preaching about here. I should like much to have the Tent come to Elmira; and if you would like to come there, you may write to Br. J. R. Cooper about it, at Elmira, N. Y. I want the brethren to read Math., viii., 21, 22, in view of the first and second death; as there are two deaths there mentioned.

WM. H. SALSBURY, Scituate, R. I., writes: I would let you know how the battle goes in this northwest part of R. I. Two years ago we were four in number, and one would have thought the world was going to be turned upside down to hear the cry against us for advocating the doctrine of "No Life out of Christ." They said, it was "false doctrine and ought to be put down." We said, "To the law and to the testimony, if they speak not according to this word it is because there is no light in them." So we have kept to work, and our numbers have been increasing. There is now about twelve. Our second-death brethren called for a Br. B., and we were invited to hear him. We asked for liberty to ask a few questions, but they would not allow it. Feeling we should do something to get the truth before the people, more than we had done, we determined on a grove-meeting on the 4th and 5th of July. We gave notice that Br. Rufus Wendell would preach the word of life. We had a blessed time, notwithstanding a tent-meeting in another place at the same time. We had on the 4th from three to four hundred to hear. The result is, a spirit of investigation was excited, and some confess we have the truth. Your Br. in Christ.

AARON KIMBALL, Natick, Mass., writes: There is a Methodist preacher here with whom I have had some talk on the Life theme. In our conversation he said, there was not anything which could be destroyed. I asked, if you burn a barn to ashes is not that barn destroyed as a barn? He said, No. I replied, it is, or you can keep your horse in it as before. If he could, I think it would be a very cold one in winter. He also said, "A man can think without brains." It surprises me to hear what men will say to evade the truth.

REMARK BY THE EDITOR.—Remember, some "men love darkness rather than light." "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets," it is no wonder they pervert the words of Christ and the Apostles, and follow their own traditions. Keep the truth a-blazing, but do not spend breath on a man that does not know the difference between ashes and a barn; it is time thrown away. Doubtless his thinking is performed with a very small brain, if he has any at all. Let such have our pity and prayers: but to reason with them is a hopeless matter.

SALT.

F. G., in the Prairie Farmer says that, "salt is good to the farmer in various ways. Let him use it abundantly. Aside from the benefits which stock derive from it, it is good to wash your seed grain in. Make a strong brine, and stir the wheat in it. This will float all the oats in it, and the foul, light seed, and your grain will be the better for it. The straw will be lighter, somewhat, and also stiffer—not so soon disposed to lodge. Being healthier, it also has a tendency to ward off disease—smut in particular. The berry of your grain will be improved. This is especially the case where land is far removed from the sea or the presence of salt water, and no salt is found naturally in the soil, but particularly on elevated dry land. Salt here is one of the best manures that can be applied. Sow on the meadows in the fall, or early in the spring. Sow five or six bushels to the acre. On plowed land, sow after the grain. This is no longer theory. All our best farmers have tried it and adopted it more or less. In the cases we have indicated on dry, elevated soil, destitute of salt, the benefit is a sure one, and pays highly. Salt is beginning to be appreciated on soil.

THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION.

THE next anniversary of the "Union" will be held on Thursday, September 2, in Springfield, Mass. We hope all our friends, far and near, who can possibly be present, will not fail to be there. The meeting this year will, probably, be one of the most important that we have ever held; and all who can aid in our work we shall be pleased to see, that we may consult together, and devise means for greater efficiency in the glorious cause of truth which we have been called of God to advance, as we firmly believe. Let us all so far forecast in our affairs as to give the time necessary for this anniversary.

"The National Advent Camp meeting" is to be held at the same place, commencing August 28th, and to be continued till Sept. 6th. Many from all parts of the country will meet at that time.

Poetry.

Looking Backward.

Looking backward, ever backward,
Thinking ever of the past,
Thinking of life's dawning glories,
Mourning that they fade so fast.
Sitting in the purple twilight
Of a sorrow-shaded day,
Mourning for the gleam of brightness,
Drifting, drifting fast away.
Looking backward, ever backward,
O'er the rolling tide of time,
See we naught through mist and darkness
Floating down its stream sublime?
Naught but glimmering wreck and fragment
By the tempest torn and tossed;
Naught but phantoms, pale and silent,
Of the lovely and the lost.

Looking backward, through the shadows,
Eyes grow dim and cheeks grow pale;
All the buds of promise wither,
All the dews of mercy fail;
Hearts grow faint and feet grow weary,
Feeble hands their tasks forget;
Life grows dark with dull repining,
Selfish grief and vain regret.

Looking backward, ever backward,
Never shall we grasp them more,
Tenderest hopes and dearest treasures,
Wrecks along a vanished shore;
Never shall our faith grow clearer,
Blinded thus in tears and pain;
Never, never looking backward,
Shall the soul its rest attain.
Forward, o'er the tossing billows,
To the light that shines from far,
Homeward guiding all the weary,
Where the many mansions are,
Strength, and hope, and conrage gaining,
Life renewed from day to day,
Pressing onward, looking upward,
Never pausing by the way.

Pressing onward, looking upward,
Clouds and darkness disappear,
Gleams of heaven's eternal glory
Shine upon us drawing near;
Weeping, praying, hoping, striving,
Though our toils seem oft in vain,
We shall find the pearl gates open,
Find our loss eternal gain.

Anger is Murder.

We may learn a lesson on the sixth commandment from a little girl named Alice. One evening her mother had company, and her elder sister, Sarah, took her up stairs to put her to bed.

As Sarah was undressing her, she noticed that she seemed very sad, and that tears were running down her cheeks. She asked her what was the matter; but Alice gave her no answer "Tell me, child what ails you," said Sarah. Still Alice said nothing; only she sighed, and seemed greatly troubled. When it was time to kneel down by her little bed and pray, Alice knelt, and bowed her head; but no word came from her lips. Sarah thought this was very strange. Then Alice arose, and crept into her bed, so silent, so sad, so tearful that Sarah was frightened. She went down stairs and joined the company, but seized the opportunity of mentioning it to her mother.

"I will run up directly," said she, "and see what ails the child."

"She is not sick, mother," said her sister, "only it seems as if something were troubling her mind."

Presently the mother escaped from the parlor, and went up to the chamber of her little one. She trod very softly, and as she drew near, she heard low sobs and cries.

"My child," said her mother, tenderly, stooping down to her bedside, "what troubles you. Tell me."

"Oh, mother, I am so glad you have come!" cried Alice, uncovering her head, and seizing her mother's hand; "I can't say my prayers, and I can't go to sleep."

"Do tell me what's the matter with my dear daughter."

"Oh, mother, I killed cousin Ruth in my heart to day, I did!" and the tears flood afresh. "She got angry, and I wished her dead. That makes me a murderer. I can't ask God's forgiveness till I am friends with Ruth. He won't forgive me, for my heart has had anger and hatred in it."

"Oh, mother!" and the poor child wept as though her heart would break.

Her mother tried to comfort her; but there lay the cold heavy weight of sin upon her bosom, and she could take no comfort.

"Oh if I could only see Ruth, and ask her forgiveness, then I could pray, and go to sleep," she said, piteously.

"Mother, can't I go to Ruth's house?"

Her mother thought a moment. She felt to help her child to feel and act rightly on this subject was the most important of all things. "Yes, my child, you shall go," she said.

Ah! if she had been one of those mothers who always send their children to bed in charge of servants, what a golden opportunity she would have lost of doing her child good for life!

Alice's father was called, who, wrapping his weeping child in a blanket, carried her into the next house, where her cousin Ruth lived. She was taken to Ruth's bedside. It was a melting scene to witness the confession, the entreaty for forgiveness, and the kiss of reconciliation. Then Alice wiped away her tears; and, laying her head on her father's shoulder, she asked to be carried home.

Once more in her own chamber, Alice knelt down and prayed God to forgive her for the sin of hating Ruth. "Give me love in my heart she cried, earnestly, "because 'God is love;' and because it was love which made Jesus die on the cross for us; and oh, keep me from hating and killing anybody in my heart!"

So did little Alice pray. Oh, what a prayer was that! Sin and conscience, love and hatred had been fighting in her heart. But love gained the victory. Can we not remember feeling toward somebody just as Alice felt toward Ruth? Let us learn from the example of Alice what to do. We should ask the forgiveness of those toward whom we have felt anger or hatred. Then we should ask God's forgiveness, and pray for His grace to take away all these wicked feelings from our hearts, and fill them with love.

Whene'er the angry passions rise,
And tempt our thoughts and tongues to strife,
To Jesus let us lift our eyes,
Bright pattern of the Christian life.

His fair example let us trace,
To teach us what we ought to be;
Make us, by Thy transforming grace,
Dear Saviour, daily more like Thee?

Bible Analysis.

BY ELD. WM. P. SHOCKEY.

"Let not your hearts trouble you Ye believe in God, believe in me also. In my Father's house are many mansions. Were it not so I would have told you; I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go away I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am there ye may be also." John xiv., 1, 14.

Many infer that if Jesus had to go away to "prepare a place for the believers, he must prepare it where he was. Where was he? "On the throne of God, in heaven above." 1 Pet. iii., 22. Is it reasonable to believe that heaven would need preparing to receive his saints? Does heaven get out of order? No, surely. Again, is it reasonable that the Christ can't be in heaven and prepare another place for them, when we all know that a man can live in New York and prepare a house in Omaha city for his child, and never be there at all? It is not.

Well, once more the Bible must settle whether we are to go to heaven to get the place he will prepare. Now listen. Jesus says: "No man has ascended up to heaven but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of man who is in heaven." John iii., 13. This is a prophetic statement, and applies up to the time when the Son of man has descended from heaven. For he was not in heaven when he said this, but on earth. He had not ascended then, neither descended. But after he gave this promise he ascended. When John wrote, and as I write, he is in heaven; and he will come down from heaven as ye see him go up into heaven. Acts. i., 11. Thus when our King comes again, he can literally say yet, "No man has ascended into heaven but he who came down, even the Son of man who is in heaven."

This, then, is a statement of "calling those things that are not, as though they were." Rom. iv., 13. Then what kind of a Christian faith is that which says, "I felt, when first I found peace, as though I would be glad to die, because I would then go and be with Jesus?" Simply, a faith in the wisdom of men. Now look at the word, John xiii., 33: "Little children, yet a little while I am with you. Ye shall seek me, and as I said to the Jews, so say I to you, whither I go ye cannot come." This cannot be death, for they could come there. It cannot be death, because he told them in verse 36, "Thou canst not follow me now, but thou shalt follow me afterwards" alluding to death. Well, if the Apostles could not go to heaven at all, much less at death, where is any chance for us to go to heaven at death, or any other time.?

Well, I will give you a fair hearing. You say, Peter said, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath begotten us again to a lively hope, by the resurrection from the dead; to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, which fadeth not away, preserved in heaven for you, who are kept through faith unto the salvation ready to be revealed in the last time." 1 Pet. i., 3, 5.

Now, here the inheritance is reserved in heaven; and how can we get it unless we go there, and receive it? Truly well thought of. If your father had left you an inheritance in England, reserved there for you, could you not get it without going there for it? If it were $10,000 I think you could fix a plan to get it even without going there. Well then, may we not get it without going to heaven for it? This will depend on the order of the donor. Now see verse 5: "Ready to be revealed;" not for us to go to. Again verse 13, "for the grace that is to be brought to you at the salvation of Jesus Christ." This looks as if he will bring us our reward. See Rev. xxii., 12. "I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give to every man as his works shall be."

Now let us see if John xiv., 1, 5 does not exactly harmonize with all these. It could be true that he could have arranged for us to go to him, but it must be just as he has set. Well, He says, "I will come again and receive you to myself, that where I am you may be also." If they went to him at death, or any other time, there would be no need of his coming, which he says he will do as sure as he has gone away. Now you can not find a place where he will go back and take them with him.

Then the remaining question is, What mansion in the Father's universe will you prepare? Hear, "His brightness shall be recompensed in the earth." Prov. xi., 31. Not in heaven, beyond the skies!

Again. "The righteous shall never be received;" but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth." Prov. x., 30. "For the upright shall dwell in the land, and the perfect shall remain in it." Prov. ii., 21. "But the meek shall inherit the earth." Psa. xxxvii., 11. "Those who wait on the Lord, they shall inherit the earth." Verse 9. "The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell in it forever." Verse 29. "And he shall exalt thee to inherit the Land for ever." Verse 34.

The Lord Jesus knew the place he would prepare. Hear, "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the earth," Math. v., 5.

Then "Let not your hearts trouble you; believe in God, believe also in Jesus." "He that believes in me, though he were dead yet shall he live." John xi., 25. "He that lives and believes on me shall never die." John xi., 26. There is no other name given under heaven whereby we can be saved but in the name of Jesus. What must I do, "Believe and thou shalt be saved." Acts xvi, 31. Repent and be baptized every one in the name of the Lord for remission of sins, and you shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit Life from the dead is its gift. "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ's in God; when Christ, who is one life, shall appear, then." Oh then—"shall we appear with him in glory." Because, "know ye not, that ye are all the children of God by faith in Christ; for as many as have been baptized into Christ have put on Christ." Amen.

Aspinwall, Neb., July, 1869.

From Wm. Steele.

Arkansaw, Wis., June 25, 1869.

Br. Storrs: It is now about two months since I wrote to you for some tracts. Well, just the Sabbath after I sent for them the Baptist preacher who preaches at this place, announced that he would preach next time he came, which would be in two weeks, on the subject of the devil, demons, &c., Fortunately, the tracts came to me before he gave the discourse; and after hearing it, I announced that I would read a small pamphlet on the same subject, but it would show a different view of it. After the meeting was dismissed the preacher came to me and wanted one of the tracts, if I could let him have it, which I did. Well, next time he came he gave notice that he would criticise the tract next time he came, which would not be for four weeks, as he had to go to an Association within that time; but the time came, and he criticised it in nothing short of a malignant spirit and weak arguments.

I endured all until he spoke of what he called the "no soul doctrine." He said, it made man on the level with the monkey, and according to it, the Apostle Paul had no existence. Then I spoke and said, "Nobody believed that." He affirmed he had heard an Adventist say so; and wanted me to say what had become of Paul. I said his life was hid with Christ in God; and he was asleep in Jesus; and when Christ who is our life shall appear, &c. But the worst of the criticism was, he insinuated to the audience that you did not believe that Christ was without sin. When you said Christ "was tempted in all points like as we are." Why he asked, did you not add, and yet without sin? and he added, you had not said so in all the tract. Now I wish you would answer his question either in the paper, or by letter to me, and I will read it to him and the people the first opportunity. I can tell them there was no necessity for your adding it; but a denial of the wicked insinuation from you, I think, would have the better effect.

I read the tract on the "Devil, Satan, and Demons" at Frankfort, also, where I have held three meetings besides. I spoke on Christ being raised from the dead according to Paul's Gospel the first time; the knowledge of God the second time, and the salvation of the soul the third time. I believe I received help from God. The Methodist preacher had a blow out one day lately, against a doctrine that he said was held by a class of people, and was propagated by self-constituted preachers, and otherwise: he said the words soul and spirit were translated from the Greek word pneuma, which signified sometimes wind or breath; and the class he spoke of maintained these words always meant wind or breath. He then went on to show what sense it made of some places. I asked him for his authority for the class of people that held that doctrine; but he could not give it. I told him I should publish that there was no such class until he gave his authority for it. I told him, too, soul is never translated from pneuma. Yours in Jesus. Hope thou in God.

Note by the Editor.—Some men "strain out a gnat and swallow a camel." It was so in our Saviour's day, and is so now. To fix on the mere omission of "yet without sin," in our tract, when the whole pamphlet goes to show that though "tempted in all points like as we are," yet He triumphed over all and through all, defeating at all points and in every case the assaults to evil of sin. But "drowning men catch at straws:" thus did the Baptist minister Br. Steele speaks of. The Methodist minister betrayed his ignorance and is to be pitied. Fear not, Br. Steele. With the "smooth stones" of truth keep up the war, and the Goliaths will fall, and lose all their armor, if not their heads.

From A. D. Krewson.

Harrison, Ohio, June 26, 1869.

Br. Storrs: I am happy to say, I am now a free man. I have been expelled from the so-called Christian Church for teaching heresy. I have been, and still am teaching to the best of my ability, that man is mortal, and no future life out of Christ. They expelled me for teaching the truth as it is in Jesus, and did it in secret without my knowing of it, notwithstanding I was at their 11 o'clock meeting, and I taught my class in the morning, at nine, and not one word said about a trial. Two weeks after, one of the Elders having returned, after a short absence, demanded that they should give me a trial. Accordingly I was cited to trial too weeks later. When the minutes were read, it showed that they had expelled me at the previous meeting. One of the Elders objected to having the minutes read and said, they could get along better without the minutes. When there was none to accuse me face to face, I acknowledged that, "after the manner that they call heresy so worshipped I the God of my fathers." They said that was enough. I had acknowledged that I was teaching heresy. One of the brethren corrected him, and said, I acknowledge that after the manner that they called heresy, so worshipped I the God of my fathers.

Now, Br. Storrs, you may make any use of this letter you please. I think a great amount of good might be done if some good brother would come this way and preach the truth, and the whole truth, and show the necessity of Christ's coming, instead of going to him at death, and making death the door to endless bliss. I will see that he is well taken care of while here, and a house to preach in. I have distributed a great many tracts I got of Brother C. Franke, and the people are anxious to hear of this sect so much spoken against. They call us "Infidels," because we don't "believe as they do. There are several of the same faith in our neighborhood and a prospect of more. Send to my address two dollars worth of tracts for distribution.

I should have told you that they, the Elders of the so-called Christian church at this place, granted a letter of commendation to a gentleman after he had told them in my presence that he did not believe that Jesus Christ was the Son of God; and they offered to receive a gentleman of our place that was well known to be a Universalist, without change of faith; and at the time of my expulsion, my wife and son both requested that they would expel them for heresy also, as they believed and taught to the utmost of their ability the same as I did. My son said he would prepare himself and teach it more than his father ever did. Still they did not expel either of them until he called ont hem again, and made the same demand. They still hold my wife a member against her will.

Dr. J. F. Lee, Monroe, N. C., writes: I send you one dollar for the tracts received; they have all been distributed, and will do good. May the eternal God be thy refuge, and robe you in vigor of body and mind, firm as ever fearlessly to promulgate the truth as it is in Jesus, in whose name I would, had I a million, freely give it as I now do the only dollar I have in the world. I have for years been fully persuaded that the most effectual way to promulgate the truth is to distribute tracts, such as contain the Gospel truth. The sermonizing of the present day (much of it), and for centuries past, is a species of Theologasterizing—giving a conspicuous prominence to the most mischievous vagaries of a delusive imagination. The article "To Our Readers," in the Herald, deserves the serious and solemn consideration of every reader of the paper. Of what use is a knowledge of the truth unless it sanctifies? If it does not do this, it inevitably proves a Saviour of death unto death. If the truth does not make free, what is the consequence?-Voluntary slavery. Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty. Then shall ye know the truth, and the truth shall make you free. It is but very little I am able to do in some respects, and I must be content with whatever my Heavenly Father pleases to send me, knowing that all things work together for good for them that love Him. "If ye love me, keep my commandments." All else is vanity of vanities.

Note by the Editor. We have sent you another small package of tracts. Do not think you must pay for them. We will be glad to send you many more, if you will let us know what ones you want most. Scatter all you can, and when out, let us know, and we will send more, if we have them.

Eagle and Serpent: A Battle.

In the month of August, 1834, I was sailing up the Ohio River on board the fine steamer Warcousto, Capt. Norman, when, as we approached a noted spot on the river called the "Robber's Cave," my attention was attracted by several loud screams. I looked above where the sound seemed to originate, and saw an eagle describing circles in the air in a most beautiful and graceful manner. As it wheeled around in its gyrations with mathematical precision, with outstretched but motionless wings, it ever and anon uttered the peculiar scream which first drew my attention. While I was gazing in admiration at its elegant curves it suddenly changed its motion and descended with almost inconceivable velocity in a perpendicular line to the earth. It went down, as one of the passengers described it, "like a dart.' Before we could express our astonishment or give any opinion concerning its object, it again arose and ascended to a great height with a rapidity almost equal to its descent, bearing in its beak a large serpent! As it mounted up, the long body of the snake hung down from the beak of the eagle like the end of a large rope. It was not, however, lifeless. It squirmed in every direction, and made strong efforts for its deliverance. But in vain. The eagle held it with a death-grip.

The serpent, resolving to sell its life as dear as possible, endeavored to impede the flight of the bird, and by dint of hard struggling succeeded in getting its body over the back of the eagle. The feathered pirate now became aware of his danger. His wings were his only means of safety. If these became bound he must perish with his enemy. All his efforts, however, could not dislodge the snake. The wily serpent, anaconda like, drew itself more and more tightly around him. It now had the advantage in the contest. The pinions of the eagle were pinioned. The snake, coiled like a rope around the body of its adversary, was enabled completely to fetter its wings and stop its flight. The struggle ceased. The eagle was conquered! They both began to fall, bound together as they were. They came down as rapidly as they had ascended, and fell into the river. So interested were officers and passengers in the singular contest, that the steamer backed water, a boat put off, and in a few minutes the two belligerents were laid upon our deck, dead. The snake had wound itself completely around the wings of the noble bird.

While I stood gazing upon the two objects, my mind was forcibly impressed with the analogy between this incident and the effects of vice. At a distance sin is peculiarly attractive. Serpent-like, it displays a variety of beautiful colors. It appears extremely fascinating; but when indulged in, its results are fatal. It ensnares; it fetters; it destroys. Not only does it prevent man from soaring toward heaven, it binds and weakens him, and brings him to the grave.—Am. Cabinet.

Inhabitants of Hell and Heaven.

The following is pretty good for the source from whence it comes. Pity all sects should not learn something from such a dream, even if dreamed awake:

John Wesley was once troubled in regard to the disposition of the various sects, and the chances of each in reference to future happiness or punishment. A dream one night transported him in its uncertain wanderings to the gates of hell.

"Are there any Roman Catholics here?" asked thoughtful Wesley.

"Yes," was the reply.

"Any Presbyterians?"

"Yes," again was the answer.

"Any Congregationalists?"

"Yes."

"Any Methodists?" by way of a clincher, asked the pious Wesley.

"Yes!" to his great indignation, was answered.

In the mystic way of dreams, a sudden transition—and he stood before the gates of heaven. Improving his opportunity, he again inquired:

"Are there any Roman Catholics here?"

"No," was replied.

"Any Presbyterians?"

"No."

"Any Congregationalists?"

"No."

"Any Methodists?"

"No."

"Well, then," he asked, lost in wonder, "who are they inside?"

"Christians!" was the jubilant answer.

Society in Paris.

The following item is from a Paris correspondent of May 25th:

We have had a good deal of light thrown on that raging fever called life in Paris. T'other day I gave you the picture of it which dramatists painted. To-day I catch the rays courts of justice throw on it. Both show adultery to be everywhere, and, as if it were not fever enough, the fierce heat is heightened by a desperate strife between income and passion for show. To keep up show, to humiliate one's companions, or prevent them from humiliating one, by greater elegance and more expensive display of luxury, the ignoblest expedients of obtaining money are resorted to. Life is warped to these grovelling aims, as if earth had no high or holy ends. To attain them, everything like moral principle is outraged, conscience is ignored. This absence of moral sense, the frenzied thirst for gold, is not peculiar to Paris. It pervades France.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—" the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

CHRIST AND CHRISTENDOM.

THOUGHTFUL men are convinced that great changes are at hand throughout the world. Nor is this conviction felt by religious thinkers only, but by intelligent men of every civilized nation. Philosophers of every school, politicians of every party, Christians of every Church, feel that, ere long, some altogether extraordinary event will arrest and absorb the attention of mankind. The old landmarks, secular and sacred, are passing away with ominous rapidity, as if swept before an irresistible flood. No conservatism, either in Church or state, is strong enough to check the impetuous rush. No appeal to ancestral wisdom has power to stop the speed with which the world is hasting to some marvellous crisis. And no earnest warnings of the possibility of some irremediable disaster have the effect desired by those who utter them.

I. All this is simply matter of fact, irrespective of doctrinal peculiarity.

You may mourn over it, you may rejoice in it, or you may accept it, without either grief or gladness—if that be possible—as one of the inevitable things in the future of humanity, which God may either incorporate with his purposes, or bend to his will in the development of his infinite wisdom, but you cannot deny the fact itself. That is beyond controversy. Everywhere men are asking, substantially, if not in so many words—"Whither are we drifting? what is coming on the earth? what is to be the end of these things!" Ecclesiastical council, political manifesto, philosophical essay, religious book—it is all the same; for whether joyous anticipation or gloomy foreboding be the outline, unprecedented change, inevitable transition, is unquestionably the text. On that all men are agreed, with a unanimity of sentiment as remarkable as it is new.

But here the unanimity ends, and a perfect babel of propositions regarding the future stuns the ear. "Lo! here," or, "Lo! there," is the panacea. Let the Church of Rome have her own way; cast aside your unreasoning Protestant prejudices, and fall quietly into her loving, motherly arms; do the best you can to facilitate her cherished hope of universality; and she will still the commotions of the times, and bring in the millennial age of peace, and faith, and love. Or, if you demur to this invitation, lend your energies to unfettered Protestantism; help to consolidate its divided forces, and to give it unity of thought and action; let its appeals to the "instinct of liberty," and its denunciations of priestcraft be heard through the nations; and no doubt the day will come, when, through its agency, "the wilderness and solitary place shall be glad, and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Or, if you think intelligence from the dead more reliable than the voices of prophets and apostles in the Christian's Book, unite yourself with the rapidly swelling ranks of "Spiritualism," and hasten its happy age of abolished creeds, annihilated churches, and universal "free love." Or, if prejudiced against this way of hushing the groans of creation, in consequence of the reports of its doings in the Western world, there are still other candidates for your suffrage, and other prescriptions for the restoration of the patient. To mention but one—which has acceptance in many parts of Europe to an extent that is absolutely incredible to those who are unacquainted with the facts—universal democracy, on the principle of no Church, no Bible, no God. To bring about the promised time of peace, prosperity, and joy to mankind, the golden age of poets and seers, this proposition offers us naked atheism!

Let not the reader imagine that we have our eye only on the Red Republicans of France, or the Social Democrats of Germany, and their Italian and English sympathisers, the roughest of the European people, who cannot brook the restraints of law, and who have nothing to lose amidst the fury and havoc of revolution. The atheism of such men carries its antidote with it in the immorality, vulgarity, and lawlessness of its advocates. It is from their leaders in the high places of "philosophy" that the danger comes. Men of scientific attainment, more or less profound, are the actual apostles of this Godless gospel. It is no longer the doctrine of inspiration, or the genuineness of this or that Biblical document, which is called in question, but the entire book is pronounced a collection of fables; and that there ever was, or is, such a person as the Christ of God, is openly denied.

"A keen, learned and relentless criticism," says Mr. Dale,* "is sweeping like a destructive tempest over the whole of our sacred books. That 'higher criticism,' the ultimate aim of which is, we are told, to 'discover what actually happened,' and which refuses to be satisfied with what is only related to have happened,' is attempting in these last days to reconstruct out of what it regards as the confused, unsifted, and untrustworthy literature of ages of credulity, passion, and fanaticism, the whole of that wonderful story which has solaced the sufferings, sustained the strength, and inspired the sanctity of so many generations of saints. The Pentateuch and the Acts of the Apostles are alike impeached. The history of the foundation of the Jewish State, and the history of the origin of the Christian Church, are both to be re-written; but the tragic miracles of the Exodus, and the awful mysteries of Sinai are to be excluded from the first; and, from the second, the diviner glories which bore witness to the supernatural commission of the Lord Jesus Christ, while he was on earth, and which signalized his return to the throne of the Father.

"To this attempt the 'higher criticism,' is impelled, not by its native instincts alone, but by the whole temper and spirit of our times. The supernatural is to be expelled from every province in which its presence has hitherto been recognized. Human thought and volition are but functions of man's organization. The history of nations is the necessary development of laws which may be discovered by human science, and over the action and results of which no will, human or divine, has any control. The material universe, with all its majesty and beauty, bears no witness to the power, and wisdom, and beneficence of the eternal God—'The heavens no longer declare any other glory than that of Hipparchus, of Kepler, and of Newton, and of all those who have contributed to establish their laws.'

"For centuries there has been no such crisis in the religious thought and life of mankind, as that which is now impending. Hostility to the Christian faith, deeper, sterner, and more systematic than that which terrified our fathers in the most volcanic and tempestuous hours of the French Revolution; theological confusion and uncertainty, far more chaotic than that which followed the revolt of Northern Europe against the infallible Roman Church—these are the perils which we have to encounter. The time for speaking lightly of these tremendous controversies has long gone by. If only a theory of inspiration were breaking down, if men were discussing nothing more serious than the precise and minute accuracy of the four Gospels, if we were threatened with nothing more formidable than the demonstration of the historical untrustworthiness of a few chapters here and there in the Old Testament, we might look on calmly, and wait the issue of the conflict with indifference.

"But it becomes plainer every year that the real questions in debate are far different from these. The storm has moved round the whole horizon; but it is rapidly concentrating its strength and fury above one sacred Head. This, this is the real issue of the fight. Is Christendom to believe in Christ any longer, or no? It is a battle in which everything is to be lost or won. It is not a theory of ecclesiastical polity which is in danger, it is not a creed, it is not the Old Testament or the New, but the claim of Christ himself to be the Son of God and the Saviour of mankind. This is surely enough to stir the Church to vehement enthusiasm, and to inspire it with its old heroic energy. It is a controversy, not for theologians merely, bnt for every man who has seen the face of Christ, and can bear personal testimony to his power and glory."

II. Existing religious agencies have failed to realize the expectations of the Church.

Whether those expectations are justified by Scripture, or whether the arguments used to create them were sound is not here in question. As before, we state a broad fact about which there cannot possibly be two opinions, as every one who understands the matter must at once admit. The result of the manifold efforts to evangelize the heathen at home and abroad falls immeasurably below anticipation. At home, with several large ecclesiastical bodies having wealth, influence, learning and eloquence at command, we cannot overtake the dark masses of ignorance, crime, and misery that crowd and poison our great cities, Scripture Readers, Town Missionaries, Bible Women, Home Missions, Evangelists, and a whole array of voluntary laborers, such as Sunday School Teachers, Christian Instruction Visitors, and Tract Distributors, supplement the labors of the clergy and pastors of these large churches; and yet hamlet, village, town, city, have to this day dark souls on which the life-giving light of salvation never dawned with transforming power. Abroad, the aggregate result of the labors of all our large missionary societies is, by universal admission, far below what the predictions of platform, pulpit, and press led many to expect. Christian labor, that is to say, labor for Christ's sake, with the view of promoting his truth, and with the love of souls in the heart of the laborer, is a sublimely beautiful thing. Such labor undertaken at his bidding, and with an intelligent preception of what the Church is to do and to be during the absence of her Head at the Father's right hand, cannot be in vain; but if the Church forgets her witness-bearing mission, and puffs herself up with the idea that she is to be a victorious conqueror in the world that rejected and crucified her Lord, the exaggerated self-importance will be rebuked by hosts of enemies springing up to challenge her claims and her Master's too; and the terrible disproportion between her pretensions and her achievements will be followed by a reaction at once humiliating and distressing. Mistaken views of her own position in the divinely-arranged system of things are sure to be accompanied or followed by mistaken views, more or less serious, of the revealed character and will of God. If she says, "I have to bring the world to CHRIST," she says what neither prophet nor apostle sanctions. If the mistake stopped with herself, the matter would not be so serious; but in the nature of things that could not be; and consequently it has brought serious discredit upon the entire Christian revelation, and upon the claims of our blessed Saviour himself. Men who know not the Lord for themselves, naturally accepted this declaration of the Church as one of the testing claims of Christianity; but seeing that fact has failed to justify it, they now say, "How can we either believe these men or the book whose precepts they profess to obey? If God has commissioned them to convert the world, as they say he has, how is it that the end seems father off than ever? Surely, if they had divine authority they would have divine help; but the results, according to all accounts, are not very brilliant."

Now it is very easy to call these men "scoffers" and "worldlings:" very likely many of them have an undoubted right to these titles; but what right have Christians to bring discredit upon divine truth by making it responsible for doctrines which it disowns? We press this question, as it contains the point at issue. What authority have we—for it really comes to this—to say that the Son of God has transferred his royal rights to our weak hands, to subdue all nations to his will? We first misread the document by which our conduct should be regulated during the Master's absence, and then, seeing that we necessarily fail to do the thing which is not expected of us, the world, believing our assurance that it is expected, casts discredit upon the entire Word of God. Need we wonder? No, but we should mourn!

III. The present state of Christendom is precisely such as might be expected if it were certain that the Christian dispensation would end in an atheistic apostacy.

But that it will so end is certain. There can be no more doubt about it than about the gift of eternal life to him that believes in Jesus. There is no greater authority for a sinner's salvation through faith in Christ, or for any other fundamental doctrine of revelation, than there is for the statement that this age will close amidst absolute devil worship and more terrific judgments than have ever hitherto fallen upon our guilty world. The warnings of the prophets of both Testaments, and of the Lord himself, are so numerous and clear that every reader of the Bible should be intimately acquainted with them. The representations given of this dispensation are so minute, startling, and awful, that it is amazing how any Christian can seriously believe in the conversion of the world by the agency of the Church, before the return of the Lord Jesus. Deeply stamped upon the book are the appalling features of the coming evil time; and the chief actors in the closing tragedy reach a height of such unprecedented wickedness and blasphemy that, but for the sudden manifestation of the King of kings and Lord of lords, in the great day of his wrath, the triumph of the devil and his agents over this part of creation would be complete. Why, the very language of the panic-stricken foe, when the Lord comes to judgment, proves, if we had no other testimony to adduce, that instead of a converted and loyal world, he will find a world of daring rebels. Here it is: "And the kings of the earth, and the great men, and the rich men, and the chief captains, and the mighty men, and every bondman, and every freeman, hid themselves in the dens and in the rocks of the mountains; and said to the mountains and rocks, 'Fall on us, and hide us from the face of him that sitteth on the throne, and from the wrath of the Lamb; for the great day of his wrath is come; and who shall be able to stand?'"

IV. Yet the reluctance of Christians generally to embrace the hope which God has provided against the day of storm and tempest is strangely unyielding.

That hope is the return of the Lord Jesus. There is no other. It is God's arrangement, and we would not have it otherwise. It gloriously meets the entire case, solves all difficulties, whether of human or satanic origin, more than realizes the most ardent hopes of the believer, baffles the schemes of the impious usurper and his armies, and overwhelms them in the fiery flood of vengeance which will utterly destroy them. But the majority of Christians cling to the traditions of a corrupt theology, and look upon those who would bring them back to the pure apostolic fountain as innovators and teachers of novel doctrines. It so happens, however, that the "novelty" rests with them, not with us, and we tell them, in all Christian sincerity and affection, that no preaching, however fervent, forcible, and clear, that ignores the near approach of the Great Judge, will either arouse the Church to a recognition of her true place, or stem the torrent of evil which is to bear upon its dark bosom the personal Antichrist at whose feet apostate Christendom will fall down and worship. We heard Mr. Dale's discourse from which an extract has been made, and we felt that it just wanted one thing to make it perfect—the doctrine of the second advent of the Lord, to meet the world-storm that is about to burst, and to complete the grand scheme of grace and glory in which the love and wisdom of God are so marvellously unfolded. The assembled representatives of Congregationalism never listened to a discourse more worthy of profound attention, and that is saying much; but our gifted, learned, and eloquent brother will pardon us for imploring his attention to the fact that the solution of the controversies of Christendom can be found only in the personal coming of CHRIST.—The Rainbow, England. WM. FULLY PERSUADED.

A REPLY TO A PRIVATE LETTER.

Beloved Brother in the Lord: I need hardly mention that your last letter was interesting, and made doubly so by containing your reason for being "fully persuaded" that all the wicked dead shall live again. Permit me to call your attention to an examination of a few points in your letter, which you have repeatedly put forward, I fear, without due attention to the facts and arguments offered negatively.

In regard to the text "God is Love"—upon which I offered a few thoughts, in a former letter—you say, "Standing where it ought, and as it ought, it is a glorious truth." With these words I perfectly agree. Indeed it is "a glorious truth." It is the greatest of all truths revealed to man, because it is designed to acquaint him with the character of Jehovah. It tells man that the supreme attribute of God's being is love. Therefore, standing as a divinely-revealed truth, whatever is taught which conflicts with this cannot be truth. How can we disagree on this point? Can we conceive of two doctrines, proceeding from the same source, and very opposite in their meaning, and yet both be true? If such a thing were possible how could we establish the authenticity of the scriptures, or defend them from the attacks of infidels? Can clear and muddy water proceed from the same fountain head? Neither can conflicting doctrines proceed from God. When we understand the doctrines of revelation as inspiration has given them to us, we shall find perfect harmony and all blending in beautiful unison with the "glorious truth" that "God is love." Better far stand firm on this "truth," even though we have to cast to the winds the whole system of preconceived theories given to the present church by tradition. A broad and deep gulf exists between this glorious doctrine and the theory of the revival of the wicked dead. To span this gulf and bring the two into harmony is a task which I believe cannot be easily accomplished.

In your letter before me you say:

"I am glad you said, what I find in your present letter, on the non-resurrection of the wicked I think I am FULLY PERSUADED that all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and they that hear shall live, and shall come forth, some to the resurrection of life and some to shame and everlasting contempt. All effort to blunt the point of this more than once repeated Scripture truth, or turn it aside from its true aim will be worse than useless."

Now, my dear brother, upon the assumption that your interpretation of that passage is correct, you want me to believe that its "true aim" is to prove the re-living of the wicked dead. But I want proof that this is its true aim. Would the same author—the Son of God—teach two doctrines, completely opposite in their nature, and offer them to the world as the word of inspiration? Can both an affirmative and a negative doctrine be true? Then why will you so strenuously cling to a cherished construction of a passage, even to the exclusion from your notice of those plain and positive declarations to the contrary, from the same author? If your construction of John v., 28, 29, is correct, why will you not show a harmony between it and the many passages which declare the very opposite? Should we, as Bible Christians, pin our faith upon a disputed text, and let prejudice sway us from the exercise of reason in regard to other portions of Scripture bearing upon the same subject? Verily, no! Then before you again claim this text as proof of your cherished theory, show a perfect harmony between the following words of Jesus, which I place beside the passage to which you refer:

Luke xx., 35, 36—"But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and a resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels; and are the CHILDREN OF GOD, being the children of the resurrection."	John v., 28, 29—"Marvel not at this; for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation."
John iii., 36—"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son, SHALL NOT SEE LIFE; but the wrath of God abided on him."

1. Can it be proved from the Scriptures that the whole human family will be "accounted worthy" of a resurrection from the dead?

2. Can any one show that a single individual, who shall be "accounted worthy" of a revival from the dead, can die again?

3. Can it be demonstrated, if the wicked are raised from the dead, that they are not the "children of the resurrection?"

4. If the wicked shall become the "children of the resurrection," will you bring proof that they will not be "equal unto the angels" and are thus the "children of God?"

5. How, by any Bible reasoning, can you harmonize John iii., 36, with the doctrine that those who do not "believe" in Christ "shall not see life?"

Until the above points are answered we shall continue to believe that John v., 28, 29, was never intended to teach a re-living of the wicked dead. Any construction which thus divides the word of God places Christianity at the mercy of infidels, and takes from us our principal weapon of defense.

We cannot now enter largely into a Scriptural exegesis of John v., 28, 29, and as so much has been written upon this passage, by able pens, it seems hardly necessary that we should do so. Where are the wicked dead? They are in hades—the grave. The word translated grave in this passage is not hades, but mnemisosis, wrongly translated grave, and has not the signification of hades. All who will have a resurrection at the last day will be delivered from hades. Christ says that the "good" shall come forth unto the resurrection of "LIFE;" and of the wicked he says they "shall not see life." Paul, in harmony with Christ says that "the dead IN Christ shall be MADE ALIVE." Is not the inference clear, therefore, that the wicked dead will not be made alive? But I demand one passage from the Bible that says that they will be made alive. Until this is done the plain declaration to the contrary must not be doubted.

Again, what was the condition of the entire human race before the institution of the gospel dispensation? Before the Atonement was offered by Christ they were considered as dead—all were under a death sentence. The race were perishing and "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believed in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." John iii., 15. To what extent the death of Christ affected the human family is here clearly shown. By his death, a way of life was opened, that "whosoever believeth on him should not Perish." Therefore, the death of Christ affected the human race only so far as they "believe" on him. Before the atonement offering was made by Christ the race were under the "ministration of death;" but he having become the testator of the new covenant, the human family "came forth," from the "ministration of death"—the old covenant—into the dispensation of the "ministration of the Spirit." I can conceive of nothing inconsistent in believing that this change of the condition of the human race should be represented by the figure of a resurrection in John v., 28, 29. They "Come forth" in a dispensation of light and life. How? Christ has obtained the "keys of death and the grave." and offers life to the world. they all "hear his voice," because he has become the Mediator of the New Covenant. "He that heareth my words and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life." John v., 24. Thus we see the condition of the two classes under the New Covenant dispensation. To one class the gospel is the "Saviour of death unto death;" and to the other the "Saviour of life unto life." "He that believeth on him is not condemned; but he that believeth not is condemned already [condemned to "remain in the congregation of the dead"], because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God.

These are some points of truth connected with this passage, which afford me strong reasons for rejecting your constructions of John v., 28, 29.

In conclusion, may the Spirit of unity fill our hearts, creating an earnest love for truth, however unpopular it may be. May we meekly follow Jesus in Christian devotion, and let truth have a full sanctifying influence upon our life; that, as members of the Body—Christ—we may walk together in the higher life of Christian consecration. And, finally, may we seek to "love one another with a pure heart fervently. Your Br. in the love of God.

"PARTAKERS OF CHRIST."

AFTER what we read of Christ in the New Testament of his holy, matchless character; after the lofty conceptions we have of his nature based on the sacred record, how strange it seems that men, sinful and lost as they are, may become "partakers of Christ!" Were not the expression scriptural, we should not dare to use it. The difference between Christ and ourselves seems so vast that we should despair of becoming like him. Yet there must be some point in Christian experience, on attaining which men may be said to be "partakers of Christ." The apostle Peter has a still stronger expression, wherein he represents it to be the privilege of believers to become "partakers of the divine nature." We almost tremble when we think of a standard of religious experience so high; albeit we have the same thought expressed in a single word, one that is often used without a full realization of its lofty meaning—the word godly, literally god-like.

There is another remarkable expression which may help to explain the meaning of the two other scriptural phrases we have used. In the epistle to the Hebrews (xii., 10) we are told that God chastens us "that we might be partakers of his holiness." This then must be the sense in which we become "partakers of the divine nature," "partakers of Christ." Holiness is set up before us as the standard of attainment toward which we are to aim. We become "partakers of Christ" in proportion as we become holy. His spotless character is placed before us for our imitation. Possessed of holiness, we bcome possessors of the graces which shone so brightly in the life of Jesus: patience, meekness, resignation, fortitude, love—all the glowing stars that compose the constellation of a Christian spirit.

There are also certain facts connected with Christ's history which must exist in the history of every one of his followers, if they would be partakers of him. Reference is here made particularly to his sufferings. We speak not of those mysterious sufferings endured at Gethsemane, when even his three most intimate disciples were kept at a distance, while unseen by mortal eye he wrestled in agony. Nor do we refer to his sufferings on the cross, when he was deserted by men and forsaken of God. We do not propose to penetrate the veil which conceals the import of those solemn words: "My God! my God! why hast THOU forsaken me!" These were sufferings that no man could share with the Saviour. He trod the wine-press alone." Our purpose is practical, not speculative; and we speak of partaking of Christ's sufferings because it is a scriptural form of expression.

Paul says to the Romans, "If so be that we suffer with him;" and to the Corinthians, "Ye are partakers of the sufferings;" and "the sufferings of Christ abound in us;" and to Timothy, "be thou partaker of the afflictions of the Gospel." Evidently then, when men endure persecution, or suffering of any kind, for Christ's sake, they become "partakers of Christ." This was especially manifested in apostolic times, when crosses were heavy and martrydom was common. It was what Jesus had foretold: "The servant is not greater than his lord. If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you." And through the long ages which have followed, when men for Christ's sake have burned at the stake, or drowned in the rivers, or faced the furious beasts, or wandered from city to city, or meekly listened to cruel taunts or bitter revilings, they have become "partakers of Christ." All the sufferings endured by God's servants to-day, though not usually so severe as those of other days, place them in direct sympathetic connection with Christ.

But there are also certain results yet to follow from the work of Christ in the world, in which his people will be made partakers of him. He shall triumph and they shall triumph with him. We share somewhat in his triumph now. In every conquest we make over Satan, "we are made partakers of Christ." In every soul won for the Saviour, in every success of the Gospel among the nations of the earth, all who share in the labors are participants in the triumph. Working with Christ, suffering for Christ, abiding in Christ, we triumph with him. But greater triumphs are yet to come. The Scriptures refer us to a time when those who suffer with Christ "may also be glorified together." Peter says he was a beholder of this glory—doubtless referring to the wondrous transfiguration scene. Paul says "the suffering of this present time are not worthy to be compared to the glory which sha be revealed in—us." The future will doubtless present a marked contrast to the present in the history of many of the followers of Jesus.

We know that to a sensual mind there is no special attraction in these truths. Such will hardly read what is here written. But we would encourage some who may be burdened under the cross to remember the crown; and others who are distressed by the miserable condition in which sin has placed them to come to the Saviour for relief, and to be made "partakers of Christ."—The Methodist.

PHIL. II., 26.

"YE had heard that he had been sick."

"In this passage," says Dr. Paley, "no intimation is given that the recovery of Epaphroditus was miraculous: it is plainly spoken of as a natural event. This instance, together with that in the second epistle to Timothy, 'Trophimus have I left at Miletum sick,' affords a proof that the power of performing cures, and by parity of reason, of working other miracles, was a power which only visited the Apostles occasionally; and did not at all depend upon their own will. Paul undoubtedly would have healed Epaphroditus, if he could; nor would he have left Trophimus at Miletum sick, had the power of working cures awaited his disposal. Had this epistle been a forgery, forgery on this occasion would not have spared a miracle: much less would it have introduced St. Paul professing the utmost anxiety for the safety of his friend, yet acknowledging himself unable to help him; which he does almost expressly in the case of Trophimus: 'him have I left sick;' and virtually in the passage before us, in which he felicitates himself on the recovery of Epaphroditus in terms which almost exclude the supposition of any supernatural means being used to effect it. This is a reverse which nothing but truth would have imposed.—Sel. by F. H. BURBANK.

THE RESTITUTION.

JESUS most emphatically says, "Behold I make all things new." Rev. xxi., 5. I believe Him, God helps my unbelief. If all this is not done, there is no restitution. Holiness alone will not repair the ruins of the fall. Were every man a saint, that would not pluck the venom from the serpent's fangs; nor restrain the tempest in its wrath; nor bid the earthquake cease; nor put back the hand of sickness; nor put back the power of death. The constitution of the material universe must be altered. It must be brought back to its first estate. And that only, is restitution. And that is God's promise. It is not left to inference. He has spoken of it by all the prophets, since the world began. It is linked in with Christ's second coming. It is the glorious result of that coming. As such the Scriptures call it the blessed hope; as such it ever has been the Pole Star to the Church, and toward it the eye of the believer has turned with a trembling interest that nothing could arrest or subdue. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, beheld it; he caught its earliest beams as it rose bright and clear, above the storm-tossed ocean, on which that church was called to go forth. Jacob saw it on his dying bed, he told of Him unto whom the gathering of His people should be.

Moses saw it, and the man of Uz beheld it, beaming with resplendent light. His faith realized the view, in his flesh he saw his Redeemer, as he stood in the latter day on the earth. David touched his harp with rapturous exaltation, as visions of His coming glory rose up before him. Isaiah calls up every image of grandeur, and pours forth his most entrancing strains, as he portrays the splendor of His reign. Jeremiah tells us of His everlasting covenant. Ezekiel saw Him tread the earth again. Daniel tells of the majesty of his throne; and beheld all nations serving and obeying him. Zachariah saw him come with all his saints. While Malachai, in whose hand the harp of prophecy was broken for four hundred years: "Behold, he shall come suddenly to his temple!" Every prophet strikes his harp to the strain of this blessed hope, and adds his tribute to the glories of that day that shall usher in the restitution of all things.—J Hunter, in the Church Advocate.

IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL.

The immortality of the human soul is declared as a simple fact; but all that ther is which would naturally ravel out: all the infinite applications and questions which spring from it—these things the Bible does not touch.

THE above statement, that "the immortality of the human soul is declared as a simple fact," in the scriptures of truth, was made not long since by a popular preacher, and is firmly believed by a large class of professing Christians. Yet the statement is false. The simple statement that man, or any part of man is immortal, cannot be found in the word of God. True there are certain passages of Scripture, which if taken out from the Bible, and looked at by themselves, would justify us in drawing the inference that the soul, or life of man, was immortal. But there is a wide difference between an inference, and the statement of a "simple fact."

Man is mortal. Job iv., 17; 1 Cor. xv., 22, 53

Man may attain immortality. John vi., 51.

Immortality is obtained only through Christ. 1 Cor. xv., 14, 17. Acts iv., 12; 2 Tim. i., 10. It is obtained at Christ's coming and the resurrection, and only then. 1 Cor. xv., 51-57. We say, then, the mortality of man is declared in the Bible as a simple fact. His present immortality can be only an inference, and as facts take the precedence of inferences, the Bible must be harmonized on the ground that man is a mortal being, and only those who "seek for glory, honor, and immortality" will obtain "eternal life."—Selected.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

A HOME QUESTION.

WE call attention to an inquiry by Dr Leask, of the "Rainbow," found in his article on the first page of this paper. It is this: "What right have Christians to bring discredit upon divine truth by making it responsible for doctrines which it disowns?" He adds, "We press this question, as it contains the point at issue. What authority have we—for it really comes to this—to say that the Son of God has transferred his royal rights to our weak hands, to subdue all nations to his will?"

This question is put, as will be seen by the article of Dr. Leask, in reference to the assumption of the nominal church that Christ has commissioned it to convert the world—the whole world. Its failure to do it, has been the cause of infidelity, by bringing discredit upon the Bible, which the church claims teaches such a doctrine.

We heartily argree with Dr. Leask, that those, professing to be the church, who have set up the claim that Christ has commissioned them to convert the whole world in His absence, have not only set up a false claim, but have greatly retarded the real work Christ gave his followers to do, viz., to "preach the gospel as a witness to all nations," and "to take out of them a people for his name," prior to His "return from heaven to take the kingdoms of this world," by "building again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down; and build again the ruins thereof, and to set it up:" of which, all the prophets of God and the apostles of Christ have treated largely. See Matth. xxiv., 14; Acts i., 11; iii., 20, 21; xv., 14-16; Dan. vii., 13, 14, 27. Rev. xi., 15-18; and a multitude of like testimony of the subjection of this world to Christ only by his return from heaven. Overlooking these testimonies and prophecies, the nominal church has instituted practises, customs and doctrines unauthorized by the Head of the church; by which means it has steadily approached a conformity to the world, and dreamed the world was approaching the church. While many have thus been drawn to profess acceptance of Christ, multitudes have seen the profession of converting the nations, or the world to the meek and lowly Jesus, is a failure, and have come to conclude the Bible itself is a deception, because the pretensions of those who profess to promulgate its teachings are not carried out with any thing like apostolic sacrifice and labor; and millions of years more give no assurance of the promised millennium than the eighteen hundred past.

But we will not enlarge on this topic; Dr. Leask has put the subject in its true light. And now we ask, in his words, "What right have Christians to bring discredit on divine truth by making it responsible for doctrines which it disowns?" What right have they to teach that all men, irrespective of character, are to have eternal existence, when God says, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," and "The wages of sin is death;" also, "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life?" These, and thousands of like testimonies of God's truth, are all set at naught, or "made of none effect by your traditions" that the soul of man is inherently immortal by creation or birth, is undying, deathless, will exist as long as God does, can never die, is a part of God may be eternally tormented, or that all sinners will be sooner or later made holy and happy, and live eternally, etc.

What right have men professing faith in the Bible to make that Book responsible for such doctrines, when the whole tenor of it disowns such assumptions? and Christ, his apostles and all the prophets, with one voice proclaim death as the wages of sin? What dishonor is done to God and to his truth by such doctrines as pass in the theological world for Bible truth; but which shock reason and drive men into infidelity, supposing this theological teaching is really found in the Bible.

May Heaven help us to disabuse the minds of our fellow-men of such soul-destroying speculations as pass current for truth among those drilled in the traditions of men from their youth up.

Think of it as you will, ye men professing love to God, by your traditions of men's devising, you will ruin more of the human race than all the open and avowed infidels in the world. Think not that because a few, or even many are saved by what truth you have, that that releases you from the responsibility of driving an innumerable multitude of others into infidelity and down to death eternal by your corruptions of the word of God, or ignorance of its real teachings. Your business is to know the truth; not as taught by man, however learned or wise, but as taught by God himself in his word and by his Spirit. You are to accept no doctrine as coming from God that clashes with his known perfections—especially, with the fact that "GOD IS LOVE"—or which shocks the reason He has planted in your breast. You are, you must and will be held responsible to God for all constructions you put on his word that clash with these divine truths.

THE THEOLOGICAL EARTHQUAKE.

"He hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven . . . that those things which cannot be shaken may remain." Heb. xii., 26, 27.

WE called attention last week to the fact that the theological systems are to be shaken as well as the political ones. In this shaking truth has nothing to fear, for it is immutable like its author: but truth, like gold in the mine, is often obscured by much that is impure, which hides its beauty and causes it to be mistaken for a worthless article. It must be exhumed from among the rocks and rubbish where it has lain buried by the ignorance, superstition, or wickedness of men.

This is no easy task. Squatters have settled quietly on the soil and are living by the gain of the productive rubbish gathered by the traditions of their fathers, and they count those sacrilegious heretics who would disturb their long cherished traditionary soil, and cannot endure the idea of any search being made which would create even a suspicion that the soil they have so long enjoyed, and profitably cultivated, is merely a scum that hides from view untold treasures; or that it covers from sight true and invaluable riches.

These squatters, therefore, are ready to move "earth and heaven," filled with unutterable horror at the presumption of such as propose to mine underneath their long-settled premises to see if, after all, the gold is not unseen and unknown by the occupants of the land. The effort to come at the gold—eternal truth—causes earth and heaven to be shaken. That shaking is now going on, and will continue and increase till everything is shaken that can be, and only those things shall remain which cannot be shaken.

Such is God's purpose; such is the declaration of the prophetic word, and thus it must and will be, let who will oppose. The opposition, of course, will cause a great commotion—a theological earthquake. But he who loves truth more and above all things else, has nothing to fear. God is truth, and no lie is of the truth. Lies cannot endure the light: they vanish like birds of night at the approach of day; and the day of the Sun of righteousness is dawning; hence a terrible fluttering is seen among those who have been feasting on error, and have said, "We are God's;" but the time has come when such—theologically—"shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes."

In this struggle we must expect every possible shift will be made to keep the father lie alive: the lie that had its origin with the old serpent in Eden—"Ye shall not surely die:" in plain English—"Your Begetter is the eternal Spirit, hence your spirit is eternal and cannot die." This we call "the father lie," because it is the "begetter" of all other lies by which the truth of God has been corrupted and buried so deep that nothing but an earthquake can bring it once more near the surface, so as to be in reach of "the common people," for whom it was specially designed; for such heard the Christ "gladly," while others rejected the plain and unvarnished truth He proclaimed. The conduct of the theologians of those days was not unlike multitudes who have lived since that period. They despised the teaching of the Carpenter of Galilee, and the fishermen who followed in His train. Too proud and lifted up with the idea of their wisdom and knowledge, and enchained by their traditions, to listen patiently to such teachers, they haughtily asked, "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?"

Well did the Apostle say, "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble" embrace the truth of God: for that truth shows man to be of the dust; and, through sin, returning to the dust, a corruptible, mortal, perishing being, returning to the condition from whence he came, with only one remedy for his mortal, dying condition; viz., the impartation of a divine life through a new creation in Jesus Christ, God's one and only appointed LIFE-GIVER. Destitute of this new and Divine re-creation man perishes "like the beasts that perish." Such is the testimony of God concerning man.

Theologians seek, by every possible device, to overthrow God's announcement of such a destiny for the natural man, or man as he is by his creation or natural birth. They seek proof, where there is none, that man has an undying nature, spirit, or soul, begotten of God at his creation; a mere assumption from their traditions; and from this assumption they proceed to change the language of revelation from its natural and obvious meaning to make it conform to the first contradiction of God's testimony that man "was taken out of the ground: dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

In opposition to this, it is affirmed, man is of "divine parentage"—"with a life like its Begetter"—"who is eternal, because he is a son of God." Such is the assertion of Mr. Jukes, whose article in "The Rainbow" we remarked on last week, whose position, we then said, and now repeat, though "ingenious, seems to us to unsettle all faith in revelation." Because his assumptions, expressed in the above quoted language, compel him to give such a construction of the language of the Bible as would destroy all confidence in any other book, if applied to its language: it means anything that a fancy mind is pleased to make it.

Adam's death, according to Mr. Jukes, was

"A spiritual death, by which, as soon as he had sinned, he was separated from God, and cut off from God's kingdom." . . . "Man has again to die to sin in spirit, and so, by this second spiritual death, come back out of that power of darkness into which he fell when he died to God," etc., "he lives through all these deaths, and lives on still through the death of the body, which may follow these deaths—all this shows death is not annihilation," etc.

Thus the first death is a spiritual one "separated from God." The "second death" is also a "second spiritual death:" a death to sin; the death of the body makes a third death. In fact he can multiply deaths ad infinitum. It will be seen that the "second death" of Mr. Jukes is a blessed affair; it is a death "to sin in spirit," by which the sinner is made alive to God. Jesus saith, by the Spirit, "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." True, saith Mr. Jukes, for, that death is a "second spiritual death" by which he "dies unto sin." No one has any occasion to fear being "hurt" by such a death. Indeed, Mr. Jukes more than intimates that "the second death" is embraced in, or is "a part of the promise, 'I make all things new.'" Those going into the other world in spiritual death, are not by that "delivered out of that dark and fiery world into which it fell by disobedience," etc. I yet he asks,

Shall it therefore never be delivered? What saith the Scripture? That blessed word distinctly teaches that there is a death, the "second death," even to these "lost ones," etc. What then to such must this death be? I ask you, what is any death, but separation from the life and world which up to that death has been lived in? Why then, if by a death to sin the fallen spirit in the elect comes back by this dissolution into God's life, should you say that the same fallen selfish, devilish, spirit cannot be brought back to God by a death to that life in the non-elect, that is, in those who are not first-fruits?

Thus, according to Mr. Jukes, "the elect" die "the second death" before their bodies die, i. e., they "die to sin," and the "non-elect"—"devilish" creatures—die "the second death," after they enter the next state; then "the promise" of that death is made good to them, and they die there the "second death," i. e., they "die to sin" and are made alive to God "in the lake of fire and brimstone." A blessed means of grace, truly!

Behold the earthquake shock, ye immortal soul theorists! See what struggles the human mind is passing through to get deliverance from the consequences of inherent immortality! Say not that the theory of immortalty you hold is not responsible for such positions as Mr. Jukes takes. It is responsible for them. No mind with human sensibility and untrammelled by the traditions of men, can help rejecting the doctrine of eternal torments. Nothing but priestly dogmatism can hold any mind up to the belief that God their Maker has ever brought into being a creature for such a doom.

Let the Bible doctrine that man is a unit in his nature, created of the dust of the earth and made alive by the breath of the spirit of life, common to all breathing creatures; and that God designed him for a higher, a divine or unending life, if he proved obedient on trial under a law subjecting an intelligent mind to the will of his Creator; but determined if man failed in the trial he should die; that is, should be dissolved into the original elements out of which he was produced: let these truths be proclaimed and they dissolve and annihilate such vain traditions as inherent immortality; and, along with that, such perverting of the words of eternal truth as that practised by such writers as Mr. Jukes.

Then men will see what need they have of Christ; and that without Him they will "utterly perish in their own corruption, like natural brute beasts." 2 Pet. ii., 12.

We have not yet said all we may on Mr. Jukes' article, and the inevitable result of his positions; which are sufficiently manifest to show where the inherent immortality theory will lead men when carried to its legitimate results.

FIRST PRINCIPLES.

WE will briefly state what we regard as first principles. By Adam all men are mortal, dying, corruptible creatures, and have no immortality or endless life in them: so that by generation, or birth, no man has any hope or prospect beyond this present life. Therefore, unless some other medium is provided of God, all Adam's race would perish and cease to be, or "be as though they had not been," Obd. 16. While thus situated, God so loved the world, or race of Adam, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life. He gave him to be "the resurrection and the life," without which no soul of Adam's race would ever have seen a future life. Here are first principles; and without understanding these distinctly and clearly, the vision of every man is beclouded, his mind more or less bewildered, and he will be very likely to substitute something else for Christ, and think more of it and talk more about it than of Him who came into the world that men might live through him. But men have personally sinned, therefore we call upon them in the language of Peter, Acts iii., 19, saying, "Repent"—change your opinions or mind concerning Christ and the work he is to accomplish for you—[for so the original signifies]—"and be converted"—or turned about—face the other way. They were following the First Adam, and going to death and corruption; but by turning about, following the second Adam, and being united to him by faith, they become "partakers of the divine nature," which is in Christ, and thus in the way to incorruption, immortality, eternal life; and their sins are "blotted out," to be remembered no more; thus will "times of refreshing come from the presence of the Lord:" literally, a breathing time—to recover one's breath; in other words, the resurrection, when all who have the Spirit that was in Christ, by which God raised him up from the dead, will be made alive—made to breathe again, and die no more. And this will be when "God shall send Jesus Christ . . . whom the heavens" will retain "until the times of the restitution," etc.

But brethren may think we are on the higher principles. Well, be it so. Paul was for forgetting or leaving the things behind, and reaching on to those before, "not laying again the foundation of repentance from dead works, and of faith toward God; of the doctrines of baptisms," etc. We shall do well not always to remain babes or children, but grow "up unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ," that we may be of "full age."

NATURAL MORTALITY.

A CORRESPONDENT writing to Dr. Leask, editor of "The Rainbow," speaks as follows:

"Never any subject discussed in the 'Bow' has given me greater pleasure than that concerning the end of the wicked. I have long been assured, upon the whole evidence of the case, that no theory is or can be further from the truth than that awful one of the unending, unmitigated, torment of the lost. I do not wonder that many whose bowels of compassion and tender mercy, beholding their fellow-sinners now unsaved, should run upon the other but surely less fearful rock of error, and attempt to prove that as the design of punishment is remedial, God will finally cleanse and redeem all the wicked. This latter theory overlooks the fact that death punishments with us are unalterable and irremedial, and that death, the wages of sin, is not remedial with God. Both theories are alike based upon the false and untenable assumption of man's natural immortality."

We are rejoiced to find such sentiments entertained by some of the writers in England, and hope the number may be mightily increased.

The true wages of sin is death, in the proper sense of that word; and this should end all controversy as to what is the end of the incorrigible sinner; and that when once such go into death, that death is never revoked. To make him alive, to take life away again is as irreconcilable with justice as it is abhorrent to mercy and love; and in our mind is an impeachment of the oath of God that He has "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," Ezek. xxxiii., 11.

The above writer, in "The Rainbow," sees clearly, as every other impartial mind might see, that the doctrine of inherent immortality is the one root from which arise the two "upas" trees—eternal torments and restorationism—which poison all the theological atmosphere of Christendom. The first of those trees has been girdled, and is in a dying condition; but the other is still flourishing and increasing in its poisonous qualities, silently spreading in all the churches and affecting the ministry very extensively, though few only openly avow themselves inpregnated by the virus; yet some in England, it seems, are confessing their apostacy from the theory of endless torture to final restoration.

The latter theory is less offensive to the sense of justice God has implanted in the human breast, than the former: but the latter is utterly irreconcilable with the plain meaning of language, and therefore a hazardous experiment with the testimony of God that, "The soul that sinneth it shall die" (Ezek. xviii., 2, 20), and a multitude of texts of like character. It is better to inform men that, "Now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation." 2 Corth. vi., 2. If this day of salvation is neglected there is no promise of a future day to secure life eternal; for, "If ye believe not that I am He, ye shall die in your sins," said Jesus, John viii., 24. Dying in their sins, recovery from death is impossible; because death is the extreme penalty of law; and "the sting of death is sin" (1 Corth. xv., 56), "and the strength of sin is the law;" so that those who come under death by the transgression of law, are "holden by the cords of their sins;" Prov. v., 22; and "shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on them." John iii., 36.

OUR ANNIVERSARY.

THURSDAY, September second, is the time for the annual meeting of the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION. The place will be in the "Life and Advent Mission Tent" in Springfield, Mass., at the hour of two o'clock in the afternoon. An informal meeting will be held at nine o'clock in the morning, in the same place, for the exchange of thoughts on various matters relating to the Union and its work.

To provide for the continuance of the HERALD OF LIFE will be the principal business of the Union. Next in importance will be the matter of issuing and circulating Tracts; that this work, which has accomplished so much, may be prosecuted with still more efficiency.

Both of the foregoing subjects call for our united and increased exertions. Let all the friends who can possibly be present not fail to do so. Those whose circumstances will not permit this, should communicate immediately with us, stating how much can be relied on from them for each of the above objects. You know the value of them to you and to the cause to which they are devoted. They are needed no less now than when first originated under the "Chestnut Tree," at Wilbraham, in 1863. A great work has been accomplished in the six years since that time. True, we have had our trials, but we have the consolation that amidst them all the Lord has sustained and prospered the work, so that the prospect of increased usefulness calls for increased efforts to push forward in promulgating the Gospel of "LIFE IN JESUS CHRIST alone."

Shall we not give thanks and take courage at our coming anniversary? Let us give all the praise of all the good accomplished to "God and the Lamb."

"YOU ARE IMMORTAL."

THE tract with the above heading, on which we remarked a few weeks since, it seems was written by "B. North, Esq.," and was called a "Gem." A correspondent in the West says, "It was published in a Cincinnati paper in 1858, and highly commended by the editor; it was taken from the British Messenger." Our correspondent wishes our Remarks on it issued in a tract; and says, "You may take my order for $5 worth when published."

It is now issued in an eight, page-diamond edition, tract, and sold at 75 cents per 100, postage included: or $7 per thousand. Send your orders for all you want.

The article "LITTRE DENE" is also issued in the same form and style as the above, and sold at the same prices.

Both tracts are got up very neat, and make a handsome "pocket pistol," ready always for use.

Those who have made pledges for their publication will favor us by forwarding the amount as soon as possible.

A VOICE FROM KANSAS.

M. JARED writes: Please send me, by mail to Farlinville, Linn Co., Kansas, your work "LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST." I wish thoroughly to investigate your new doctrine; and if it be Bible doctrine, then I must advocate it at all hazards. There are some difficulties in my way, but investigation may clear them away. I will mention a few of them.

1. If faith in Christ, alone, secures a resurrection, what becomes of those dying in infancy? do they perish?

2. How can God reward men according to their works if the wicked are never raised from the dead?

3. Why has God appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness, after death, if sinners are never raised?

4. Why did Christ and Paul teach that there will be a resurrection both of the just and unjust?

Yours, for Bible truth.

RESPONSE TO THE FOREGOING.

"1." We do not teach or believe that "faith in Christ," alone, secures a resurrection. Where Christ is preached, and the person is capable of the exercise of faith, faith is essential; but it is the indwelling of "the Spirit that raised up Christ from the dead" that "secures a resurrection." See Rom. viii., 11, and like passages. That indwelling Spirit can be imparted to such as never heard the outward word, or are incapable of understanding it, as children are, if God pleases.

"2." What is the final reward of every man? Is it not Life to one class, and Death to the other? God then "rewards men according to their works," by a resurrection of one class out from among the dead, if dead at Christ's return from heaven: or, if alive at that time, changing them in a moment to immortality. The other class He rewards by condemning them "not to see life," if dead; or, if alive and have disobeyed God and the gospel of his Son, they will "be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." See Math. xvi., 27; 1 Corth. xv., 51-53; 2 Thess. iv., 16, 17; Phil. iii., 11, 19-21; 2 Thess. i., 7-9; John iii., 36; John vi., 53, 54, and as many parallel texts as you can search out. You will find there is no lack of evidence as to this point.

"3." As to this question, God has appointed no day "after death" for a day of judgment: but our tract on "The Judgment," which we sent you, will probably be all the answer you will need on this question; yet, even supposing a day of judgment "after death," it does not follow that the wicked dead are to be made alive to be judged, but are judged while dead and condemned "not to see life," but to have "the wrath of God abide on them," and thus "remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xvi., 21.

"4." Neither Christ or Paul taught the living from the dead of the unjust. That some of their language may seem to teach such an idea we do not deny; but that either of them plainly said the wicked dead should live again, or be made alive from death, we deny; and such a construction of their language is a palpable contradiction of positive testimony to the contrary. But please read our work on "LIFE FROM THE DEAD," which you have in the volume sent you: also, our sermon on the "DOOM OF THE UNGODLY:" which if you have not we will send you.

THOUGHTS ON RESURRECTION.

BY STEWART CARLISLE.

BR. STORRS: I am happy to inform you that the truth is making some progress; though not so rapid as we could wish. As we have no preaching of our own, I still visit the orthodox churches, and the more I hear from them, the more fully am I settled in my present faith, that there is no future Life out of Christ.

A short time ago while engaged at my work I was thinking of the doctrine of the Resurrection as held forth by the Saviour in his interview with the Sadducees, after declaring them to be in error because of their ignorance, He proceeded to show them that "those who are worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage, neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being the children of the Resurrection. Now that the dead are (will be) raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he calleth the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob: for he is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him." Luke xx., 35, 38. The last verse quoted was particularly the subject of my meditation. "God is not a God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him."

Now the popular teaching of orthodoxy is, that not only Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, are now alive, but all those in every age who have breathed the breath of life are now, and will never cease to be in a state of living, conscious existence; that the soul being the essential man, and incapable of dying, the essential man is still living, and then no matter whether it were the beloved disciple John, or Judas Iscariot, if they are living, then, God is their God; for "all live unto him;" and here we have universal salvation fully established from the orthodox stand-point. But then what must be done with the first clause of the text, "For God is not the God of the dead?" who are these dead of whom, "God is not their God?" Orthodoxy says, they are all alive; but for some reason their creed-makers managed to put in their creeds something concerning a resurrection of the dead: dead what? dead men? Why, they affirm that all are living! but Jesus says, "God is not a God of dead, but of the living; for all live unto him." Now, if orthodoxy be correct, and the soul be the essential man, and is incapable of dying, but must live forever, (notwithstanding God has solemnly declared, "The soul that sinneth it shall die,") then the question of who are the dead of whom God is not their God? is one that ought to be definitely explained by our orthodox brethren, for if the glorified in heaven "are now striking their golden harps, and waving their palms of victory, and walking the gold-paved streets of the new Jerusalem, and bathing in the river of the water of life, and plucking the ambrosial fruit from the tree of life" (if, we say), they are now where there is fulness of joy and pleasure forever more, how then can their joy be increased, or their pleasure be extended by a union with that body which was only an impediment in their way and served only as a "prison house," in which they were confined until their kind friend, "death," opened the gate to endless joy; and as they pass its heavenly portals they turn to their great deliverer "death," and shout in grateful triumph, for his kind office performed, "Oh death where is thy sting:" one would think they should be more grateful to their friends.

May the good Lord save us from this (our enemy), and from his sting. This being the teaching of orthodoxy, if it be true, then it follows that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the "dead," can never have a resurrection; for there can be no necessity for such a thing from the orthodox view; and it amounts to a virtual denial of the doctrine; for God not being the God of the dead, but of the living, and orthodoxy affirming that all are alive, then the "dead," of whom He is not the God, are only the carcasses of men who have died; and God not being their God takes no account of them at all; hence universal salvation and no resurrection of the dead, are the plain teachings of this passage from orthodoxy's stand-point. Oh, these "traditions of men;" this "handling of the word of God deceitfully;" this "turning of the truth of God into a lie;" this "putting darkness for light, and light for darkness" must surely have an end; and may the Lord hasten it in his time.

How different from this is the plain, simple teaching of Prophets, Jesus and his holy Apostles. Paul, the great apostle to the Gentiles, tells us that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the host of worthies who lived and labored and suffered for God, "these all DIED in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them AFAR OFF, and were persuaded of them, and embraced them, and confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth: Heb. xi., 13. Would it not have been just as well for him to have told us that their "immortal spirits had escaped from their earthly prison; that having found death the 'gate to endless joy,' they passed with more than lightning speed through the trackless ether, and had gained the port of endless bliss, and that with angels and archangels they are now swelling the grand chorus of the celestial city in the glory land, "and that they are now looking over the battlements of heaven, anxiously awaiting our arrival?" Could he not have told them so? Yes, if it had been true he could and would; for he "kept back nothing that was profitable," but "declared unto them the whole council of God," for "God had revealed unto him the hidden mystery which had been hid from the world for ages," and was only made manifest in his time; and he knew that in the counsel of God, as revealed to him, that when death ensued, the only way into a future life was by a resurrection from the dead; and in order to "attain unto this resurrection from the dead" he labored night and day to "know Christ and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his suffering, and to be made conformable to his death;" or, in other words, "he fought the good fight of faith and laid hold upon the hope which was set before him," which was "the hope of eternal life"—"which was the hope of the promise made of God unto the fathers; unto which promise our twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night hope to come; for which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews." "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should"—take men to heaven when they die!—no; but "that God should raise the dead."

Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with all the good and holy of every age DIED in faith, and the oath of God is a certain guarantee that their faith shall be honored by a resurrection from the dead, and their complete and eternal possession in endless felicity of the promise made of God unto them previous to their death. There is a wide difference between those who die in faith, and those who die in wilful unbelief; while the former die in faith under the promise of living again, their future life is just as certain as the word of God is true; hence, God is their God; for to him their death is only a temporary suspension of life; while the latter are "without God, and have no hope in the life to come, in their death. They "are like the beasts that perish;" and, having "wandered out of the way of understanding, shall remain in the congregation of the dead;" and thus dying and returning to the dust, they are dead; and God not being their God, theirs will be the unbroken silence of eternal DEATH, for, "the soul that sinneth it shall die;" "for the wages of sin is death," and those who wilfully reject the offer of eternal life, and live for the gratification of their animal passions only, "are worthy of death;" for "the end of those things is death."

Lord help us to fight the good fight of faith and lay hold on eternal life; and then whether we live or die we are the Lord's.

REMARKS ON CHRIST'S TEMPTATION.

BY R. F. ROWELL.

"He was tempted in all points like as we are."

WE read, "Then the devil taketh him up into the holy city, and setteth him on the pinnacle of the temple, and saith unto him, If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down: for it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee; and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone."

Can any one be tempted with an object for which they have no desire? Surely not. But Jesus was tempted to cast himself down.

Wherein, then, did the temptation consist?

Let those answer who believe in a personal spirit-devil, if they can; but as for me, I am not prepared to believe that Jesus had such a propensity to please the devil as to desire to perform such a feat to amuse or gratify him.

"Again, the devil taketh him up into an exceeding high mountain, and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto him, All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me."

Now, admitting that there was a spirit-devil there tempting Jesus with the offer of the kingdoms of the world, did they belong to him to give? No. Could he then have given them to Jesus, if he had fallen down and worshipped him? No.

Did Jesus know that to be a fact? Yes.

How then could Jesus be tempted with a promise from the devil which he knew he could not perform?

For an answer to these questions I will cite you to Br. Storrs' work on the "DEVIL—SATAN—DEMONS," which I have read with profit and interest, as, also, "Halsted's Theology of the Bible." I am persuaded, the doctrine of a spirit-devil, with all its absurdities, need only to be brought to the light of revelation and reason to vanish like the dew before the sun.

EAST ORRINGTON ME., July, 19, 1869.

GOD'S WORD ABIDETH FOREVER.

SOME six hundred years before the birth of Christ, God commanded the prophet Jeremiah to go to the house of the Rechabites, "and speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the Lord, and give them wine to drink." Jeremiah obeyed, and when he had brought them into the house of the Lord he set before them "pots full of wine, and cups, and said unto them, drink ye wine." But the Rechabites said "We will drink no wine; for Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father, commanded us, saying, ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons forever; neither shall ye build houses, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyards, nor have any; but all your days ye shall dwell in tents; that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers. Thus have we obeyed the voice of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father, in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters: nor to build houses for us to dwell in; neither have we vineyards, nor field, nor seed; but we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all Jonadab our father commanded us." Then the Lord told Jeremiah to go and say to "Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, will ye not receive instruction to hearken to my words? The words of Jonadab, the son of Rechab, that he command his sons not to drink wine, are performed; for unto this day they drink none, but obey their father's commandment: notwithstanding I have spoken unto you, . . . but ye harkened not unto me . . . Because the sons of Jonadab the son of Rechab, have performed the commandment of their father, which he commanded them; but this people have not hearkened unto me; therefore thus saith the Lord God of Hosts, the God of Israel, behold I will bring upon Judah, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem all the evils that I pronounced against them; because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard, and I have called unto them, but they have not answered." Then, because the Rechabites had been faithful to the commandments of their father Jonadab, "and kept all his precepts," God instructed Jeremiah to say unto them, "Jonadab the son of Rachab shall not want a man to stand before me forever."

How truly the evils that were pronounced against the Jews had come upon them; how for many centuries they have groaned under the weight of them all must know. They have been despoiled, driven hither and thither among the nations, and, as a people, have no home. It was threatened them, "the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other . . . and among all these nations shalt thou find no ease . . . but the Lord shall give thee there a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind; and thy life shall hang in doubt before thee; and thou shalt fear day and night, and shalt have none assurance of thy life." Surely the Lord has thus far dealt with Judah according to his word. Has he dealt thus with the sons of Rechab? When Dr. Wolff, of England, was in the East he was, at Mesopotamia, shown one of that ancient people, the Rechabites. I showed him, says the Dr., the Bible in Hebrew and Arabic, which he was rejoiced to see, as he could read both languages. After having proclaimed to him the tidings of salvation, and made him a present of the Hebrew and Arabic Bibles and Testaments, I asked him—"whose descendant are you?" "Mousa," said he, "is my name, and I will show you who are my ancestors;" on which he immediately began to read from the fifth to the eleventh verse of Jer. xxxv. "Where do you reside?" said I. Turning to Gen. x., 27, he replied, "At Hadaram, now called Simar by the Arabs: at Uzal, now called Sanam by the Arabs;" and again referring to the same chapter, verse 30, he continued, "at Mesha, now called Mecca, in the deserts around those places. We drink no wine, and plant no vineyard, and sow no seed; and live in tents, as Jonadab, our father, commanded us. Hobab was our father, too. Come to us, and you will find us sixty thousand in number."

Just here let us again read the promise; "Therefore, thus saith the Lord God of Hosts, the God of Israel, Jonadab, the Son of Rechab, shall not want a man to stand before me forever." What proof is this of the truth of Scripture, and of the stability of God's word. A people faithful unto instructions from their father, received the promise of safety and continuance, and though more than two thousand years have since fled, the promise stands sure. The Jews though wanderers throughout the earth, are, for some glorious divine purpose, preserved a distinct people. If God has given unto them promises reaching beyond their cursings, He will be very likely to perform them also. L. C. T.

BLOOMFIELD, N. J. July, 1869,

"CONDITIONAL PROPHECY."

THIS is a phrase often used in this country by those who reject the idea of the fulfilment of some of the prophecies of the Old Testament. In England they call them "Lapsed Prophecies;" which means, "made void"—not to be fulfilled. We utterly reject all such ideas; and have repeatedly expressed our mind on this question. On some of the last chapters of Ezekiel, we have hesitated to express a positive opinion on account of some expressions in chap. xliii., 9-11, which seemed to indicate conditions. On a more careful examination of these verses, we are inclined to think the language does not warrant the idea that the prophecy is conditional, but that the conditions relate to another matter.

On this subject we give a communication to "The Rainbow" from an eminent prophetic writer in England. We do not indorse all his remarks, but give them as his own: most of them we do heartily approve:

LAPSED PROPHECIES.

DEAR SIR: Allow me to trouble you with a few lines on the subject of "Lapsed Prophecies." This subject has been brought forward once or twice in the Rainbow by some of your correspondents, and appears to me to be founded on a mistaken view of the mind of God. There can be no such thing as a lapsed prophecy in the word of eternal truth. There may be promises made on certain conditions, and then held back when those conditions have not been fulfilled. But to foretell a thing, and not to accomplish it, would be contrary not only to the dignity, but even to the faithfulness of God. Let it be observed, that in the last prophecies of Ezekiel there is not one word spoken as to conditions. The prophecies are straight-forward and absolute, without any condition being annexed to them. There is not a word said as to the possibility of their failure; therefore the truth of God requires absolutely that they should not lapse or fail. Even the conditional promises made to Israel have none of them lapsed. They are merely deferred till a future time, when Israel shall "look on him whom they have pierced." How then can we suppose that an unconditional prophecy can lapse, when even conditional prophecy has not lapsed?

This mistake has arisen from the difficulty of believing in the restoration of Jewish sacrifices hereafter. But where is the difficulty in believing in their restoration, if it be rightly considered? Those sacrifices will not be sacrifices of atonement, but only of commemoration. They will only serve to commemorate the past sacrifice of the "Lamb of God." Now, it appears to me to be so far from being incredible that the sacrifice of the Son of God should be commemorated by future sacrifices of certain appointed victims, that it would rather be incredible that so great a sacrifice should be left forever without anything to commemorate it. I appeal to almost any of your readers if it would not be more reasonable to suppose a future sacrifice offered in Jerusalem, to commemorate the sacrifice on Calvary, than to imagine that nothing whatever should take place in memory of that great event, on the very spot where the sacrifice itself took place, and among the very people whose ancestors had consummated that crime! I believe, therefore, that the restoration of Jewish sacrifices is not only possible, but that their non-restoration would be so strange as to be almost incredible.

Dear sir, let us never hear again of such a thing as a lapsed prophecy. It is only a more decent phrase for "an unfulfilled promise." For, observe once more, that there are no conditions mentioned in Ezekiel. If once we let loose the waters, who can tell where they will stop. We might just as well suppose that the prophecies of St. John in the Book of Revelation would turn out, by-and-by, to be lapsed prophecies; and then we might bid farewell to the second advent, and put a stop to the "Rainbow:" or St. Paul's prophecy in 1 Thess. iv., might just as well prove a lapsed prophecy. And from lapsed prophecy, remember, there is but one narrow step to lapsed redemption. The Jews will offer sacrifices hereafter to remind them of that sacrifice of atonement which they, unconsciously, offered upon Calvary before. I remain, dear sir, Yours, sincerely,

TORQUAY. R. A. PURDON.

A SINGULAR STATEMENT.

IN "The Rainbow" we find the following statement, by one of its correspondents, in relation to Napoleon I.:

I remember "the last days at St. Helena." I knew some of the persons sent there by our government. There were two or three officers and a lady who had a prayer-meeting frequently on his behalf, for some months before the Emperor's death. There were boxes of books allowed to be sent to him, among which was a copy of the Old and New Testament, of course in French, with Dr. Bogue's Essay on its Inspiration and Value, with it, which he duly received. Napoleon studied these books dilligently, and it was returned after his death to Dr. Bogue's family—marked notes in the margin with the Emperor's own hand. Many nights, when he thought no ear was open, save the hearer of prayer, he spent hours in prayer to the God and Father of him who is able to save to the uttermost all who come by him. It was never known that he unbosomed himself to a fellow-mortal; he refused all church ministrations, he made no sign to man but the calm beauty of his expressive face seemed to testify that he had peace with God. These things were known in the household.

The following curious note is attached to the article from which the foregoing extract is taken:

"It may be information to some of your readers to be told that the title of Napoleon III. had its origin in the mistake in the printing of the placards, by which he was proclaimed Emperor. A note of admiration was placed after Napoleon II.! thus the printer read it III.; and when shown to the Emperor, he said, 'Let it stand, it is no matter.' Already thousands had gone through France, and they were rather hurried in those days."

THE BEAUTIES OF KANSAS.

ELD. B. MATTHIAS seems amazingly charmed with that State. He writes as follows:

A word about this country. In all my experience I never saw such perfection in nature.

Not as good and orderly as when the morning stars sang together, and the sons of God shouted for joy. It has its ills and spasmodic turns: flashes vivid lightning, and rolls terrific thunder: it entertains and nourishes depredators, in insects, worms, borers, and moles, not peculiar here; they are everywhere—God's tax-gatherers. But the crows and hawks are civilized. The corn is not disturbed by any thing; no scare-crows are used. Hawks don't catch chickens. They are plenty but they pass over the prairies looking for other game—moles, mice and snakes.

The scene is not unbroken prairie. The settlers among the first things they do is to plant orchards, which do exceedingly well—and forests, that grow fast. Instance, eighty rods in front of our cabin lies an enclosure of forty acres: ten of which is a forest of maples in lines, from the seed, from seven to ten feet high, but three years old: besides this, a vineyard and orchards of apple and peach trees, and other varieties; the whole surrounded by a dense fence of the Osage orange tree, full of thorns, and bears very large oranges, not eatable, however. The tall poplar, that became a nuisance in the East, flourishes here and is among their plantings. In an oblique direction, twice eighty rods, lies another forty acres inclosed and stocked in the same way. In our rear, across a forty-acre lot, there is another of the kind, well occupied with the varieties before named. The most noticeable is a lovely orchard of bearing apple trees. These form the rule. You can see these clumps of trees in all directions and at various distances. We are in the latitude of Washington, D. C. Our warmest days have been about 82, and the wind refreshing. The east and south winds are pleasant here. None of that blasting chill that accompanies those winds in the East. The soil is clay and sandy loam, alternately, according to the elevations or depressions. I don't know its depth by actual measurement, but deeper than an ordinary post hole: so far I have been down. This has accumulated through long ages by the decomposition of the heavy crops of grass and flowers, and most likely it is in its primitive form, in the make of the surface. It produces, abundantly, easy and vigorously.

The farmers and the rest, are by no means hard workers.

All agricultural machines are, I think, in use here. I have seen hundreds of loads pass our cabin door. Don't be surprised! I have seen more teams pass this way and that, than I ever imagined passed on any road. Perhaps the travel on this road exceeds any other in the world. I have sometimes noticed seven and eight in a string. They could not be entertained on the road if they were disposed to the luxury. Their way is to camp on the prairies, turn their team out to grass, and the men and women take to their coffee, and the rest, and then turn into their wagons or under them, wrapped in their blankets. Camp fires, of course, which are a nuisance, for we don't know whose wood they burn.

Farming is not hard work here.
They ride when they plough,
They ride when they sow,
They ride when they reap,
And ride when they mow.
They ride when they gather,
They ride when they scatter,
They ride when they row,
And that's what's the matter.
They ride when they plant,
On a new kind of dropper,
When, with each revolution
Corn falls from the hopper,
If more than this you care to know,
They choose to ride where e'er they go.

REMARK BY THE EDITOR. We do not think Kansas is even restored. Beware of the "leeks and onions," lest there should be a "fall in the wilderness." Let us look for the restitution under Prince Immanuel, and keep our eyes on the heavenly land. Let us remember, "This was the iniquity of Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness. Ezek. xvi., 49. Work, pretty hard work, too, is more promotive of man's best interests than too easy a way of getting his bread.

So God appointed, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return to the ground."

A CORRECTION.—In the "Crisis" of June 16th I put a letter from Bro. Dobney, of England, in which the word "not" is left out by mistake; it should read, "Mr. Dunn owns the Bible is so silent about it [the intermediate state], that he knows not that sinners are on probation there." J. BLAIN.

We copied the letter from the "Crisis" of which Eld. Blain speaks, and of course the error also. It struck us as a very singular argument, as it stood, and we said so at the time. We now copy the above correction from the "Crisis" of last week.

"Mr. Dunn" may yet learn that "the Bible is silent about" his idea of a future probation and restoration of sinners who have died in their sins. That notion is the grand error or "mistake" with him; about which, to say the least, "the Scriptures are so silent that he knows not that sinners are on probation there."

FROM WM. H. SPENCER.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., July 13, 1869.

BR. STORRS: The battle is raging here, and the Life views are the exciting topic throughout the Advent body. Henry Pratt has become alarmed, and taking the church under his parental arm promises to shield it from the influence of the soul-destroying non-resurrection heresy. He is working with all his might and strength against it; but his foolish impetuosity in opposing Life views by attacking me from the pulpit is really doing more good than harm. While the lion roars with rage, raising a terrible dust, I quietly advance on their works of defence, in the strength of the Lord. Much inquiry is awakened, and I take special pains in answering inquiries, and endeavor to leave suggestive ideas upon the minds of all. My little tract, "The Divine Plan," which has reached its second edition, has been greatly instrumental in producing this condition, as it has led the mind into a channel of inquiry, which generally results in thorough investigation of the subject. I am determined to push the battle here as the Lord may lead. The prospect looks glorious! Praise the Lord!

WM. FORRESTER, Dundee, N. Y., writes: Please say for the benefit of any who are afflicted with the "BLEEDING PILES," use "Bittersweet Ointment," when going to bed, made of Bittersweet and fresh butter; also, make a steady drink of Red Raspberry tea, not very strong. I have received special relief from these remedies, which I wish to make known to all thus afflicted.

FOR OUR SAVIOUR'S SAKE.

"COME, daughter," said Mrs. Gray, as Minnie appeared in the nursery, "you have had a nice long play since school. Can't you amuse your little sister now, while I prepare tea by the time your papa returns?"

Minnie's flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes told of the enjoyment she had had, but there was something in her manner that also told of her reluctance to leave her play just at present; but possessing an obliging disposition, and loving her mother so dearly, she tried to appear cheerful, and replied:

"Yes, mamma, I will."

The slight struggle between duty and pleasure did not escape her mamma's watchful eye, and with joy she smoothed her golden curls, and softly whispered in her ear: "For our Saviour's sake, dear." She then repaired to the dining-room.

"What could mamma have meant?" thought Minnie, as she pondered upon her mother's words, "I am sure I love little sister most dearly"—and she kissed her rosy lips—"and like to please mamma; but how can I be doing anything for the Saviour's sake, indeed I cannot tell." So the little girl wisely concluded to ask "mamma" the first opportunity.

Presently tea was ready and the lamps were lighted, and all were so happy in the sweet enjoyment of home and the society of one another, that she forgot the sentence that had puzzled her a few hours before. But when bed-time came, and the loving parent bent over her with a good-night kiss, Minnie put her arms around her neck and said:

"Dear mamma, won't you please tell me what you meant by saying 'for our Saviour's sake?'"

Seating herself beside the bed, her mamma said, "Have I not heard my little girl often wish she could do something for Christ?"

"Oh, yes, indeed!" replied Minnie; "whenever I read about how Jesus went about doing good continually. I wish with all my heart, that I could follow his example; but I am only a little girl—what can I do?"

"I wish to remind you, dear Minnie, that this was an opportunity for a little act of self-denial. You must not think, because you are not grown, and are not doing some great act, that you cannot be useful. This world is made up of little things. 'Tis little words of kindness, little deeds of love, that help to make our life pleasant and happy; and it is little girls like you that can send rays of sunshine into their parent's hearts by doing cheerfully what they are told to do. As you advance in life and opportunities for doing good increase, ever bear in mind this sweet motto, and let it be the rule of life:

Did we but view our daily path aright,
Work would seem a pleasure and our duties light;
Our daily burdens we should meekly take,
With this sweet motive—for our Saviour's sake.

HONESTY THE BEST POLICY.

ONE day the Duke of Buccleuch, a Scotch nobleman, bought a cow in the neighborhood of Dalkeith, where he lived. The cow was to be sent home the next morning. Early in the morning the duke was taking a walk in a very common dress. As he went along, he saw a boy trying in vain to drive the cow to his residence. The cow was very unruly, and the poor boy could not get on with her at all. The boy, not knowing the duke, bawled out to him, in broad Scotch accent,

"Hie mun, come here, and gie's a han' wi' this beast."

The duke walked slowly on, not seeming to notice the boy, who still kept calling for his help. At last, finding he could not get on with the cow, he cried out in distress, "Come here, mun, and help us, and as sure as anything I'se gie ye half I get."

The duke went and lent a helping hand.

"And now," said the duke, as they trudged along after the cow, "how much do you think you will get for the job?"

"I dinna ken," said the boy, "but I'm sure o' something, for the folks at the big house are guid to a bodies."

As they came to a lane near the house the duke slipped away from the boy, and entered by a different way. Calling his butler, he put a sovereign in his hand, saying, "Give that to the boy who has brought the cow."

He then returned to the end of the lane where he had parted from the boy, so as to meet him on his way back.

"Well, how much did you get?" asked the duke.

"A shilling," said the boy, "and there's half o' it."

"But surely you had more than a shilling," said the duke.

"No," said the boy, "sure that's a' I got; and d'ye not think it's plenty?"

"I do not," said the duke; there must be some mistake; and as I am acquainted with the duke, if you return I think I'll get you more."

They went back. The duke rang the bell, and ordered all the servants to be assembled.

"Now," said the duke to the boy, "point me out the person who gave you the shilling."

"It was that chap there with the apron," said he, pointing to the butler.

The butler fell on his knees, confessed his fault, and begged to be forgiven; but the duke indignantly ordered him to give the boy the sovereign and quit his service immediately.

"You have lost," said the duke, "your money, your situation, and your character, by your deceitfulness: learn, for the future, that honesty is the best policy."

The boy now found out who it was that helped him to drive the cow; and the duke was so pleased with the manliness and honesty of the boy, that he sent him to school, and provided for him at his own expense.

THOUGHTS ON A BIRTHDAY.

THE 5th of July, my seventieth birthday, how weighty the thoughts that crowd memory's tablet in the review of sixty-nine years of responsibilities! Little did I expect to reach this point. The greater part of those who commenced life with me, in my circle of friends, are slumbering in the dust. In reviewing the past, I note the influence of daughter and sister, the eldest of the family circle of six brothers, carefully nurtured in the fear of God by the best of parents, a teacher of youths, a wife; in time, the mother of eight children, a widow with this number to care for alone; now a grandmother, surrounded by lisping infancy. In the wake of all this, I note the influence of neighbor and friend; above all, a disciple of the Lord Jesus. What an array! Who is sufficient for these responsibilities?

Jesus said, if any man love me he will keep my words, and my Father will love him and we will make our abode with Him. Here lies the secret of success. The review of the past is not what I would have it; yet Jesus has many times manifested himself to my troubled spirit to strengthen faith, brighten hope, and encourage in the Christian race; so that I have long believed all was laid upon the altar a living sacrifice. From this point I would raise my Ebenezer, for, hitherto has the Lord helped me; and He has been, through sixty-nine years, chiselling, smoothing, and preparing the material, in this earthly quarry, for that beautiful Temple, to which will soon be added the top-stone, with shoutings of "Grace unto it."

The past reveals to me, in unmistakable light, the faithfulness of Him who has promised. The future looks short, but bright with the rays of the Sun of righteousness. Believing in a union with Him as the branch is united to the vine, I desire, above all things, to see Him whom my soul loveth. So rich is the privilege now of sitting under His shadow, and His fruit so sweet to the taste, what will it be to behold Him face to face?

With the victor's triumph, I review the past and anticipate the future: victory, not my own, but through Christ; rejoicing that the race is so nearly run, and the goal almost in sight. Soon shall we unite with the heavenly orchestra in ascriptions of glory, honor, and thanksgiving to Him who has redeemed us to God by his blood.

We now have a short tarrying time. Beloved sisters in Christ, let us wisely improve it; seeking not high things, but condescend to men of low estate. It was written by an eminent minister, that if two angels were commissioned to the earth, one to wield a sceptre, the other to sweep the street, they would have no choice. So do I regard the honors of earth; a mere bubble: while the approval of Him, who has redeemed us, is worthy the aspiration of every intelligent being.

We who are aged have yet a great work to to do. I often hear the remark that the aged have done their work and should rest. I do not so regard it. Rest has not come yet. Our children, for whom we have so long labored and prayed, are in the heat of conflict in these perilous times, when the rushing waters of corruption seem threatening to engulf and blast all our hopes. How much they need the aid of tried, overcoming faith; the lessons of wisdom and experience that should have been gathered, these many years; the sympathy of our hearts; above all, the fervent, effectual prayer, that avails much. The little ones that gather around our knees, and ask for a story about Jesus, we may write upon their tender minds lessons that will remain when our work is done and our reward given.

The responsibilities of age look to me like gathering influences of a lifetime into one grand focus, and that a luminary to reflect its hallowed light on all around. May this year of my pilgrimage be thus marked, if added to the past; so pure and bright that none may be led into mistakes by it; and many, by its steady light, be directed to the narrow way that leads to Life Eternal.

LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

ST. PAUL, MINN., July, 1869.

A. A. BABCOCK, Albion, Mich., writes: Send me some Campaign Documents. I have scattered many and want more. I have been much confined to the house this season, and my health is poor. I have attended the annual conference of "the one faith:" had a good meeting, but something must be shut out: the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, they say, is no part of the gospel. So it will be good tidings to hear the waiting of the damned in, what they call the second death. A Brother wished to speak of the propriety of "breaking bread" at the yearly pascal feast, as Christ and his Apostles did at the last supper; but this was not allowed. Who shuts out light more than those in high standing. Myself and companion attended the Advent tent conference near Jonesville heard nine discourses, but only heard the word "kingdom" ten times. They seemed to be fearful of giving any hint of a future age. The Methodists, Baptists and Presbyterians were called upon to "come and go with us, and we will do you good;" but believers in the age to come and the non-resurrection of the wicked were "too ultra." But I said what I could, and gave away tracts. God must give the increase. Yours truly, in the Bible hope.

DANIEL HAWKS, Andes, N. Y., writes: I usually attend the Methodist meeting. In one of the prayer-meetings they sung,

Satan trembles when he sees,
The weakest Saint upon his knees, etc.

Then the minister got down on his knees and asked the Lord, if that was true? After asking the Lord, he answered the question himself, by saying, "We know it is true;" and then said, "how zealous we should be to perform that duty that makes satan tremble." I believe the Christian religion does not require us to believe any doctrine or perform any duty but what is reasonable and proper; and such a motive for prayer I think no D. D. can prove from God's word. It must be proved by some better testimony than that of a minister's saying he "knows it is true." When will men exercise the reason God has given them, and not be led by the assertions of others? The theology of the present day is so mixed up with the traditions of men that a thinking man must turn from it in disgust, and doubt the honesty or intelligence of those who "teach for doctrines the commandments of men." Yours, in hope of eternal life.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

THERE is a universal impression that in the event of the downfall of the French Empire, there will be a general transformation in European politics looking toward the establishment of republican governments in Spain, Italy, France, and shaking all the thrones of Europe, not excepting that of Great Britain. In the present agitation of the public mind in England against the landed oligarchy of the lords, a revolution in France would not fail to add fuel to the flames, and remind the English people that they have never had the advantage of a revolution like that of 1789 in France, which swept the aristocracy from political existence, and put an end to its feudal privileges. The barons who wrested Magna Charta from the Crown, who approved of the execution of Charles I. and drove James II. from England, deemed their own order invulnerable. English history is, in that respect, altogether different from that of France, where, under Richelieu's influence, the Crown was made to preponderate over the nobility, leaving it for a future age to strike down the King. In England, on the other hand, the nobility has long been more powerful than the Crown; and the present indications are, that while the Queen retains her hold upon the affections of the people, the aristocracy is more and more losing its prestige, so that the possible revolutionary movement in Great Britain will be in the first instance directed against the lords and not against the sovereign.

The news of the French Emperor and Empress showing themselves to the populace and being received with "enthusiastic cheers" by the same people who are bent upon the destruction of the Empire, was evidently sent from the telegraph office in the Tuileries in order to create a fictitious impression of the surviving popularity of the last of the Bonapartes. Students of French history may remember how Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette returned to Versailles in childish glee whenever a few ragamuffins clapped their hands on the passage of their equipage. It is said that history repeats itself, which is only another mode of stating that human nature remains the same in all ages, and that it becomes again and again disgusted with the one-man power, whether wielded by a Bourbon or a Bonaparte. The revolutionary disposition of the French people involves a far more imminent danger to the Imperial dynasty than the political success of the extreme Radicals, though the former is no doubt encouraged by the latter.

Even if the storm gathering over Napoleon's head should be again lulled for the present, it is sure to break out hereafter with increased and irresistible violence. The masses everywhere demur to the sovereign pretensions of any single individual, and awaken more and more to the American idea of self-government. The expulsion of Napoleon from Paris at the present time would have the advantage of solving the Spanish and Cuban questions in the sense of republican and national independence, and give a blow to monarchical institutions from which they might never be able to recover. Truly the world is moving, and the sovereignty of the people is more and more becoming its ruling power.—N. Y. Sun.

2 COR. V., 21.

"FOR he hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin."

"The word amartia occurs here twice; in the first place, it means sin; i. e., transgression and guilt; and of Christ it is said, 'he knew no sin, i. e., was innocent: for not to know sin, is the same as to be conscious of innocence; so, to be conscious of nothing against one's self, is the same as to be unimpeachable.

"In the second place, it signifies a sin-offering, or sacrifice for sin, and answers to the chataah and chataath of the Hebrew text; which signifies both sin and sin-offering in a great variety of places in the Pentateuch. The Septuagint translates the Hebrew word by amartia in ninety-four places in Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers, where a sin-offering is meant; and where our version translates the word, not sin, but an offering for sin. Had our translators attended to their own method of translating the word in other places, where it means the same as here, they would not have given this false view of a passage which has been made the foundation of a most blasphemous doctrine: viz., that our sins were imputed to Christ, and that he was a proper object of the indignation of Divine justice, because he was blackened with imputed sin: and some have proceeded so far in this blasphemous career as to say that Christ may be considered as the greatest of sinners, because all the sins of mankind, or of the elect, as they say, were imputed to him, and reckoned as his own. One of these writers translates the passage thus, "God accounted Christ the greatest of sinners, that we might be supremely righteous." Thus, they have confounded sin with the punishment due to sin: Christ suffered in our stead; died for us; bore our sins in his own body upon the tree, for the Lord laid upon him the iniquity of us all—explained by making his soul, his life, an offering for sin; and healing us by his stripes."—Sel. by F. PHILADELPHIA, Penn.

ABOUT OUR WORK.

CHRISTIANITY does not set its compasses and strike a circle and gather within its peculiar doings, and say, On these will I bestow my benignant smile, and on others outside will I look with indifference or coldness. It does not say to the student, Have a liking for this study or this act and I will favor you: it does not say to the merchant, Select this department of commerce or trade and you shall have my benediction; it does not say to the toiler in the shop or on the farm, Let your labors be spent on this or that and I will reward you. No. Christianity has no such limitations. As broad as is the sphere of right doing, so broad is the sphere which its smiles cover. But it says, Work with your hands or your head, for your own or your family's sustenance, for your neighbor, countryman or race. Christianity has no provision, no smiles, no benedictions for drones; no seat for them at its table, no words of good cheer, no room in its heaven. In the perturbed and commingled condition of things on earth there may be bed and board for them, but no real life; but in the harmonious and pure state of things which Christianity will beget, there is no place and no reward for them. It says to every man who heeds its voice, work—somewhere—somehow.

But we are to work the thing that is good. There is a restraint as well as a liberty—there is exclusion and there is inclusion. If a man is an evil worker, the more constant and vigorous he is, the worse is it for him and the world. If a man is engaged in any work that injures his fellow-man, then the gospel has no benedictions for him, but anathemas rather. It hovers like a cloud loaded with boding thunders and penetrated with forked lightnings in his path. It matters not what palliations he may urge for his evil work—that he knows not what to do—that his family will starve if he do not thus sustain them. Let them suffer hunger if so it must be; let them shiver in the chill winds of Autumn, or in the terrible cold of Winter; better that wife and children go down to a pauper's grave, than be pampered with all indulgences wrung from the worst appetites and passions of men. How much of that which men do and do earnestly and industriously, is evil and only evil and that continually, and this they do under the pretence of getting a living! They had far better call it getting a dying. The bread they thus get is poisoned bread, the houses they thus built are haunted houses. Ah! yes, these are haunted houses, and the moanings of many a victim sent to an untimely grave would make night hideous if the occupant had only ears to hear. Woe! woe! woe! is all the gospel has to say to the wrong-doer.

Tell us what society really wants to equip it thoroughly in its more central or remote sections, in all its ramified services and engagements, and we will tell you what one may yet do and be wholly a Christian, with the smile of God upon him, with the spirit of God in his soul, and the hope of heaven beaming upon him. A young man is not to assume that if he submits to Christ and comes within the circle of His friends, that he must as a matter of course become a minister, or that he must of course leave his present sphere of diligence. The Lord may want him in the ministry. He may want him in the missionary-field, or He may not. He may want him as a lawyer, physician, farmer, mechanic, citizen, merchant. Christianity has no direct word to say to any young man as to the specific department of labor he is to fill, only that he is to work, and to work that which is good.

Let a young man get a good heart and sanctified impulses and spirit, entirely subdued to the master, and then follow his idea. "The integrity of the upright shall guide him." Christianity claims the powers of all its followers, and it claims them for just those departments for which they have the best endowments and training. The bad work, the doubtful work, it abjures, and all the rest it welcomes. No one has a right to look down as if from a higher height on his fellow with contempt, any more than the head has a right to look down on the foot with disdain. The high are on their height for the whole, not for themselves. No man in a Christian society lives or works for himself. The statesman works in his sphere, the lawyer in his, the farmer in his, the mechanic, craftsman, and delver in his, not for himself but for the whole—all mutual helpers, all stewards of the manifold grace of God.—The Advance.

DREAMS AND DREAMING.

DREAMS generally occur when sleep is unsound, and the phenomena give much support to the theory of Gall, that the brain consists of many separate organs. "When," says he, "one organ is active, the dream is simple; the object of our love is embraced, harmonious music is heard, we fight our enemies, according as one organ or another is performing its functions." Dreams are supposed by many to be excited chiefly by the memory of something which has occurred a short time previous to falling asleep; but this is the exception rather than the rule. They consist more frequently of the revival of old associations, and not seldom of events which seem to have been forgotten. One of the most remarkable things connected with dreaming is the absence of judgment. We converse with the dead, and, even though we may know them to be dead, this excites in us no surprise. Fear is also generally absent. Another curious circumstance is that space and time have no existence in dreams. It has happened to most people to dream that they have passed through some long period of days, or even of years, while they have been only a short time asleep. But still more curious is the fact that some sudden impression on the senses, such as the noise of shutting a door, or the entrance of light into the room where a person is asleep, and by which he is awakened, is often the exciting cause of an elaborate dream, in which the noise or the light is what all the incidents turn upon. There seem, indeed, to be many things connected with our mental structure which are, as it were, analyzed and dissected for us by the process of dreaming, could we interpret them rightly. A book might be filled with the account of the so-called prophetic dreams which have been published. Many otherwise strong-minded persons have been so struck by a dream of this kind as to give entire credence to the connection between it and the event which it foreshadowed. But it has always seemed to us that in such cases one consideration has been entirely overlooked; it is this: People are constantly experiencing remarkable coincidences, such as the unexpected meeting with persons of whom they have been talking or thinking; or the coincidence may be of such a nature as to make it important or valuable in connection with something about to be done or not to be done. But it never occurs to them that in such a matter any thing supernatural has supervened. Now, since coincidences are by no means rare in the waking world, why should they be regarded as rare in connection with the world of dreams? Why, in other words, should it be thought necessary in the one case to attribute that to the supernatural which is accepted in accordance with the doctrine of chances in the other case? Let it only be considered what thousands of dreams are nightly experienced, and that out of these thousands a considerable number have sufficient point to be remembered afterward. Is it then surprising, considering what occurs in every-day life, if in a few instances dreams seem to be fulfilled? This, without question, is the true explanation of so-called prophetic dreams. Horses neigh in their sleep, and every one is familiar with the angry growls as well as the cheerful bark which proceed from the sleeping dog. There can be no doubt that the memory of incidents in dog life, such as of the combat or of the chase, are in such cases present to the animal's consciousness. Children dream almost from birth, and they suffer more from frightful dreams than adults do. Some of the dreams of childhood not unfrequently make impressions upon the mind which endure throughout life. It has been supposed that our dreams become less extravagant and inconsistent as we grow older. This seems true on the whole; but at times the most extraordinary dreams occurs at every period of life. Old people seem to dream more than the middle-aged, but unlike the young, the aged seldom speak in their sleep. —People's Magazine.

JAMES SMITH, Orringtn, Me., writes: I have been trying to communicate with you for some time, but have been prevented by ill health. I sit up about half the time; and probably I shall fall by that enemy that has prevailed for near six thousand years, but who is soon to be destroyed, and all the saints are to have victory over the monster. Well, my hope is firm in God: never firmer than now. We shall soon put on immortality and rest forever at home.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality: The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

INSPIRATION.

WE give the following article from the "American Presbyterian," not because we can adopt every expression in it, but because we have seen nothing that comes so near to our views on the subject. We see hardly an expression in it but what we can indorse most heartily:

INSPIRATION: DEFINITION AND LIMITS.

By inspiration, we mean a mysterious, miraculous influence exerted upon the minds of a specific and limited class of men, and producing three kinds of effects: (1) a knowledge of truth which they could not obtain by the regular operations of the faculties, and (2) a power of selection among truths or facts already known, or accessible by ordinary means, according to the purposes of the inspiring Agent. (3). With both of these gifts, a third is associated, before our idea of inspiration is complete, namely that of making an infallibly correct record of the truths thus gained or selected. Any and all attempts at a psychological explanation of the mode of this influence must be given up, just as unhesitatingly as an attempt to explain the miracle of the multiplication of the loaves and fishes. All classifying of this influence with other natural and more or less known operations of the mind, must, we think, be eschewed, as quite overlooking its purely miraculous quality, and its place, as a specific element, in the economy of Redemption. Only by accommodation and analogy can it be compared with what men, outside of theological circles, call "inspiration." That power of insight and grasp of truth and gift of utterance which are the mysterious prerogatives of genius, are, indeed, often spoken of in connection with the writers of the Bible; by some, as if they were all that could be claimed for them; by others, as if they furnished at least a satisfactory illustrtion of the mode of the divine influence; by others still, as one class of divine influences, not so elevated, but still essentially the same as those enjoyed by the sacred writers. We dismiss each and all of these theories of men solicitous to put a wholly supernatural fact in a natural and rational garb. The inspiration of these writers is a fact utterly sui generis, no more to be accounted for, on rational grounds, than were the forty years' wanderings of the children of Israel in the wilderness, or than any one of the divine facts through which the plan of salvation was brought into human history and attested to men.

We dismiss, too, the question, to what extent these writers were mere machines; what amount of volition they exercise in forming definite verbal conceptions of what they knew in general by inspiration; and how far they were permitted to follow their natural bent in the matter of style and logical form. If we grant that, as a result of the mysterious co-working of the divine and human in the Scriptures, an infallibly true book has been secured, we need not contend about the relative proportion of these two elements in the problem. If we deny a dictation of every separate word and argument, but at the same time hold that words and arguments convey the exact truth, just as much as if they had been dictated, we are on orthodox ground, without being bound to any mechanical theory. We do not intend to repudiate what is called "plenary inspiration," but we deny that it is needed in its mechanical form to make out the case. Indeed, the plenary, or mechanical theory cannot go with us whole, a step beyond the original text of the record. If it was the very words that were dictated, the charm is broken whenever you translate them; whereas, on the other view, a faithful translation is, to all intents and purposes, the inspired volume.

Now we hold explicitly that all Scripture is given by inspiration; that the Inspiring Agent is everywhere, in every page and proposition, in every sentence and word. That which is given as matter of record, is an infallibly true record. Sometimes it is a record of things good and true, sometimes of things evil and false, but as a record it is, in each case, equally true. Sometimes it is a prophecy, a disclosure, a command, a warning; in each and all these it is supreme—divine. Whatever, according to all fair, common-sense rules of interpretation, the inspired writers felt themselves charged to convey, that the Holy Spirit speaks to us. Error in the passage of the truth from the Spirit, through their minds and pens to us, cannot be admitted in any shape, form or degree, without vitiating the very idea of inspiration as the sole, infallible source of truth and authority, and thus destroying the value of the Scriptures. Nothing is gained to the world by Revelation, if men may go through the Bible, each one choosing what accords with his own judgment, and rejecting all the rest. A Revelation could be made available by such a process, only on the supposition that man was already in full sympathy with God; and in that case, there would be virtually no need of a revelation at all.

However, it is a business of prime importance, which every theory of inspiration we choose, to learn in what degree we have secured a perfect copy of the original. We may not hold the inspiring Agent accountable for errors that have crept into manuscripts. There was no pledge on the part of Deity in giving us His word, to preserve an absolutely perfect copy of the original record through all time. This would have required a constant succession of miracles, an inspiration of copyists, as well as original writers, a suspension of the laws of decay, as to the material of the manuscripts and the like. While Divine Providence, in a wonderful manner, has guarded the substantial purity of these precious documents, their condition shows that He has wrought no such miracles as those. The original work of the authors, those copies of the Epistles which Paul authenticated with a concluding sentence in his own handwriting, have not been handed down to us. The versions and copies of these writings which we possess, dating from the second century and onward, although sufficiently ancient, accurate and well attested, are not, by any means, free from errors, as their various readings show. And while not one in a hundred of these various readings is of any practical importance, not one doctrine of religion being changed, nor one precept taken away, nor one important fact altered by the whole of them taken together, yet it is well to take ground distinctly, that only as we approximate exactly to the original text, can we hold the Inspiring Agent responsible for the work. If, for instance, sound criticism rejects the passage in 1 John v., 7, as we believe it does, we may remove it from the text without touching the question of inspiration at all. It was not in the manuscript as it came from the Apostle's hand, and we do not want it in our copies. It is no part of the Holy Spirit's work. The judging, critical faculties of man are designed, in providence, to be used in tracing the exact verbal form, and in maintaining the verbal purity, of the divine communications, as well as in unfolding their meaning.

Nor was inspiration such an endowment that it preserved the writers, at all other times, from error or infirmity. Balaam and even Balaam's ass might be under such influence as to utter infallible truth, and immediately afterward relapse into a condition with which the word of God has no concern. Peter was blamed to the face by Paul, yet he was inspired to write part of the New Testament. So much or the activity of these men as was actually employed in forming the inspired record—so much, and no more,—is covered by the specific influence of the inspiring Agent; the argument is not affected by their conduct as fallible men, at other times.

The same is to be said of the characters introduced, and of the language quoted, in the historical parts of the Bible. The wrong and criminal acts of these characters are put upon record simply as matter of history and for admonition; the Inspiring Agent is responsible for none of these acts, but solely for the correctness with which they have been recorded. Wicked speeches, false statements, and unconscious errors, are merely put on record as facts, not as examples to be imitated. No one thinks of ascribing to the Inspiring Agent such a declaration as, "There is no God." By His instruction it was written down as a matter of record, as the utterance of "the fool." We have frequently, in studying the historical difficulties of Stephen's speech (Acts vii.) asked ourselves, whether inspiration should be held accountable for them? The question may be put thus: Was Stephen inspired to make the speech, or was it only Luke who was inspired to put the speech on record, exactly as it was delivered? Whatever be the answer, the true theory of inspiration will be fully satisfied on the latter supposition, and why should we require more? In Paley's Evidences there is quite an argument upon the historical difficulties in the speech of Gamaliel, Acts v., 34–37. The author is anxious to remove these difficulties, and speaks of the discrepancy between Gamaliel and Josephus as if it was actually between Josephus and Luke. The fact is, all we can rightfully demand of Luke, as an inspired penman, is the faithful reporting of what Gamaliel said. He is no more responsible for the correctness of the statements than the reporter of the courts if for the truthfulness of the witnesses' testimony which he takes down.

The inspiring Agent again, must not be held responsible for the literal truth of current forms of speech, in which the appearance of things is described; as "the sun rises" or "sets." If language scientifically correct had been used in place of these current phrases, it would have confused readers, whose ideas were so totally different. Poetical expressions, such as the pillars of heaven, pillars of the earth, etc., must be judged exactly as we would judge similar expressions in our own literature. Still more important is it to observe, in the case of such books as Job and the Ecclesiastes, that there is an argument with a right and a wrong side, carried through the entire book, and that passages cannot be cited indiscriminately from either Job or Ecclesiastes, as having a divine warrant. Job's friends insisted that God dealt out temporal good and evil according to the present deserts of men; a doctrine which Job rightly combatted. We are, of course, not authorized to cite the language of Job's friends as inspired. The discussion was put upon record by direction of the inspiring Agent, but what part of the discussion we are to regard as inspired, is one of those questions which divine wisdom has left for the training of the judgment of His people. The sad, desponding, unbelieving expressions in Ecclesiastes require to be estimated not by themselves; for then they would necessarily be rejected as untrue; but they must be weighed in connection with the book as a whole; as bringing out more forcibly the leading truth; "the conclusion of the whole matter."

Mr. Barnes, in his Introduction to the Psalms, makes similar remarks in reference to some of the most difficult of those very difficult portions of Scripture—the Imprecatory Psalms. He says (Introd. Vol. I., p. 29.) "Some of the expressions referred to are a mere record of the feelings of others; of the gratification which they would feel in seeing vengeance inflicted on the guilty, even when revenge should be taken in the most barbarous and savage manner. In such a case, all that the inspired writer, or the Spirit of inspiration, is responsible for, is the fairness of the record; or that He has given an exact statement of the feelings which would be cherished and expressed by those who would inflict the vengeance, or who should experience gratification in seeing it." Referring to Psalm cxxxvii: 8, 9, he says: "In this there is nothing which necessarily implies that the author of the Psalms would approve of it, or that he would have done it himself. If the case is supposed even to indicate the common feelings of the Hebrew people . . . . still it may be a mere record of that feeling as a matter of fact, and the Spirit of inspiration is responsible only for a fair account of the feelings which would actually exist."—*Am. THE NATURE OF THE KINGDOM.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

"Come ye Blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom, prepared for you, from the foundation of the world." Matth. xxv., 34.

IN a previous article, I showed that the gospel always pertains to the kingdom, which was prepared when the world was made. In this, I propose to show the NATURE of that kingdom. To understand the nature of that kingdom alone will not save us, but to understand and believe the gospel of that kingdom, will be the power of God unto salvation. It is that kingdom, that needs the gospel, and which is to be improved by it. If we do not understand the nature of the kingdom, we shall not be likely to comprehend the nature of the gospel which pertains to it. It is he that heareth the word of the kingdom, and understandeth it, that will bring forth fruit unto perfection.

In order that we may appreciate, more fully, the value of the kingdom, which was prepared when the world was made, I will call attention.

1. TO HIM WHO MADE THE PREPARATION.

In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth. He stretched out the heavens, and all the host of them, He made the earth, and the man, and the beast upon it. In wisdom he made them all. He saw the end from the beginning; therefore his work is perfect, and all his ways are judgment.

His power, his wisdom, his knowledge, and his goodness, are all infinite; therefore, his purposes are immutable, and his counsel must stand. Such is the Being who prepared the kingdom that is to be given to Christ and the saints.

Such a Being could not fail to make the best arrangement for the kingdom that could be made, all things considered. Experience cannot suggest any improvement to all his already perfect work. His work cannot be improved by repetition. God himself will never be any better qualified to lay the foundations of a kingdom than he was when he made the world. Then let us examine carefully,

2. THE PREPARATION.

Every kingdom is composed of four elements. The Rulers, the Subjects, the Territory, and the Laws. We will notice each of the elements of this kingdom separately.

1. The Territory.—The earth was prepared for the territory of the kingdom. Its foundations were laid so that it should not be removed forever. The throne of David was established on the earth. God swore to David that he would establish his seed upon his throne forever, even as long as the sun and moon endure. And the Lord shall be King over all the earth. Zech. xiv., 9. The saints will be made kings and priests and they shall reign on the earth. Rev. v., 10. This kingdom shall not pass away or be destroyed. Dan. vii., 14.

The Lord made the earth to be inhabited and he did not make it in vain. Isa. xlv., 18. He adapted the earth to such an end. It was to bring forth grass, and grain, and fruit, for food for its inhabitants. Gen. i., 11, 29, 30. This provision to supply the wants of its inhabitants was to be inseparable from the earth forever. While the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease. Gen. vii., 22.

Thus, God prepared the earth to be the territory of the kingdom forever. The earth, then, is the only place of the kingdom. This conclusion is unavoidable. No other place was prepared. If the earth is not the place of the kingdom, then God did not prepare any; for this is the only place he made. No other place is mentioned any where in the Bible as the place of the kingdom. We must accept this or nothing. But, God did prepare a kingdom when he made the world; therefore, he did prepare its territory, which is an essential element of any kingdom. The earth, then, is the territory of the kingdom which is promised to the saints.

2. The Subjects.—Who did God prepare for subjects? An earthy man was prepared, to be the head of a race of subjects in the kingdom.

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness. So God created man in his own image, out of the dust of the ground, male and female created he them; and God blessed them, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion over the animals and over all the earth. And the Lord took the man whom he had formed, and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it.

And commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat. But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it, for in (after) the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die Gen. i., 26–28, and ii., 7, 17. This is the man who was to be the subject in the kingdom. If we can understand the nature of this man, we can understand what will belong to the subjects in the kingdom.

Let us carefully look at this description of him.

(1.) He was made of the dust of the ground. He was an earthy man, and was adapted to an earthly existence, on the earth which God had prepared for him to inhabit. He was to live by breathing the breath of life, which was so abundantly provided to impart life to both the animal and vegetable creation. He was also to live by eating of the fruits of the earth. Both of these were essential to his life. Deprive him of either, and he could not live. He must breathe the breath of life, and eat of the fruits of the earth in order to live.

(2.) He was made out of the dust of the ground and in the image of God, that he might be like God, and love what God loves, and hate what God hates, and be governed by the motives by which God is governed, that he might develop a character demanded by the position that he was to occupy; it being to have dominion over the animal creation, and over all the earth.

(3.) He was to people the earth with people like himself. Everything was to reproduce after its kind. So Adam begat a son in his own likeness, after his image. As is the earth, such will the earthy always be. Such will be the inhabitants of the earth forever. All people, nations, and languages will be of this earthy race. They will serve God as long as the sun and moon endure. It was for such people that the earth was made, and such people will always inhabit it.

(4.) His business was to be the cultivation of the earth. He was to subdue the earth, to dress it, and keep it. And for this end he was to have dominion over the animal creation. His own necessities will always require him to attend to the business connected with seed-time and harvest, summer and winter, and day and night. The time will never come while the earth remains, that the cultivation of the earth will not be the legitimate business of the inhabitants of the world. They will always build houses and inhabit them, plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them.

(5.) He was made subject to God's laws. He had the power of choice. He could choose or refuse to obey any law God might enjoin upon him. God gave him a law which required obedience, and punished disobedience with death. He ought to obey; he ought not to disobey; but he could do either, being made responsible to God for his choice. His position was that of a subject. His posterity will always occupy the same position, and be subject to the same law, whether loyal or disloyal.

Thus, in the first Adam, God prepared the subjects for the kingdom. He was made an earthy man; he was to live by breathing the breath of life, and by eating the fruits of the earth. He was made in the likeness of God, and was to people the earth with a race in his own likeness. His business was to be the cultivation of the earth. And he was made subject to God's law forever.

3. THE LAW OF THE KINGDOM.

The law given to Adam before he sinned, reveals the principles by which the subjects of the kingdom will be governed.

1. It required absolute and perpetual obedience to God. It acknowledged no partial obedience. It knew no great and small sins. He that offended in one point, was guilty of all. No imperfect obedience could fulfil the requirements of this law.

2. It punished disobedience with death, and nothing beyond. Death extinguished the transgressor's life. The end of sin and the sinner is death.

3. It was to have jurisdiction in the kingdom forever. It provided that if Adam was obedient, he should have access to the tree of life, and live forever. But if disobedient, that he should be excluded from the tree of life, live a life of wearisome toil, and finally die. This is the law prepared for the kingdom, when the world was made: and this will be the law of the kingdom for ever.

4. THE KING.

God was the King. He who arranged the elements of this kingdom, adapting the earth to the inhabitants, and the inhabitants to the earth, and the law to both. He who made this whole preparation, He was the only supreme Ruler. He gave the law.

Thus the four essential elements are distinctly marked, and God's purpose in relation to each definitely stated. This arrangement can never be changed, because God's purpose is immutable.

The earth was made to be inhabited, and adapted to that end forever. Earthy inhabitants were prepared to inhabit it, and serve God as long as the sun and moon endure. The law was given to govern the people of the earth forever; and he who made this preparation said, I am God, and there is none else: my counsel shall stand and I will do all my pleasure. I have spoken it, I will also bring it to pass; I have purposed it, I will also do it.

We have no choice in this matter. We are shut up to this arrangement, or none. We cannot be in doubt whether the elements I have described are the elements of the kingdom or not; for there were none other prepared. The earth was the only territory. The earthy man was the only subject, the law given to him was the only law; And God was the only King in the kingdom prepared at that time. As God's work is perfect, these elements of the kingdom must always remain such. They can not be changed until God changes his purposes toward men.

5. This preparation was complete when it was made. The nature of the earth can never be improved. It was made to be inhabited. It was as completely adapted to this end as it ever will be. It had in it all the elements of fertility, and all the minerals needful to man, and all the capacity to render prosperous the condition of man that it ever will have. When the curse shall be removed, it will have no better nature than before the curse came.

The nature of man will be no better after he is restored to God's favor, than before he went astray. For, as the earthy such will the earthy always be. The principles contained in the law, can never be made better than they were when given to Adam. God will never be better qualified, to prepare or administer a government than he was when he prepared this kingdom. The nature of these elements cannot be improved, without impeaching the wisdom of him who made them.

6. Why this arrangement can never be changed, or improved. And God saw everything that he made, and pronounced it very good. He seemed to be very well satisfied with what he had done. And on another occasion he said, I will not alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. My counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure. That which in God's estimation is very good, does not need to be changed. The reason why it was then very good will always be a sufficient reason why it should remain unchanged. The reason why the earth was made as it was made, and for the object for which it was made, is the reason why it will remain the same earth and for the same object for ever.

The reason why man was made an earthy man, as he was made, and for the objects for which he was made, will cause him to remain the same earthy man, and for the same objects for ever. The reason why the law was adapted to an earthy man then is the reason why it will remain adapted to the same earthy race forever.

The reason why God the heavenly Father governed an earthy man, then, is the reason why he will continue to govern earthy men for ever. Finally the arrangement made then cannot be changed, because God is immutable.

But alas! man sinned, and introduced rebellion into the kingdom; the curse came and all our woe. The kingdom now needs the gospel, which I will explain in my next.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., July, 1869.

"THAT'S MY FATHER'S HAND."

So said a little child, only three years of age, as her father, in assumed displeasure, raised his hand as if to strike her. Had his anger been real, instead of pretended, it must have been conquered by that little sentence so lovingly, trustfully uttered. Thus, thought I, the child of God should trust Him. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast Thou ordained strength." So it is written. And here is this little one, teaching us the most precious of lessons. Her tiny finger was pointing to the threatening hand of her father; her eyes were looking up confidingly into his face; and though his brow was dark and forbidding, though she was pointing to the very hand which, at other times, had inflicted chastetisement upon her, yet such faith had she in her father's love, that she feared no harm.

O tried, afflicted child of God, does not this little incident bear to your soul some whisperings of consolation and strength?

What though adversity seems to be in your path. Is there not one—your Father who controls it? "The Lord shall preserve thee from all evil"—not that you shall never suffer, for "in the world ye shall have tribulation"—but still, "He shall preserve thy soul."

Can you believe that your Heavenly Father loves you less than this imperfect mortal loved his child? This child does not always understand her father; yet she trusts him implicity. And is not God as worthy of your confidence? True, His ways are sometimes mysterious—far above your comprehension. Often His hand has not only threatened, but struck you with seemingly pitiless blows: and even now it may be raised as if to renew the pain of former chastisements. But whose hand is it? Not an enemy's. Not a stranger's. "God is love; God is your Father, and it is His hand, therefore fear not, it will do you no harm. The strength of omnipotence is there, and it is able to crush you down to hopeless ruin; yet it will not do this, because its every motion, its tremendous power is under the constraint of infinite love. As God lives, this is true; and as God lives and loves, His hand will never touch you save to raise you up nearer to the house of rest.

Have you never seen an earthly parent correcting his child, while the tears streaming down his manly face told you that each blow, as it fell, carried more pain to his heart than to his child? "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear Him." Then if the providence is gloomy and frowning, do not look only upon this, but upon your Father's face; look into His eyes, and by just one glance of faith you will see depths of love—love for you, poor, tired child—which the endless, joyous strivings of eternity cannot fathom. You do not see this love, when you gaze only at the hand which threatens, or at the trial already upon you. You may point to the hand, as did this little child; or you may fully recognize the presence of your affliction. But while doing this let your faith be searching the Father's eye, feeling the movings of his heart—and there, both in eye and heart you will find only love, and in finding this you will receive peace.

Had it been a stranger's hand, the child would have felt fear and terror. But with her father she had been in constant intimacy every day of her life; and thus she had learned to love and trust Him. "That's my Papa's hand." God is not a Father, but a stranger to many, and they can see, feel nothing but tribulation and anguish in His afflictive providences.

But let the poor sinner learn to know God as a Father; let him draw near by the blood of Jesus—not only draw near, but dwell there in continued, daily communion with this Father; and thus will He love Him, trust Him, and often by his faith disarm the providence of its frown, and the chastening hand of its power.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace;
Behind a frowning providence,
He hides a smiling face.—Selected.

THE SOUL.

A BELIEVER in that much-talked-of, but undefinable thing, the "immortal soul," gets off the following:

"The atheist laughs at the immortality of the soul—the soul that can build her nest among the stars of heaven, walk through yonder mansions, and taste of the rivers that make glad the city of God, the soul, that can wing her way above the clouds and survey the crowns and sceptres laid up for those who dare despise the world, and have their conversation in heaven; the soul that can live in Paradise, while the body is in anguish, and when the fierce winds of worldly tribulation rage around her, can rejoice in Him who is her all in all."

And is it any wonder that the atheist laughs, when men professing to be sane, yea men claiming to be teachers, call upon them to believe in such trash as the foregoing? The wonder is, that the world has been blinded so long. The mystery is that men have not all been driven to atheism long ago. What is it but such senseless talk as this that has flooded the world with infidelity?

Talk of rivers and cities among the stars; who knows of any? And who will make sacrifices here to obtain crowns and sceptres beyond the clouds? This idea of an ethereal, intangible winged ghost floating about from planet to planet, gazing on crowns and sceptres to be inherited by other souls yet to come, is an exploded theory. It is a Pagan fiction for which there is no foundation in the Scriptures of Truth. Oh, that men would accept the glorious truth of immortality only through Christ.—EDITOR, of the Herald of the Coming Kingdom, Chicago.

A KIND CHRISTIAN WORD.

IN one of the excursions which Dr. Judson made while in Burmah, he stopped in a village on the river Selwyn.

As he stepped on shore, he noticed a fine-looking woman standing near the place of landing. He approached her, offering his hand and inquiring for her health.

"Well, my lord," she replied.

He had time for but a few words more, when he was called back to the boat, and left her with his blessing. The woman gazed after him in mute amazement. Never before had she received such courtesy from any man. Though a princess, such was the degradation of women in her country, she had been treated as a slave.

Soon her brothers came, and she said to them, "I have seen one of the Sons of God."

"Did he speak?"

"Yes, and he gave me his hand."

"Did you take the hand of a foreigner?"

"Yes, for he looked like an angel."

The brothers took her home to her husband, who was the chief of that province. He was very angry with her and beat her. That night she was called to a heathen ceremony, but she said, "No, no. Ever since I was a child, I have served Satan and Gaudama, and they have never prevented my husband from beating me. This man spoke to me kindly, and gave me his hand. His God must be the God. Hereafter I worship Him."

True to her purpose, she began that very night to pray to the unknown God of the white foreigner. Her prayer was this:

"Mighty Judge, Father God, Lord God, Uncle or Honorable God, the Righteous One! In the heavens, in the earth; in the mountains, in the seas; in the north, in the south, in the east, in the west; pity me, I pray. Show me thy glory, that I may know Thee who Thou art."

This prayer she offered for five years, never again making offerings to idols or demons. At length a missionary came to that benighted village. "She ran to him," the narrative says, "and sat at his feet for nine days." What days those were to her. She had been groping in darkness, and now light beamed upon her. She was hungering and thirsting, and now bread from heaven and the water of life were offered to her. She had labored and was heavy laden, and now she could come to Christ and find rest. She did come, and oh! how gladly. The Saviour revealed to her was just the Saviour she needed. He was infinite in compassion, and had power to save to the uttermost. She cast herself at the foot of the cross, and found peace in believing. Henceforth she was not her own. She lived for the precious Saviour who had died for her.

When, soon after, a female missionary came to labor for that people, she took her to her own home, and aided her in every possible way. Very soon there was a reformation in that village. The men, from being bacchanalians, became a God-fearing people.

Guapung—for that was the name of this remarkable woman—was the means, with the help of the female missionary, of the establishment of a Christian Church in Dong Yahn, from which two other churches soon proceeded. This church was the first to build its own chapel and support its own pastor. Guapung established the first district school in the province, and supported it. She labored much with mothers to teach them humane ways of training their children, and all she came in contact with she sought to win to Christ. She had great power with every one; for she herself lived on the word of God, and seemed to catch the tones of the "better land."

Trace back this useful Christian life, and you will find its beginning in a kind Christian word.—Selected.

WORTH KNOWING.

A POISON of any conceivable description and degree of potency, which has been taken into the stomach, may be rendered almost instantaneously harmless by swallowing two gills of sweet oil. An individual with a very strong constitution shoud take twice the quantity. This oil will neutralize every form of vegetable or mineral poison with which physicians and chemists are acquainted.

"GENTLEMEN," in the true sense, are of the Almighty's making, and his alone. The pure ore is very scarce. The run of gentlemen of all ranks are merely plated or washed; give them a rub, put them into a novel situation, into a passion, or any other trying circumstance, and the copper beneath quickly shows itself.

HAPPINESS.—Happiness is evident to us in this life by deliverance from evil. Happy is he who sees the day! said a blind man; but a man who sees clearly does not say so. Happy is he who is healthy! said an invalid; when he is well he does not feel the happiness of health.

THE HERALD OF LIFE

NEW YORK, AUGUST 4, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

IMMORTALITY—THE CONFLICT.

IT happened, without our seeking it, that we came in contact with our excellent brother Dr. Haven, then Chancellor of the Michigan State University, at Ann Arbor, and now President of the North western University, at Evanston, Ill. This took place by our criticising an anonymous article in "Zion's Herald" on "Soul Existence." We indulged in some hyperbolical language in reference to "brain," which we might not have used but from the fact of the anonymous character of the article. This was May 19. After our paper of that date had been sent out, "Zion's Herald" announced Dr. E. O. Haven as the author of the article. We made what apology we judged proper in our next issue. The latter part of June, "The Advance" contained the following remark:

> An article by Pres. Haven, on "Annihilationism," having strayed off anonymously, was criticised by the editor of the Herald of Life, who averred that the "author had no brain," "shows entire ignorance, etc." Fancy his feelings as the President courteously reviews him!

To this we replied, that "our good Br. of 'The Advance' has hardly treated us 'courteously,' if Pres. Haven has; whose 'review,' if it exists, we have not seen. 'Courtesy' requires exact truthfulness. We do not say that 'The Advance' intended to misrepresent us, and yet it has done it," etc.

This reply is found in our issue of June 30. A few days since a friend in Michigan sent us the "North-western Christian Advocate," of June 15, containing Dr. Haven's "review," referred to by "the Advance." If the review is as conclusive in proof of the immortality of the soul as our friends on that side of the question could desire, why is it that none of our exchanges have availed themselves of it? Neither "The Advance" nor "Zion's Herald" has done so, that we have seen; though the latter paper has twice failed to reach us the past few weeks. Our friend in Michigan, who sent us the "North-western Christian Advocate, containing Dr. Haven's "review," writes us:

"The paper was sent me by some person unknown, thinking perhaps to shake my faith in the Life views; but it has utterly failed of its object, if so; for I believe I am too strong to be shaken by such arguments after having studied the BIBLE, HERALD OF LIFE, and Judge Halsted's "THEOLOGY OF THE BIBLE," as much as I have. I thought you had not seen the article referred to, so I send it."

Our friend has our thanks; and we intend to do the "courteous" thing of sending Dr. Haven's review to all our subscribers. It will give them a chance to see how strong the mighty and learned men are, who advocate inherent immortality, and will help to settle them on one side or the other of this question. We shall give the Dr.'s article entire, accompanying it with remarks in brackets instead of notes, as we have done before. This will enable the reader to go through with the entire review before reading any of our response, if he chooses; and we advise to do this that you may have the full force of all our Reviewer has said on your mind to begin with: then go back and read the separate sections with our remarks following. Do all this carefully, that whatever decision you come to may be the result of genuine conviction, and not of a blind prejudice. We have divided the review into sections and numbered them for the convenience of reference; and have also numbered our responses, correspondingly, for the same reason. We do not intend to say all that might be said in reply to Dr. Haven; but we shall try to be as plain and courteous as the nature of the case will allow. The Dr. proceeds as follows;

ANIMALISM—ANNIHILATIONISM.

(1). Some weeks ago I wrote a short article for the NORTH-WESTERN CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE on "annihilationism," which Rev. George Storrs copied into his Herald of Life, and answered with more than four columns. Having copied the article from Zion's Herald, in which it appeared anonymously, the critic indulged in some remarks for which he seems inclined to apologize now that the author is known; such as "the author has no brain," "shows entire ignorance," "doubtless supposes paradise to be the same place as heaven." Such remarks detract from the value of much political and theological discussion.

[1. It seems the "The Advance" quoted from Dr. Haven instead of from our article, which had modifying words and did not represent unqualifiedly that the author "shows entire ignorance," or had "no brain." But why should any man feel aggrieved or treated discourteously, who believes brain is not essential to thinking, if his opponent does say, he "seems to have no brain?" Dr. Haven had said, in his article on "Soul Existence," that our views "deny that there can be thought without a brain." He called our views "a fearfully dangerous doctrine." Is not this equivalent to saying, brain is not essential to thought? If not essential, how can it be considered reproachful or discourteous to say that such "seem to have no brain?" It surely can be no insinuation of incapacity to think; because they tell us, brain is not essential to thought. They ought to consider themselves honored by the insinuation that they "seem to have no brain;" for thinkers without a brain are considered, in their view of the subject, a higher class of beings than ordinary mortals. It seems they suppose a being without brain can think more profoundly than one with it. Please then give us credit for placing you in that higher order of beings who do their thinking without a brain. We who do our thinking with one, ought to have your pity, and not be accused of discourtesy for placing you in so exalted a position.]

(2). But, without attempting to answer these observations, let us briefly examine the subject, noting a few of the positions of the defenders of animalism, which, for the sake of conciseness, we shall fairly express, partly in our own words, though placed within marks of quotation.

[2. The expression "defenders of animalism" is liable to be misunderstood. The careless reader might conclude that we deny a spiritual nature; which is not the case. We do deny that a spiritual nature is inherent in man. He is first, wholly animal; then intellectual; next moral; and the moral development determines whether grace will superadd spiritual, or justice put him back in the dust from whence he came. A spiritual nature is not by natural birth; but implanted in him who yields himself to the moulding of the Holy Spirit: it is a second begetting, to be followed by a second birth. "That is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural" (psuchikon, animal) saith Paul, 1 Corth. xv., 45.]

(3). 1. "The Bible does not assert that man has an immortal soul."

Granted. So the Bible does not assert that man has a brain, important as materialists suppose that organ to be. The Bible does not assert that man has ahead, or hands, or ears. It does not assert that he has a conscience, or an imagination. It speaks of some of these things, and perhaps quietly assumes the existence of them all. So, too, it speaks of the human spirit or soul, and in such a way as none would speak of it who did not regard it as an entity which does not depend upon the body for its existence. Now if we are sure that men generally did believe, then as now, in the spirituality and immortality of man, the Bible writers were bound fairly and directly to deny it and repudiate it, as they did idolatry, and not quietly assume it to be true. The fact appears to be that the Bible assumes the existence of God, the spirituality and responsibility of man, and many other truths which are written on the common mind and generally accepted.

[3. Does our esteemed friend intend us to believe that it is as self evident a truth that "man has an immortal soul" as it is that he has "a brain, a head, hands, or ears?" Is it the only reason for believing that we have those members and organs that the Bible "speaks of some of these things, and perhaps quietly assumes them all?" If we had no tangible evidence of their existence, he must be a monomaniac who claimed their possession. Are we to use such an illustration in proof of an inherent immortal soul? Are we to take a self-evident truth, which no sane man can deny, to prove an assumption which has no such demonstration?

What if the Bible does "speak of the human spirit or soul;" it is a self-evident truth that it never once in all its sacred pages speaks of it as "immortal." Even if the Bible did speak of it as "not depending upon the body for its existence," that would not prove it immortal, the very point you are bound to prove, and must prove without one text affirming it; a herculean task, truly. We deny "that men generally did believe in the immortality of man" in the time of "the Bible writers of the Old Testament." The Israelites did not believe it; and Archbishop Whately, in his work on the "Future States," has abundantly shown that the heathen philosophers did not believe it, after all their speculations about it, though some of them thought it policy to teach it to the vulgar, to keep them in awe, while these philosophers, among themselves, ridiculed the idea that any man seriously believed it. Hence the Bible writers had no occasion to "deny and repudiate it, as they did idolatry." Idolatry was an open and palpable thing, practised by all the nations except Israel, and sometimes by them. The inherent immortality of the soul was not believed in Israel, in those days, nor believed by any of them till corrupted by heathen speculation while in captivity in Babylon.

It is a rather strange position to tell us "the Bible assumes the existence of God." The Bible asserts His existence in almost every form of expression conceivable; so that if you remove those declarations from it, you would destroy it altogether: whereas, if you take out of that Book every expression relating to an "immortal soul," you would just leave the Bible as it is, not altering a word or removing even a comma. This plea that "the Bible assumes" great and important doctrines which are not self-evident truths, is that which has ever, as now, corrupted the word of God. It was such a course which brought on the great apostacy and developed the mystery of inquity, papacy. Romanism can prove the infallibility of the Pope in the same way, more clearly than any Protestant can prove the inherent immortality of an entity in man called the soul. We shall see if you have any thing stronger than assumptions as you advance.]

(4.) It is indeed remarkable that the older parts of the Bible have so few and faint references to any future life. Bishop Warburton even affirmed that the Israelites had no notion of a life beyond the present. Infidels are never weary of repeating this unjustifiable statement. There is no reason to doubt that Moses, skilled in the learning of the Egyptians, believed in immortality. The ancients, like the moderns who have not the Bible, and also the Israelites, expected for all a life after the present, but their views of what it was to be were vague. Christ "brought life and immortality to light," not by revealing their existence, but by explaining more fully their real character. The human spirit is recognized throughout the Bible as an independent entity. It "goes," "departs," and there is a place of departed spirits. The New Testament abounds in this doctrine. Christ "gave up the ghost." A rich man is represented in a parable as addressing his soul. Stephen prayed, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit"—not meaning, "Lord, receive this last pint of impure air that I exhale from my lungs," but "my spirit," my soul, driven for a time from the body. The body is spoken of frequently much as the moderns speak of it, as a robe for the soul. "This vile body" is not the me, but something which clogs the soul.

[4. Here are most "remarkable" statements. A "Bishop affirmed the Israelites had no notion of a life beyond the present;" and a Doctor of Divinity (our esteemed Br. Haven) tells us, "There is no reason to doubt that Moses believed in immortality;" of the soul entity, of course. The "statement" of Bishop Warburton, says Dr. Haven, was "unjustifiable." This Bishop, if he could now speak, might say the "statement" of Dr. Haven, of Moses' belief, is "unjustifiable." Then which should we credit? for, neither of them give any Bible proof of their assumptions, or "statements."

That "the Israelites expected for all a life after the present," is an "unjustifiable statement," plainly contradicted by the testimony of David, Solomon and Isaiah, to say nothing of other prophets. David saith of some, "They are like the beasts that perish . . . he shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light." Psa. xlix. Solomon saith, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Prov. xxi., 16. Isaiah saith of some, "They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise." Isa. xxvi., 14. We offer these three inspired witnesses against the one uninspired one in Illinois. Our readers can judge where the truth lies. That the "views" of believing Israelites "were vague" about a future life is not so clear as our Br. Haven may think. Paul was not of his opinion, as all may see by reading Heb. xi., where he speaks of the worthies of Old Testament times, and declares they looked for a resurrection, and "accounted that God was able to raise up from the dead;" and they expected "a better resurrection" than such as had been effected by some of the prophets: and they "all died in faith, not having received the promises, but having seen them afar off, and were persuaded of them;" not from having immortal souls, but that they should receive their fulfilment by a "resurrection from the dead." Please read the whole chapter.

Truly, "Christ 'brought life and immortality to light,' not by revealing their existence," for as yet, in man's case, they had no "existence;" they were a matter of promises, and those promises were to be fulfilled in the future; and Christ's resurrection from the dead was the pledge of the resurrection of all that are in Him. He was the first-fruits of the harvest to come; and demonstrated that "life and immortality" were to be brought unto His people at His return from heaven. Then, and not till then, His people were to be born from the dead; "raised incorruptible . . . . immortal:" 1 Corth. xv. This grand truth was made more fully to stand out by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead; and was "brought to light" for the first time to the Gentile world; it was glad tidings no longer to be confined to one nation, but to be proclaimed in all the world, to all nations.

The proof that "the human spirit is an independent entity," our brother has staked on such expressions as it "goes," "departs," etc. and "quietly assumes" that spirit, soul, and ghost all mean the same thing; which position is contradicted by inspired testimony. The original words are not only different, but are clearly distinguished from each other: thus, "The word of God is quick and powerful . . . piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit;" showing they are distinct and can be separated from each other. Why then confound them, and apply the terms indiscriminately to something which is said to be an "independent entity?" Is such a course not putting "darkness for light?" Besides, the nephesh of the Hebrew (the term generally translated soul in the Old Testament) has forty English representatives in our translation. Can any man believe that a term which has so wide a latitude of meaning would have been the choice of Infinite wisdom, had that wisdom intended to convey the idea of our worthy Br. Haven? And ruach, the Hebrew term translated spirit, in the Old Testament, is also translated mind, wind, breath, etc. Is that the word to teach of "an independent entity?"

As to the term "ghost:" the Hebrew word is generally yova, signifying "wasted away." But in Job xi., 20, and in Jer. xv., 9, where the word ghost occurs, the original is nophakh-nephesh; which, says Prof. Pick, a learned Hebrew, signifies, "Breathed out the breath:" that is, ceased to breathe. So when "Jesus had cried with a loud voice, he yielded up the ghost;" (Greek, pneuma); that is, He "breathed out his breath," or ceased to breathe: He was dead. Whether He or the martyr Stephen had a "last pint of impure air" in their "lungs" to dispose of, our Rev. Br. doubtless is a better judge than we.

The "body is not the me, but something which clogs the soul," saith our respected friend. Well, will he tell us what was the me in this text, "Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father?" John xx., 17. Was Jesus fearful that Mary would touch His soul? Again, at the tomb, when Mary was asked by the angels, "Woman, why weepest thou? She answered, Because they have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him." Was Mary ignorant of theology, and did not know the "me" never had been there, but only the "body, which clogs the soul?" And did Jesus add to her ignorance by soon after saying to her, "touch me not;" indicating that the body was the veritable "me," so much reviled in modern theology, but so much honored by Jesus that it is raised from the dead within "three days" after He had breathed out his breath? Was it the veritable Jesus that rose from the dead, or only His body, that not being "the me?" If his body was not "the me," then "the me" never died, and "the me" never rose from the dead; and there is some mistake in the recorded language of Jesus, Rev. i., 18, when He said to John, "I am He that liveth, and was dead." This looks as if "the me" was dead once; but if the me is not the body, and the me (being an "independent entity") did not die, then John must have made a sad mistake in his record. However, we think John understood the matter and made a true record of the fact; and with this agree the words of Paul, 1 Corth. xv. where he says, "I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins . . . and that He was buried, and that He rose again the third day . . . and that He was seen of above five hundred brethren at once . . . and last of all He was seen of me also," etc.

Surely such testimony is not to be set aside, or reduced to a mere figure of speech, because men have assumed that the personality is not in the body, though the body was all that died, according to their theory. Do they not in fact deny that the Christ ever died or was buried? and affirm that Jesus' language to John, on Patmos, expressed more than was really true? We forbear to press this point; for it is painful to see to what a fearful precipice the advocates of inherent immortality rush and are driving their followers.]

(5.) There are passages that do not express this doctrine. Taken alone this would deny it. But the lower must never be allowed to displace the higher. "In that very day their thoughts perish." "In the grave—where there is no device." "The night cometh in which no man can work." All such expressions, used now as then by believers in immortality, strongly express the Bible doctrine that this life's work must be done here or never. A man does not express his highest faith in every utterance. If I say a man loses his property and "is ruined," it does not follow that I mean he is annihilated, or that there is not a ruin far more terrible than the loss of money or even character. The doctrine of the Bible must be sought in its general temper, in its positive statements, in what, commonly accepted, it did not deny; and whatever colloquial expressions seemingly conflict with these must be understood as subordinate, as they are in all other writings and utterances.

[5. The point here is assumed, that the inspired men, who used the expressions partially quoted by Dr. Haven, were "believers in immortality" as inherent in man. The assumption is without one Bible testimony in its favor; hence the argument built upon it is valueless. What evidence is found in the Old Testament is plain against the assumption.]

(6.) 2. "All created beings are organized, and hence must have some organ of thought. That organ in man is the brain. When the brain is dissolved, man is annihilated, and exists, if at all, only as he existed before he was created, or as future creations exist—in the mind of God."

A mere dogmatic assertion. Has God said that all created beings are organized? Has God said that all thinkers must have a material organ of thought? Is avoirdupois weight necessary to thought? Cannot the Great Spirit create a finite spirit? Is the existence of spirit incredible? "God is a Spirit." "Let us make man in our image." A material thing the image of the Spirit? The supposition is unthinkable and impossible. Either man is a spirit or God is matter.

[6. Our views of man's state in death are not quite accurately stated by Dr. Haven in this section; but we let it pass to notice his comments. God did not need to say "that all created beings are organized," any more than He need to say He himself is self existent. The very idea of creation is that of organization: without it there is no such thing as creation. What is creation but the production of something which did not exist in that specific form previously? What is this but organizing the thing created? Is this "a mere dogmatic assertion?" We never said "all thinkers must have a material organ of thought." We said "all created beings are organized, and hence must have some organ of thought: that organ in man is a brain: God has ordained it so: how other beings beside man exercise thought we are not called upon to determine." Such was our language. Is this saying "that all thinkers must have a material organ of thought?" Let the candid reader judge between our friend Haven and us in this matter.

As to the creation of "a finite spirit," our Br. did not need ask the question; for we have never questioned or doubted it. But will he say that a created spirit has no organ of thought? He might as well say such spirits are uncreated: and to this result his theory comes at last, that all spirits are but parts of the uncreated God, and always did think and always will think, because they are parts of God; and thus he swings at once into the very depths of heathen philosophy. Of those philosophers Archbishop Whately says, "They imagined that the souls of men were not created by God, but were themselves parts of the Divine mind, from which they separated, when united with bodies; and to which they would return and be reunited, on quitting those bodies; so that the soul, according to this notion, was immortal both ways; that is, not only was to have no end, but had no beginning; and was to return after death into the same condition in which it was before our birth, a state without any distinct personal existence or consciousness."—Future States: see pages 16–26.

Saith our esteemed friend Haven, "'God is a Spirit.' 'Let us make man in our image.' A material thing in the image of a Spirit? The supposition is unthinkable and impossible. Either man is a spirit or God is matter." This language is very imposing; but let us calmly look at it. In the first place it admits that man was made—"Let us make man." If man was made, he was made out of something or "nothing." The only Bible account of his creation is, that "The LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground:" Gen. ii., 7. We have the presumption to believe that is true; and for believing it, we are "set at naught" by many, and ridiculed.

Nevertheless, while we keep to the record we have confidence that God will not condemn us, if men do. Let us look a little further at our Br. Haven's logic. "God is self-existent, omnipotent, omnipresent," as well as Spirit; so orthodoxy saith. "Let us make man in our image." Shall we say, "Either man is" self-existent, omnipotent and omnipresent, or God is not? Why not take all God's attributes into the account of the image? And then why not say, as man was positively "formed of the dust of the ground," God must be "matter," because man was made in His image and was formed of matter? Is one of these positions more "unthinkable and impossible" than the other? We think not. Neither is tenable.

Man was formed in the image of God, in some sense; but that he was so in his nature or essence has often been asserted but never proved. In what that image consisted, has been a matter assumed, but not settled. That it was in the spiritual character of his nature, the apostle Paul positively denies. In speaking of the first and second Adams, he says, "Howbeit, that was not first which was spiritual, but that which was natural"—(psuchikon, literally, animal); "and afterward that which is spiritual." 1 Corth. xv., 46. A spiritual nature comes only by the second Adam, and is of grace in regeneration, and not inherent in man by creation or natural generation. It is obtained by promise, if ever possessed at all. On this point we are told, there "are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises; that by these ye might be partakers of the Divine nature." 2 Pet. i., 4.

As to what the image of God was, in which man was created, our opinion is, it was in his capacity for knowledge and to exercise dominion. Paul saith, believers "have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him." Col. iii., 10. But we will not enlarge here.]

(7). 3. "Man, before regeneration, is only flesh; he must be regenerated to be a spirit." All our children then are animals—that and nothing more. The creation of man was only making animals; the conversion of a man changes the kind of his being. Can any suppose that this doctrine can be received? Regeneration, radical as it is, creates no new faculties, destroys no old ones. The personal identity remains. A man is to be judged for his own deeds—not for his body's deeds, but his deeds, done in the body.

[7. Man "must be regenerated to" have a spiritual element in his nature, is the true statement of our views. "Ye must be born again." Why? Because, "That which is born of the flesh is flesh." Did Jesus "know what was in man?" He uses the language we have quoted; and humiliating as it may seem, He teaches, "our children are animals—and nothing more," unless "begotten again of the Spirit;" for that and nothing less will ever make them spiritual beings. "That which is born (begotten) of the Spirit is spirit;" while "that born of the flesh is flesh:" therefore, "Marvel not that I said unto thee, Ye must be born again." Jesus' words to Nicodemus, John iii., 3–8. Such testimony outweighs all the speculations and assumptions of theologians, high or low. The conversion of man, or his being begotten again, does not "change the kind of his being" now; but it adds a spiritual element to his being, which, when matured, entitles him to the promise of God, of immortality, incorruptibility, eternal life. See Rom. ii., 7; John vi., 39, 40, 53, 54; and 1 Corth. xv., throughout.

"A man is" truly "to be judged for his own deeds;" but the insinuation that his body is no part of the man, makes the infliction of any punishment on the body an act of palpable injustice. Is the poor body to be tortured, and die, for the acts of its supposed indwelling lord, while itself had no volition or power of resistance? Is that the theology of our learned D.D.'s? If so, "our divinity" can no longer boast of "not being sick."]

(8). 4. "Belief in the immortality of man rests upon the assertion of the serpent—'Thou shalt not surely die.'"

To endeavor to refute this would imply that those who state it believe it—which is to place too low an estimation on their intelligence.

[8. The first assumption of man's deathlessness, on record, is that of the serpent. Not one positive testimony of God has been found in the Bible that man, in whole or in part, is immortal; but God's testimony is explicit and positive that, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Ezek. xviii., 2, 20. "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi., 23, and a multitude of like testimonies; all of which are virtually contradicted by the theory of inherent immortality; and therefore partake of the nature of the serpent's declaration, "Ye shall not surely die." We "believe" this is the germ of the whole theory of natural immortality; that the doctrine, with all its deadly consequences, has grown out of the principle involved in the serpent's affirmation. It has come now to take the form, "Ye are Gods"—"If God is a Spirit so are ye." The serpent only said, "Ye shall not surely die;" and, "Ye shall be as Gods:" but it has come now to be affirmed, "It is the Divine parentage which makes man what he is, a spirit, which, though fallen, has an eternal destiny; a being who can indeed become either like a devil or equal to the angels, but who is eternal, because he is a son of God." So speaks an English advocate of inherent immortality, in an article, in "The Rainbow," written against the idea of "annihilation."

Our learned friend, Dr. Haven, may be fearful of "placing too low an estimate on" our "intelligence," by supposing we "believe" the origin, the germ, the principle out of which the doctrine of man's inherent immortality originated is found in the serpent's denial of the truth of what God had said; but, nevertheless, we assure him we have searched diligently for more than thirty years past, and are unable to discover any other root from which it ever found its way into the world. We are sorry to be thought by our much respected Br. Haven, to be so exceedingly lacking in "intelligence;" but we are comforted with the thought that Jesus hath said, "That which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God." Luke xvi., 15.]

(9). We believe in the immortality of man for many reasons, one of which is that to us the spirituality of God and of man stand or fall together. God intends that we shall reason upward from ourselves. We recognize his design because we design. We recognize his justice and mercy because we feel justice and mercy. We recognize spirit because we are spirits. We recognize matter because our spirits are mysteriously connected with bodies. We find that our bodies are not ourselves, and therefore we believe the material universe is not God.

[9. It will be observed that among the reasons assigned for "believing in the immortality of man," our learned brother fails to introduce a "Thus saith the LORD." We excuse the omission; because we cannot expect the most mighty intellect to do impossibilities. His belief seems to be founded on the "wisdom of men;" and our thoughts are turned to Paul's saying, "The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God." 1 Corth. iii., 19. And again, "The Lord knoweth the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain." Verse 20. One testimony from God to "the immortality of man," if it could only be found, would exalt the defenders of the doctrine to an eminence which would command the reverence of all Bible lovers; but the speculations resorted to, to establish it, by its advocates, only show the doctrine to have no foundation in the Bible.]

(10). And this leads me to present the greatest danger of Animalism. It directly drags logical thinkers—who are not held back by a religion cultivated under a better faith—into materialism or pantheism. Materialism and pantheism, seemingly opposite, are one. This is no mere whim or theory. I have seen it verified in several instances. I have known men once, in appearance, fervent Christians, now deniers of God, ridiculers of the Bible, scoffers at all piety, who began their downward course by adopting the notion that man has not an immortal soul. This is a notion logically fatal to religion.

[10. As our respected friend has dealt, here, in mere assertions, we shall meet him with the like weapons. "The greatest danger of" the doctrine of man's inherent spirit nature, which is eternal and indestructible, is, "It directly drags logical thinkers—who are not held back by" the grace of God—"into" Spiritism, a practical denial of God's omnipotence, and ends in "pantheism." "This is no mere whim or theory." Only a few weeks since an article appeared in "Zion's Herald," in which the writer said, "If God could annihilate the sinner He must exercise His power rather than permit His dearly Beloved Son to expire upon the shameful cross." We ask, if such a statement is not a clear denial of God's omnipotence? If God has not power to put man out of a living existence, then man lives independent of God and in spite of Him; man has a life of which no being can deprive him; and hence has unlimited power in himself; and the inevitable conclusion of "logical thinkers" is, that the Bible God has no existence, and that atheism or pantheism is the truth: for if there is no God that can annihilate man, then there is no other God than man himself; or, that nature or the universe, in its totality, is God. That is pantheism: to this result the doctrine of man's inherent spirit nature legitimately leads. We "have seen it verified in several instances;" and in all instances the persons adhered to the doctrine of inherent immortality, or returned to it, if they had ever left it. That men of any faith, whether of inherent immortality, or immortality as the gift of God through Christ by a resurrection from the dead, may apostatize and become bad men, "scoffers at all piety," Br. Haven will not deny, and we grant; but that of itself proves no theory false.]

(11). If finite minds cannot exist without a brain, if the only hope of immortality is that God shall recreate the brains of former generations, if immortality means only the immortality of brains, then, however strong the faith of a few may be, these believers are doomed to see the majority of their own children infidels. Nothing can save thinking men from the dead slough of unbelief and wickedness. No; there is an unwritten revelation and a written revelation; a natural religion and a supernatural religion; each supplements and sustains the other. The being of God, a spirit, and the being of man, a spirit, are truths perceived by an aroused mind, assumed in the Bible, illustrated and confirmed. Responsibility and retribution, and the doctrines of redemption, conversion and a final judgment, follow—both revealed and reasonable.

[11. Here are plenty of assumptions and assertions, the truth of which depends on the inspiration and infallibility of their author. We will sum up the whole thus: "There is no need of a resurrection of the dead; there will be none; and your children will be infidels if they believe there is." We appeal to all candid men, if such is not the real import of our Brother's language? We cannot help thinking of what our Saviour said to the Sadducees, "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God." If man ever has a resurrection from the dead, the same man will as surely be raised again as that the same Jesus was raised again; for He was "the first fruits." Does our worthy Br. Haven think Christ was raised from the dead without a brain? He is the sample of the resurrection of all "who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead." No wonder our intelligent friend never once names the resurrection of the dead in all his article. Why should he? The very idea of a literal resurrection of the dead, as taught by Christ and his Apostles, would uproot and overturn the whole theological theory of man's present immortality and inherent spirit nature. No man can live in these days of thought, and be a "logical thinker," but that he must abandon the doctrine of a literal resurrection of the dead, if he believes in the inherent spirit nature and immortality of man. He may not dare openly to deny the re-living of the dead in Christ; but he can "quietly assume" it; as he says the Scriptures do the immortality of man, though never giving utterance to the thought.]

(15). As it regards future rewards and punishments, we should remember that no being in one stage of progress can fully comprehend another stage; also that man in his immortality takes hold of infinity, and therefore cannot comprehend himself. Reward is infinitely to be desired. Retribution is infinitely to be shunned. No theodicy, in our present stage, is possible to man. Every attempt to fathom infinity begets some such miserable result as restorationism or annihilationism, which reminds us of an effort to crowd the boundless universe of matter into a half-bushel. Better allow that there are some things in the infinite which a finite mind can perceive but not comprehend.

[15. All this is exceeding cool after so many positive assertions about man's spirit nature, immortality, etc. Our Br. need not be reminded, nor remind us, that "The secret things belong unto the LORD our God; but those things which are revealed belong unto us and our children for ever." Deut. xxix., 29. The LORD has revealed that man is mortal, but has made no revelation of his immortality, except by a resurrection from the dead, "at the last day"—"at the last trump." John vi., 39, 40, 44, 53, 54; 1 Corth. xv., 51–55, and 1 Thess. iv., 13–18.

We are persuaded that no men in the theological world "attempt to fathom infinity" as do the advocates of inherent immortality; and because they find themselves involved in inextricable night, they think all other minds are, also. They set out to explore the mine of eternal truth with the dark lantern of an immortal soul and of man's spirit nature. This ignis fatuus has led them into the bogs of going off as disembodied souls at death, to heaven or to a hell of eternal torture; yet at some unknown future period, there is to be a day of judgment, when heaven and hell are to give up these ghostly companies and have a solemn decision made on them and their destiny, which in fact, with some of them, had been fixed thousands of years before. After befogging themselves and others with such notions, and trying to harmonize all this with the resurrection of the dead, they have concluded that a man can think even better without a brain than with one, and so it is not worth while to mention the resurrection, especially when attempting to defend their ideas of immortality. Despairing of any clear comprehension of the great "things" of God's word, "concerning the kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ," as the King in that kingdom, the cry of darkness comes up; and others, who take God's word as it is, designed for the "common people," are warned that their efforts are like "an effort to crowd the boundless universe of matter into a half-bushel." We might retort—it would be no difficult matter "to crowd the" whole of their ideal spirits of men into a smaller space than a "half-bushel." But we forbear. We are glad to see, at last, that our learned friend is so impressed with the immeasurableness of "matter." It is not so despicable a thing after all; and we shall not be surprised if some of our opposers should come to find that matter is a very convenient thing (when moulded by the hand of an omnipotent and infinitely wise Being) for an organ of thought; and possibly they may conclude it is the only medium for any soul of man to evolve thought here or hereafter; at least, so far as made known.

Our worthy friend's concluding remark, viz., "Better allow that there are some things in the infinite which a finite mind can perceive but not comprehend," is wise and judicious; and we heartily agree with him in this advice, and wish that all assumers of things unrevealed would follow it. But we are not to carry this advice so far as to accept for truth the fancies of men without one "Thus saith the Lord" to sustain them. God has given us His "word to be a light to our feet and a lamp to our paths: let us take heed thereto, remembering it was "the common people" who "heard" the incarnate Word "gladly;" showing clearly that the word of God was designed for common minds; and that the idea, whether Papal or Protestant, that such people are dependent on professional theologians for an understanding of that word, is an assumption to be rejected. We should thankfully receive all the aid that learning can give in producing a pure text. When it has done that, let our minds rely on the Spirit of God to shine on our hearts to give us understanding of its own inspired testimony in regard to our nature, responsibility, and destiny; and say to all intruders on our faith or duty, as Abraham said to his servants, "Abide here with the ass, and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you." Gen. xxii., 5. Alone with God, in learning his word, is our safest position.]

IN CONCLUSION, we would say to our esteemed brother in Christ, our respect for his learning and piety is unabated, notwithstanding our firm persuasion that his theological views of man's inherent nature are unscriptural; and in their legitimate tendency (only prevented by the grace of God) lead directly to the last great apostacy—"Spiritism"—which now threatens to fill the earth with real "infidelity," and ripen the world for "the great day of wrath;" so that, instead of the dream of the world's conversion to God being accomplished by the church and her ministers, the awful scene will be manifested of a worldly, pleasure-loving, and honor-seeking church, without power to arrest the floods of error, of all sorts, coming in upon her with the rapidity of a raging tornado, and which already howl around her with a violence that might arouse any human being not wrapped in the shroud of "peace and safety," talking and singing of "the world's conversion" without her Lord's return and the resurrection from the dead of patriarchs, prophets, apostles, and all the faithful in Christ Jesus, who have gone to their "sleep in Jesus," resting "in the dust of the earth" till "The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the arch-angel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we [who are in Christ] which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them [the resurrected saints] in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words." 1 Thess. iv., 16–18. "These words" are subverted and made unmeaning by the theory of man's inherent spirit nature and immortality. May the Lord bring all sincere souls to the knowledge of the truth of Life future and eternal only in and through Jesus Christ His Son, our Lord and LIFE-GIVER.

SOUL, BODY, AND SPIRIT.

"THE soul is a separate and distinct part of man." So some would have us believe. Because, say they, "The Bible recognizes its existence as a part of man." This, they say, is evident from the expressions—"My soul,"—"his soul,"—"their souls," etc. Let us ask—Which part of man is it that speaks, when the man says, "my soul?" Is it the body? Does the body talk without a soul to talk through it? If the soul is the active agent, residing in the body as its house, then when the man speaks it must be his soul that does it: hence, it must be the soul that says, "my soul." And if the argument of our opposing brother is good for anything, it proves that the soul has got a soul. But if it still be maintained that it is the body that speaks, in this case, then what speaks when the man says, "my body?" Is it the same part of man that spoke before? If the body speaks now, it follows that the body has a body. At this rate we may prove that a man has at least two bodies and two souls: and if each of these is as fortunate in possessing another, unless you tell us exactly where to stop, we do not see but man ought to be named "Legion." For instead of being one man he must be many.

Because the Scriptures speak of a man's soul, and of his body, to infer that they are parts that are "entirely distinct," is to introduce confusion, in our judgment. We might just as well teach that man is made up of four "distinct parts," as of two; for, the Scripture command is, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." Mark xii., 30. To infer from such expressions that man is composed of several parts, appears to us preposterous in the extreme.

OUR ANNIVERSARY.

THURSDAY, September 2d, is the time for the annual meeting of the LIFE AND ADVENT UNION. The place will be in the "Life and Advent Mission Tent" in Springfield, Mass., at the hour of two o'clock in the afternoon. An informal meeting will be held at nine o'clock in the morning, in the same place, for the exchange of thoughts on various matters relating to the Union and its work.

To provide for the continuance of the HERALD OF LIFE will be the principal business of the Union. Next in importance will be the matter of issuing and circulating Tracts; that this work, which has accomplished so much, may be prosecuted with still more efficiency.

Both of the foregoing subjects call for our united and increased exertions. Let all the friends who can possibly be present not fail to do so. Those whose circumstances will not permit this, should communicate immediately with us, stating how much can be relied on from them for each of the above objects. You know the value of them to you and to the cause to which they are devoted. They are needed no less now than when first originated under the "Chestnut Tree" at Wilbraham, in 1863. A great work has been accomplished in the six years since that time. True, we have had our trials, but we have the consolation that amidst them all the Lord has sustained and prospered the work, so that the prospect of increased usefulness calls for increased efforts to push forward in promulgating the Gospel of "LIFE IN JESUS CHRIST alone."

Shall we not give thanks and take courage at our coming anniversary? Let us give all the praise of all the good accomplished to "God and the Lamb."

P. S. Let no friend of the HERALD OF LIFE fail to be present at our anniversary, if possible to be there, as the meeting will be one of the most important we have ever had. The opponents of the interests of the paper are calculating to put it and its firmest friends "on the shelf" and "out of the way." This is no guess work. All we have to do is to trust in that God who has hitherto helped us, and come up "to the help of the Lord against the" would-be "mighty," seeking "not our own, but the things of Jesus Christ," and which we sincerely believe are calculated to promote His truth. Let none think this postscript a needless call. Let such as find it impossible to be with us, write, at once, their wishes and what they can or will do to sustain the HERALD. Address L. C. THORNE, 68 White St., NEW YORK.

THE INSIDE OF THIS WEEK'S PAPER.

WE have had a few extra copies of the inside matter of to-day's paper struck off; which, if wanted, can be had at twelve cents for five copies, postage included; or two cents per copy at the office.

PREJUDICE.

"The most difficult persons we have to meet are those who are so prejudiced they will not even take the trouble to look at the reasons of our hope. They know they are right, and that we are wrong without an examination."—World's Crisis, July 14, 1869.

THE editor, in these remarks, has verily stated the truth. It is a fact that many, who have been educated in the popular theology of the day are so self conceited, or so completely fortified with prejudice, that they are not approachable with reason, let alone Scripture, on any point not in harmony with their preconceived opinions. This class are always found the most bitter opposers of truth, and are foremost, by every means in their power, in hedging up the way for its promulgation. There is a peculiarity, also, of this class of individuals, which is especially noticeable. They generally have more of the "form" than "the power of godliness." When you meet an individual truly endowed with the spirit of our Master, he will always listen to the "reasons of your hope" when given with "meekness and fear," according to the divine rule.

But while reading the above remarks in the "Crisis," I wondered if its author fully appreciated what a perfect application it could have to a large number of Adventists who strenuously oppose the doctrine of "Life only in Christ." Are there not a large number, even in his own circle of acquaintances, "who know they are right" on the subject of the re-living of the wicked, and have condemned, in the most arbitrary terms, those who differ with them? Our own experience assures us that he need not look outside of his own list of subscribers to find this spirit of exclusion and prejudice which he so much deplores in the popular school of theology. It seems but reasonable to us, that an individual should examine a doctrine thoroughly, in the light of the Scriptures, before condemning it as "infidelity." Prejudice developed in arbitrary denunciation is poor argument to convince a Bible student that he is wrong. But there is something about truth that always shines brighter when battling with the dark elements of prejudice. Then, brethren and sisters, one and all, "let your light shine."

Which can the most effectually be done by living a life of holiness.

FROM A. B. VAN DOREN.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 26, 1869.

BR. STORRS: The bundle of tracts have been received, and some twenty are on the wing. My prayer is, that they may be blessed to some poor soul, and that others may be constrained to read them with care. Now, Brother, are we not called upon to watch unto prayer? If so, what a responsibility rests upon all tract distributors. If all who sow the seed will but be consistent, what a blessing may follow the scattering of a few tracts. In many cases I could not get a promise to read, at first; but after a few moments' conversation they begin to feel interested, and in some two instances, to day, I have been asked for some half dozen for their friends. I want a few tracts of the "GOSPEL HOPE," and "ATONEMENT." May God give wisdom to direct, in all our humble efforts to spread the "Truth;" and when this is done, may we all ask our heavenly Father to grant his blessing.

Please find five dollars within, for tracts.

FROM WM. R. WARNER.

NORTH CAMBRIDGE, MASS., Aug. 2, 1869.

BR. STORRS: Our treasure is taken from us. God's will has been done. We laid little MARY in the grave last Sabbath morning. On that bright, that holy, that calm morning, the sun shone on her face for the last time, as we laid her (the third infant) in the grave. But she is safe now; for Jesus has told us, "It is not the will of our Father which is in heaven that one of these little ones should perish:" again, "of such is the kingdom of God."

This was our youngest; four months and ten days. The one, now youngest lies in a very critical condition, but we hope for the best. Yours in Christian love.

M. C. HARRIMAN, at Salisbury, N. H., writes: We in our wanderings occasionally find a poor mortal honestly seeking for light and for immortality: one who when truth is presented is willing to receive it with thanksgiving, although it may bring reproach. Such I believe to be the one whose name I send with the money as a subscriber to our paper, the HERALD OF LIFE; blessed life—life from she dead through Christ, who died that we might come forth and be no more subject unto death. As the time is short, may God grant that the honest ones may be found, and the light and liberty of the gospel be made plain to them. Yours, in hope of eternal life.

EVIL THOUGHTS.

BEWARE of evil thoughts. Oh the mischief that they have done in the world. Bad thoughts come first, bad words follow, and bad deeds bring up the rear. Strive against them. Watch against them. Pray against them. They prepare the way for the enemy.

Bad thought is a thief; he acts his part;
Creeps through the window of the heart;
And if he once his way can win,
He lets a hundred robbers in.

THE GLORIOUS MORNING.

"THE long, dark night of sin and sorrow has passed away. How bright—how dazzling—the radiant glory which lights up the heavens! Hark! far! away, and sounding nearer and nearer—peals the mighty trumpet. O, the joyful sound! It stirs old ocean's depths; it bursts earth's deepest sepulchres, and the saintly dead come forth alive.

"The dark prison-house delivers up its victims—the poor and despised, they who suffered and died a martyr's death, the young and the middle-aged, the infant and the grey-haired. But, O, how changed! No sigh heaves their bosom. No tears bedew their cheeks. No groans escape their lips. Hark! they shout, Victory! victory over death and the grave!

"The King of glory descends. The saints rise to meet him. All things are made new. The New Jerusalem appears. They enter the gates of pearl. They walk its golden streets. They see the King in his beauty, and dwell in his presence—redeemed, or immortal, happy forever!" Will you be one of them?

MEN will wrangle for religion; write for it; fight for it; die for it; anything but—live for it.—Lacon.

WE may judge of men by their conversation toward God, but never by God's dispensations toward them.—Palmer.

IT is easier to go six miles to hear a sermon, than to spend one quarter of an hour in meditating on it when I come home.—Philip Henry.

Poetry.

Love for Jesus.

A group of dear children, one warm summer day,
Were seated most cosily, chatting away,
Beneath the cool shade of the evergreen trees,
Whose branches were waving with every breeze.

They talked of their dollies, with rare, pretty names,
Their schools and their lessons, their plays and their games;
And the dear little creatures "built castles in air,"
And their dreams of the future were lovely and fair.

Strange questions were started, and answered as well;
But the strangest of all—just hear while I tell:
Said Willie, "If Jesus were here and should say,
'Just ask what you will, you shall have it straightway,'

"Pray what would you ask?" And he called name by name,
And the answers each cheerfully, readily came;
All childlike in nature—some simple, some wise,
Some looking a smile, and yet others surprise.

I said all replied. There was one modest child,
Whose voice was last heard—so sweet and so mild;
Dear Mary! her answer, unlike all the rest,
Was an outburst of love to the Friend she loved best;

She said, "I would ask him for nothing at all,
But tell him my love, as before him I'd fall;
I could think of naught else but the love that I owe—
From the first to the last nothing else could I know.

"For hath he not given his life for the lost,
And with it given all things at marvellous cost?
Love, love for my Saviour, 'tis all I can give;
Love, love is my song, and shall be while I live."

Dear child! like the friend of the Saviour of old,
Thou hast chosen that part which is better than gold;
And O, may the lesson thy words here impart
Leave its imprint on many a young, tender heart!

The Crocus.

A BED-TIME STORY FOR CHILDREN.

A wee little root! All alone in the cold damp earth. How lonely it felt, and how dark and cheerless everything was. Can you fancy it? Pressed in on every side by the earth, no light anywhere to be seen, and no companions but the ugly, ill-natured worms, of which the little root was dreadfully afraid. It had been in the earth a long time, and it could not help wondering if it was to stay there always, it was so dreary. Who could have been so cruel as to put it there? And the root began to feel very indignant with somebody, and to pity itself very much; a bad sign, for when people pity themselves, they are pretty sure to be in a bad humor. If you feel inclined to pity yourselves, and to think yourselves very ill-used, just try to think of the poor children who have no homes or friends, who are often beaten and starved, and then your pity will turn to them, which will be very much better for you. Well, this little root did not remain long in this bad temper; it soon shook it off, and began to think more sensibly.

"I must have been put here for something," it thought to itself, "else no one would have taken the trouble to place me here; and they couldn't have meant me any harm, for, though it is very uncomfortable, I am quite safe. I will not be ill-tempered any more, but believe that it is all for the best, and try to be contented and happy."

This was wise and right of the little root, but as time passed on, and yet nothing changed, it began to grow discontented again, until suddenly a bright idea came across it: "Suppose that good somebody meant me to work for myself?" Was it not a good thought? But what was the way to work? Ah! that was the puzzle; but where there's a will there's a way, and so the little root found it; and so, will little children, too, it they only try it.

The very first worm that came near her she spoke to very humbly, and asked:

"Where do you go, and what do you do when you go away from here?"

"I go up to the light, to be sure," said the old worm, rather gruffly.

Light! that was what she wanted, the little root felt it in a moment; and she asked again, timidly—

"But how do you get to the light? How do you know which way to go?"

"What senseless questions!" angrily returned the old worm. "Why, I just bore my way straight up, and always come to the light in time."

The little root did not dare to ask any more questions, but she had heard enough. Light! she felt that was what she wanted, and she would try and reach it. So, in firm confidence in the goodness of those who had placed her there, the little root began her work. Slowly very slowly, she got on; it was hard work pushing her way up in the dark; but she kept on, in spite of the dark doubts which sometimes would come.

Slowly and steadily always come out safe in the end, and so it was with this little root; for after long work, one day, she pierced the last bit of earth, and the broad light of day fell on her little head. Oh, how happy she was! All the long, hard work was forgotten now that she had reached the light.

"I was right," thought the little root.

"I was placed there for some good. Oh, how wrong I was to doubt it at all!"

Not yet, however, was her work ended, for she still grew, although now it was not work, but pleasure. Still growing, still cheerful, until at last a bright, beautiful crocus gladdened the hearts of all around. For some time she stood there, the glad harbinger of spring; and when at last she faded and drooped, she was not sad; other flowers were there to supply her place.

"Whatever happens to me now," said the little crocus, "I am happy, for I have lived, and, I hope, been of some use."

So the crocus drooped and died. This little root knew nothing of who had placed her in the earth, and even did not know in what way to work, and yet see how nobly she lived and worked. If the crocus had been a great oak, she could not have done anything more than to be what she was made to be. Suppose she had stayed in the ground and not pushed to reach the light, she would have just rotted there. We may be put in the ground, but it is not intended we shall stay there. We must just push—make our way to the light; and when we are really put in to the ground like the little crocus root, we shall not stay there, but shall bloom into flowers in another world.

Take this lesson from the story to bed with you, and so, good-night, my dear.—Selected.

Curiosities of Sounds.

To our limited understandings it sometimes seems that nature delights in curious freaks; but when we come to analyze her apparent vagaries, they resolve themselves into mere instances of the working of simple laws. Imagine the whispered secrets of a confessional being proclamed to an unwilling hearer in a distant part of a cathedral. Such a thing once occurred in the cathedral of Girgenti, in Sicily. A visitor to the edifice accidently came upon a spot where he heard every word that a fair penitent was uttering to a closeted priest, in a remote quarter of the building. Here was a seeming freak; but when the case came to be examined, it was clear that the whispers were scattered over the curved roof, which, acting like a concave reflector in the case of light, converged the sounds to a focus; and so the mystery revealed itself as an instance of the convergence of sound. The eavesdropper used to delight in taking his friends to hear the revelations of the penitents; but one day he and they heard too much, for—unfortunate coincidence!—his own wife knelt upon the penitential stool, and the betraying roof made him acquainted with secrets anything but amusing: the scandal that ensued brought about the removal of the confessional to a more secret spot. This was not a case of mere echo; the sound was actually brought to a focus at one particular spot, just as the image of a candle is projected upon a wall by a concave reflector or by a lens.

Echoes are reflections of sounds; a flat surface like a blank wall is to sound what a looking-glass is to light. A sounding-board placed over a speaker's head catches the sounds that would otherwise be dispersed in the space above him, and reflects them down upon the audience beneath. The voice is echoed, but we do not hear both the direct and reflected sound because the interval between them is too short. The reflecting surface must be at some distance to allow an appreciable time to elapse for the sound to travel to it and come back again to the ear. The travelling rate of sound in air is about one thousand one hundred feet a second, and reflected sound travels at the same speed as direct; hence by noticing the time which elapses between a sound and its echo, we may estimate how far off the echoing surface is situated.

Of remarkable echoes many are known. There is the celebrated one in the Gap of Dunloe, where the sounds are reflected again and again, so that when a trumpet is blown at the proper place the return notes reach the ear in succession after one, two, three, or more reflections from the adjacent cliffs, and thus die away in the sweetest cadences. Alpine travellers, too, tell of wonderful warblings of echoes in the Swiss mountains. The rolling and pealing of thunder is due to echoes of the primary claps, which are generated in the clouds. A curious echo occurs at the London Colosseum. Mr. Wheatstone found that a syllable pronounced close to the upper part of the wall of this structure was repeated a great many times. A single exclamation sounded like a peal of laughter, and the tearing of a sheet of paper like the patter of hail.

We have said that sound travels through the air at the rate of about one thousand one hundred feet a second; but this speed depends upon the elasticity and density of the air; and as the elasticity depends upon temperature, it follows that sound travels differently, according as the weather is warm or cold. At freezing temperature its rate is one thousand and ninety feet a second; at 80 degrees Fahrenheit, it is one thousand one hundred and forty feet. So that sound travels slower in winter than in summer. Its velocity through other substances than air is also very different. Through hydrogen gas it is four thousand one hundred and sixty feet a second, and through water a little greater than this. Iron conveys it at nearly four times this speed.

In travelling through space, sound diminishes in intensity, and, like light and other actions, it does this in proportion to the square of the distance traversed. A man two yards from a bell only hears one fourth of the sound that reaches an ear distant one yard. A man three yards off only catches one-ninth of it; another four yards distant a sixteenth, and so on. The reason of this rapid rate of diminution, and of this invariable proportion, is obvious. If a certain sound will fill a sphere one yard in diameter with a certain intensity, that same sound, dispersed through a sphere six yards in diameter, and therefore spreading over thirty-six times as much space, will be, as it were, diluted to a thirty-sixth of its strength.

But this decrease only takes place in free air. In a room the sound is confined, and its lateral diffusion is prevented, so that the rule, although perfectly true as regards the sound coming directly from the musical source, is not quite applicable to the general effect produced by the reflection and dispersion of the sonorus waves. Indeed sound confined, or prevended from dispersing, may be conveyed to great distances. There seems to be no limit to the actual distance to which it may be carried in a tube. The French philosopher, Biot, experimenting on the transmission of sound through the empty water-pipes of Paris, found that he could hold a conversation in a low voice through an iron tube three thousand one hundred and twenty feet in length. The lowest possible whisper could be heard at this distance.

The leading of sound through tubes was practised in early times, and no doubt speaking images and oracular responses depend upon this acoustical phenomenon. In our own time we have had talking heads. But modern sightseers know all about tubes; so the heads have been isolated from solid supports, and carried by suspending chains. No matter. The mouth of the figure has been made hollow, or a trumpet bell has been placed in it; the sound has been led by a tube to some concealed orifice directly in front of this bell-mouth, and being as it were injected thereinto, has been thrown out again toward the astonished audience, who have thus been made to believe that the talking has been the result of some highly ingenious mechanism contained within the image.

Nevertheless, successful attempts have been made to imitate the human voice by mechanical instruments. In the last century, the Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg proposed as a prize subject an inquiry into the nature of the vowel sounds and the construction of an instrument for artificially imitating them. The question was solved by Monsieur Kratzenstein, who showed that all the vowels could be pronounced by blowing through a reed into tubes or chambers of various forms At about the same time a Viennese mechanician, Monsieur Kempelen, made a series of elaborate experiments which led to the construction of a machine that could be made to utter not merely vocal sounds, but words and even some few complete sentences, such as opera, astronomy, Constantinopolis, vous etes mon ami, Romanorum imperator semper Augustus, etc.

Sound is produced by certain vibrations or pulsations communicated to the atmosphere. When we pluck a harp-string we set it quivering, and cause it to give to the adjacent air a rapid succession of blows: the number of these blows in a second depending upon the length and tension of the string. If the string only gave one push to the air we should hear but one noise or blow: but as in vibrating it gives a rapid succession of pushes, we experience a rapid succession of noises, and these resolve themselves into a continuous sound.—Selected.

Earthquake Bundle.

Who ever heard of such a thing as an "earthquake bundle?" I saw a letter a few days since written by a lady living in South America, near the place where a terrible earthquake had just thrown down the houses built of mud and cane, so that what was a few weeks ago a thriving city, is now a heap of dust. It had lifted the ocean waves so that a great ship of war with dragging anchor was carried hither and thither, and set down far inland, where it must remain while its timbers endure, as a monument of God's power. Rocks were rent asunder, the earth opened, and hot, sulphurous water boiled up about the feet of those who were flying from falling houses. The earth continues to rumble and tumble every day, and the inhabitants of that region lie down at night not knowing but that, without an instant's warning, their houses will be thrown down, and they forced to fly to the mountains. They keep a bundle on their beds with a full suit of clothing and cloak or shawl, so that they can snatch it and fly; for the earthquake gives no time to unlock closets, open trunks, or collect scattered articles. This is called an earthquake bundle.

What would tempt me to live in a country where such a sad reminder must daily meet the eye as one lies down to rest, thought I, on reading this account from the pen of a young friend, born and bred among the granite hills of New England. Though we encounter stern winter winds and snows, and are deprived of tropical fruit and soft balmy breezes, the earth is firm beneath our tread, the ocean waves are stayed by the Almighty hand that made them, and we lie down in peace and security. Just then my eyes glanced at a prophetic description found in the sixth chapter of Revelation, so like, and yet infinitely more fearful than the terrible scenes lately described in South America. A time when the "chief captains, mighty men, and bondmen hide themselves in the dens and rocks of the mountains." Woe be to those found without a robe of righteousness to cover their naked souls from "the wrath of the Lamb" in that fearful day. That hour will surely come, and leave no time for preparation. When we lie down at night, though not forced to have a gloomy, ominous earthquake bundle lying on our beds, we are warned by the events of every day to obtain a robe of righteousness from our blessed Saviour to protect us from the fiery indignation of the final Judge, and the sudden and everlasting death of the soul, an evil which the most terrible earthquake is powerless to inflict, if our peace is made with Heaven and our sins forgiven.

Our Saviour said: "Be ye also ready." Learn of the inhabitants of the earthquake region not to lie down at night unprepared for the final scene that may come at any hour.

The earthquake may usher its prepared victim into everlasting glory, but woe be to those who refuse to hear the Saviour say: "Watch, therefore; for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh."—N. Y. Observer.

What Must You Do.

Reader, do you feel the slightest drawing toward God, the smallest concern about your mortal soul? Does your conscience tell you this day that you are not yet forgiven, and have not yet felt the Spirit's power, and do you want to know what to do? Listen, and I will tell you.

You must go at once to the Lord Jesus Christ in prayer, and beseech him to have mercy upon you, and send you the Spirit.

You must go direct to that open fountain of living waters, the Lord Jesus Christ, and you shall receive the Holy Ghost. John vii., 39. Begin at once to pray to Jesus for the Holy Spirit. Think not that you are shut up and cut off from hope. The Holy Ghost is promised to them that ask him. Give the Lord no rest till he comes down and makes you a new heart. Cry mightily nnto the Lord; say unto him, "Bless me, even me also" quicken me, and make me alive." I dare not, for my part, send anxious souls to any one but Christ. I cannot hold with those who tell men to pray for the Holy Spirit in the first place, in order that they may go to Christ in the second place, I see no warrant of Scripture for saying so. I only see that if men feel they are needy, perishing sinners, they ought to apply first and foremost, straight and direct, to Jesus Christ. I see He himself says "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." John viii., 37. I know it is his special office to baptize with the Holy Ghost, and that "in him all fulness dwells." I dare not pretend to be more systematic than the Bible. I believe that Christ is the meeting-place between God and the soul, and my first advice must always be, Go to Jesus, and tell your wants to Him.

Reader, remember this, I have told you what to do. You are TO GO TO CHRIST, if you want to be saved.—J. C. Ryle.

One Stronghold Surrendered.

An "Orthodox" paper surrenders Rev. xxii., 11, as follows:

There is reason to doubt the use often made of Rev. xxii., 11. "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." Preachers quote these words as though they were a part of the judicial sentence at the last day, or were, at least, a declaration of what would remain true after that event. Mr. Barnes so interprets them. But they do not occur in such a connection. They are a part of the concluding appeal of the book of Revelation in the form of an impressive final appeal of the angel to John. They come after the words: "Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book; for the time is at hand," and immediately before the words, "And behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give to every man as his work shall be." It would thus appear that the idea is, to tell John, and through him, all the readers of the book, that after the message should be delivered men would be allowed to act out their character and choice, whether evil or good, without divine interference, till the predicted second coming of Christ, when each should be dealt with according to his work. So good old Matthew Henry understands it. Prof. Stuart, in his Commentary, translates, "Let him who acts unjustly, act unjustly still" and let him who is defiled, defile himself still, yet let the righteous still do righteously, and he that is holy, still be holy," adding; "The sentiment seems to be plainly this: Be it that persecutors and vile men shall continue without remission, for a while longer, their oppressive and debasing practises; yet let not the righteous be shaken in his constancy, nor the holy man cease in any measure from the pursuit of sanctification."

It is not proper, then, to quote this passage as teaching that there will be no change of character in eternity. The reference is to the free presistence of men in evil and in good, allowed in his world under the gospel, and to the judgment that will follow, awarding destiny according to character.—The Advance.

The Brother Outside.

I was once called to preach in a State Prison. When I heard the tramp, tramp, tramp of the men, and saw them filing into their places, thinking how few of them had improved their Gospel privileges, I was deeply impressed with my responsibility. I felt my own sinfulness; and that all the difference between me and them was owing to the grace of God. I told them so, and tried to impress it on them, that they should each for himself seek pardon for past sins, and divine help to be holy in heart and life hereafter. While all seemed interested, there was one man whose heart was especially moved, and who sent special request that I would visit him. I did so; that is to say, I went down the hall and stood before his cell. I put my finger through the grating and just touched his finger. While the tears were running down his face, he sobbed out the inquiry: "Did you mean what you said about sympathizing with us, and that only the help of God made you differ from us?" I assured him that I meant and felt exactly so. "O, then," said he, clasping his hands, "I thank God, and I thank you. I am here for life; but I can stay here more contentedly now that I know I have a brother out in the world." I, too, thanked God more than ever for such a gospel.

Some years after that, I related this incident in a public meeting, when an aged man bathed in tears, arose, and with a trembling voice, exclaimed: "The Lord bless you, my dear sir, for your attention to that young man. He was my son. He was afterward pardoned out. He enlisted in the army; he did his duty faithfully; he was captured in a battle and died in a rebel prison, to the last moment thanking God and thanking you for your sermon and your personal kindness."

To Tea Drinkers.

The origin of the mysterious term "barbarian," so generally used by the Chinese, when referring to the English, is curiously revealed in the following extract. Messrs Joseph Travers & Sons, the eminent colonial merchants, in one of their recent circulars to the London and country grocery trade, write: "Some may not be aware of the fact that the tea-shrub is a single species, and that from the same tree black or green tea might be made. The difference between the two, black and green, depends solely on the manipulation and the processes to which the leaves are subjected during the period of manufacture. In the case of black tea, the leaves are allowed to lie and ferment for ten or twelve hours to darken them, they are then highly fired. Those leaves which are intended to be converted into green teas are roasted slightly immediately after they are gathered, and quickly dried after they have undergone the rolling process. In order to make green tea uniform in appearance, and of a particular bluish hue, a coloring composed of finely-powdered gypsum and Prussian blue is laid on the leaves, during the last process of roasting. This adulteration the Chinese do not hesitate to carry out on a systematic plan, and on a most extensive scale. "During this part of the operation," says Mr. Fortune, in his description of the process, "the hands of the workmen were quite blue. I could not help thinking that if any green tea drinkers had been present during the operation, their taste would have been corrected, and, I may be allowed to add, improved. It seems perfectly ridiculous that a civilized people should prefer these dyed teas to those of a natural green. No wonder that the Chinese consider the natives of the West to be a race of 'barbarians.'" Mr. Fortune says "that half-a-pond of paint or coloring material is mixed with each hundred pounds of green tea. The Chinese readily acknowledge the superiority of green uncolored, but plead in their excuse for their adulterations, the wilful preference of the foreign merchant; we need hardly add that the Chinese are far too sensible to touch these dyed teas for their own consumption."

Injurious Effects of Tobacco.

"Doctor," we said to a splendid specimen of the profession, "tell us something about the baneful effects of tobacco."

"Its effects, sir," he replied "are evil and only evil, and that continually; and it is a perfect mystery that gentlemen of my profession care so little, do and know so little about a poison that is doing mischief at so terrible a rate."

"Sir," the doctor continued, "I was on a council of physicians the other day, on the borders of this town; the patient was a young man, prostrated by paralysis; he was deprived of the use of his lower limbs from the abdomen to the toe; we overhauled him; we withdrew and talked about antecedents and probable causes, and came to no satisfactory conclusion. Dissatisfied and impatient, I inquired of the attending physician whether the poor fellow used tobacco."

"O, no," he replied, "I guess not," and with an air of nonchalance, added, "What if he does? that can have nothing to do with his case."

"I did not ask you," I replied, "about the effects of tobacco, but simply if the patient used it."

Gruffly he said, "Go and see."

Stepping to his bedside I said, "My young friend, do you use tobacco?"

With a sqealing voice, more cat-like than human, he answered, "I use a little."

"How do you use it."

"I smoke a little."

"Did you smoke this morning?"

"Yes, a little."

"Did you smoke at noon?"

"Yes, a little."

Before I quit his side I ascertained that he had actually consumed sixteen cigars a day, and the poor fellow's soul was so obfuscated by smoke that he considered that prodigious amount but a little!

"This," continued the doctor, "may seem strange, but the strangest of all is the fact that his attending physician, regular and well bred, did not know, in the first place, that his patient used tobacco, and secondly, if he did, he did not know that a rank and deadly poison could have anything to do with his case."

We are indebted to the medical profession for the most effective testimony against this most popular poison; hence we have no wish to arraign it and denounce it in wholesale style. But account for it as we may, on the score of selfishness or ignorance, the main body of the profession are mournfully derelict in duty touching the ruinous effects of this great and fashionable narcotic.—Am Baptist.

Six Sermons on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the Life-Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and ever does.

The Watch Tower: or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

Life from the Dead; or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

Life only in Christ.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

Man's Destiny.—Immortality; The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by Geo. Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—"the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

Bible vs. Tradition: in which the true teachings of the Bible is manifested; showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE GARDEN OF EDEN LITERAL.

[The following article we take from the Methodist Quarterly Review of July. It is by "Rev. Luther Lee." We do not indorse every expression in it, but in the main it is invaluable.—ED. HER. OF LIFE.]

IN the second and third chapters of Genesis is found an account of the garden of Eden as the first abode of man. The account given of that garden, and of the transactions said to have been enacted in connection therewith, have been made the subject of much investigation and criticism by good and learned men, and yet it cannot be affirmed that they have removed all difficulty and obscurity from the subject. So have the same topics been made the subject of much sceptical criticism, and even vulgar ridicule, by impious unbelievers, and yet they have failed to prove the history false or unreasonable. It never can be proved to be false, for the reason that there is no higher proof which can reach the case than the history itself. There is no prior or contemporary document which can contradict the Bible record, and there is nothing contradictory or impossible in the account itself. The Bible story of the origin and first condition and acts of man has a decided advantage over all modern speculative theories; it claims to be a record of the facts, it can never be disproved, and it is the only document which claims to be such a record.

It is not intended to join issue with Deism, or with any other form of open infidelity in this article; but there have been some disguised attacks upon the integrity of this portion of sacred history which demands attention. It has been insisted by some that the account of the garden of Eden, and of the sin of Adam and Eve and their expulsion, is only a myth, or, at most, only an allegory. It is with this class that the issue is joined. The following is a statement of the position that will be maintained:

THE INTEGRITY OF THE CHRISTIAN RECORD REQUIRES US TO MAINTAIN THE LITERALITY OF THE ACCOUNT OF THE GARDEN OF EDEN.

1. The account of the garden of Eden is a link in the chain of history so connected, that if this link be dissolved into a myth, or transformed into an allegory, it will not only sever the chain, but loosen it at the end from the first great starting point of realities, leaving no land-fastening. It is a part of the account of creation. The history of the garden embraces the only account we have of the origin of our race, for the man whom God formed out of the dust of the ground was the same man which he put in the garden, and who also was the father of the race; so that if the garden is a myth the man is a myth also and if the story of the garden is an allegory, the story of the man is also an allegory; and so far as the Scriptures are concerned we have no account of the origin of our race, and the Bible history of humanity ends in a myth or an allegory as you trace it upward.

The first sin committed by man, commonly characterized as the fall, constitutes the principal topic of the account of the garden, so that if this story is a myth the Scriptures give us no matter-of-fact account of the introduction of sin into this world. But that first sin, said to have been committed in the garden, constitutes the historic stand-point of the world's redemption by Christ. Make the account of the garden a myth, and you leave only a myth for the first great historic event in the story of redemption, which is the greatest wonder of all the wonders that ever astonished angels, men, or devils.

The story of the garden, and of the transactions said to have taken place therein, constitutes the beginning of the only history we have of our race, and if it is a myth the Bible gives us no truthful account of the commencement of the human family. The Bible history makes the same Adam and Eve who were in the garden, and were driven out of it on account of their disobedience, the father and mother of us all. The Adam and Eve of the garden were the father and mother of Cain and Abel. The same Adam and Eve were the father and mother of Seth, from whom Noah descended, who alone with his family crossed the flood to people the world on this side. From Noah Abraham descended, and Christ descended from Abraham, who was the promised Seed of the woman of the garden that was to bruise the serpent's head. Thus, if you make a myth of the story of the garden, the only history of humanity ends in a myth where it began, if you trace it backward. Make a myth of the story of the garden, and the genealogy of Christ ends in a myth.

2. The garden of Eden, with the events historically connected with it, are so referred to by later inspired writers as to impeach the whole Bible history, if that be only a myth or an allegory. The recorded facts are referred to by various writers, not as to a myth or an allegory, but as to historical facts. "And Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere before the Lord destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the Lord." Gen. xiii., 10. "The Lord shall comfort Zion; he shall comfort all her waste places, and he will make her wilderness like Eden, and her desert like the garden of the Lord." Isa. li., 3. "Thou hast been in Eden, the garden of the Lord." Ezek. xxviii., 13. "I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches: so that all the trees of Eden that were in the garden of God envied him." Ezek. xxxi., 9. "The land is as the garden of Eden before them, behind them a desolate wilderness." Joel ii., 3. "If I covered my transgressions as Adam." Job xxxi., 33. The above texts all clearly refer to the account of the garden of Eden as a fact in history, known and believed.

The New Testament contains still more conclusive references to the history of the garden of Eden. Christ, in his reply to the Pharisees on the subject of divorce, quoted the very words of Adam, uttered in the garden of Eden over the woman whom, according to the account, God had formed out of one of his ribs. "For this cause shall a man leave his father and his mother and shall cleave to his wife: and they twain shall be one flesh." Matt. xix., 5; Gen. ii., 24. "But I fear, less by any means, as the serpent beguiled Eve through his subtley, so your minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." 2 Cor. xi., 3. "Adam was first formed, then Eve. And Adam was not deceived, but the woman being deceived was in the transgression." 1 Tim. ii., 13, 14. These allusions to the garden of Eden are such as to prove the account to be real history; or to impeach the New Testament by supposing that it rests some of its fundamental principles upon a myth or an allegory.

3. Paul selects the transactions of the garden as his first grand stand-point, from which he contemplates the world's redemption. The great Apostle grounds the necessity of redemption upon what took place in the garden, by which the whole race was involved in sin, and from this point he runs a parallel between the Adam of the garden, the first Adam, that sinned, and Christ, the second Adam, the redeemer and restorer of what was lost in the first Adam.

God said to the serpent in the garden, "I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her Seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel." Gen. iii., 15. This has been understood as referring to Christ as the Seed of the woman; and though this interpretation of the text is not essential to the validity of Christianity, nor to the soundness of the present general argument, it is proper to show that the idea is interwoven into the entire history of redemption. The genealogy of Christ is carefully traced back to the Adam and Eve of the garden. Christ was promised to Abraham as his Seed, and Paul, referring to this fact, no doubt with reference to what was said in the garden, that the Seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, comments as follows: "Now to Abraham and his Seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds, as of many; but as of one, and to thy Seed, which is Christ." Gal. iii., 16. And so literal were the words uttered in the garden concerning the Seed of the woman, that their fulfilment required that Christ should be the seed of the woman without a human father. He was the son of a virgin, and was thus the seed of the woman in a sense not true of any other human being. This makes the words uttered in the garden, which some call a myth or an allegory, not only literal history, but in this item a prophecy of the most profound importance. Paul gives this subject special notice when he says, "But when the fulness of time was come, God sent forth his Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law." Gal. iv., 4, 5. Also, no doubt with direct reference to what was said in the garden, that the Seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head, Paul says, "The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly." Rom. xvi., 20.

St. Paul, while discussing the great doctrine of the resurrection, gives us the following parallels between the Adam of the garden and Christ: "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead. For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv., 20–22. No one can doubt that the Adam here named, by whom death came and in whom all die, is the same Adam upon whom the sentence of death was passed in the garden of Eden; and if so, Paul must have regarded that account as literal history, or he would not have thus reasoned from it in proof of the important doctrine of the resurrection of the dead.

But Paul gives his strongest argument in his Epistle to the Romans: "Wherefore, as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned: for until the law, sin was in the world: but sin is not imputed where there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses, even over them that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression, who is the figure of Him that was to come. But not as the offence, so also is the free gift: for if through the offence of one many be dead, much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace, which is by one man, Jesus Christ, hath abounded unto many. And not as it was by one that sinned, so is the gift; for the judgment was by one to condemnation, but the free gift is of many offences unto justification. For if by one man's offence death reigned by one; much more they which receive abundance of grace and of the gift of righteousness shall reign in life by one, Jesus Christ. Therefore, as by the offence of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation; even so by the righteousness of one the free gift came upon all men unto justification of life." Rom. v., 12–18.

The account of the garden of Eden narrates the only transactions in the history of humanity to which Paul can have referred in the above scripture; and if we rarefy that into a myth, or transform it into an allegory, we leave Paul nothing but a mythical or an allegorical foundation for his masterly argument, at the profoundness of which the deepest Christian theologians have been awed, and the most thinking infidels have wondered. It appears impossible that any one should doubt that Paul's one man that sinned, by whose sin death entered into the world, and passed upon all because it involved all in sin, is the man who sinned in the garden. There is no other one man named in the Bible by whom sin and death can have entered the world. It appears impossible to doubt that the Adam of Paul's argument, from whom death reigned until the time of Moses without any written law, is the same Adam upon whom the sentence of death was pronounced in Eden. The argument of the Apostle is built upon two principal facts.

First, Adam, the one man that sinned, by whose offence many, that is, all, were made sinners, creating the necessity for the redemption of the race, was the first man of the race, the father of all men. Jews and Gentiles alike suffered by the sin of the one man, and alike needed redemption. Hence it is that this one man, Adam of the garden, was the father of Seth, from whom the race is traced down to Noah, from whom both the Jews and Gentiles have their descent.

The second fact upon which Paul's argument is built is, that Christ, the Redeemer, descended from the same one man, Adam, was the Seed of the one woman, Eve, the wife of the one man, Adam, so that the Gentiles, who could claim no relation to him through Abraham, could claim such relation through Noah, from whom Jews and Gentiles are traced in one genealogical line up to Adam. Corresponding to these facts, we have the genealogy of Christ, carefully traced up to Adam and Eve, who figured in the garden, and were turned out of it on account of their sin, connecting the Christ of the garden of Gethsemane and the cross, with the Adam, the sinner, in the garden of Eden. Thus are all men who need redemption, and Christ the Redeemer, equally connected with Adam, the first sinner. The argument then is, that as the whole human race has descended from Adam, the first sinner, and are sinners like him, so Christ, after the flesh, descended from the same Adam, and stands related, not only to the Jew through Abraham, but to the whole lost race through Noah and Adam. Break this chain, by which Christ the Redeemer, together with the whole redeemed race, stands connected with the Adam of the garden, or removed the literality of that garden by dissolving it into a myth or converting it into an allegory, and you will subvert Paul's argument, and overthrow his entire view of the plan of redemption.

4. The laxity of interpretation which is necessary to reach the conclusion that the account of the garden of Eden is a myth or an allegory, if allowed, will enable every person to explain away a large portion of the Scriptures so far as any settled and literal sense is concerned. The story of Cain and Abel can quite as easily be considered a myth; so can the account of the translation of Enoch. The story of the flood and Noah's ark may as easily be turned into a myth. The call of Abraham, and in particular his call to offer his son Isaac, has no stronger claim to be a literal history than the account of the garden of Eden. Moses in his ark of bulrushes would be a beautiful myth under this latitudinarian mode of interpretation. The book of Job is easily converted into a grand legend. The exit of Elijah becomes a splended myth, and the whole book of Jonah is no more than a legend, and an extravagant one at that. The history of the miraculous conception has been declared to be a legend, which was written and added to St. Matthew's Gospel in after years. If we allow ourselves thus to tamper with the record, landmark after landmark will vanish, stand point after stand-point will be changed, until we shall have no anchoring ground left into which to cast the moorings of our faith when we find ourselves drifting before the storm.

5. There is absolutely no necessity for such a latitudinarian construction of the account of the garden of Eden as will make it a myth or an allegory. There is no sufficient reason for it, and it can result from nothing short of a spirit of wild speculation, or an intention to impair the Christian record and weaken our faith in the same. This position is worthy of a brief examination.

It is not contended that the document has been mistranslated, and that a new and correct translation makes it read like a myth or an allegory. Such a position would challenge examination by affirming a sufficient reason, though the affirmation were false; but no such claim has been set up.

It is not pretended that the document has been changed by design or by the errors of copyists, and that to bring it back to its original state will show it to be a myth or an allegory. If it were claimed that some more ancient Hebrew copies had been found by which it would stand corrected, every true Christian scholar, and every firm believer in the Scriptures would say, Bring forward your ancient copies, prove their antiquity, and let us compare and make all required correction, that we may have the record as God gave it to man. But no such position is attempted to be maintained, and it would be only a pretence if such attempt were made.

It is not necessary to convert the story of the garden of Eden into a myth or an allegory as a means of conforming the record to the truth of science. No modern scientific discoveries contradict the literality of the account of the garden of Eden, and of Adam and Eve. The theology of the Church once taught that this earth was a stationary plain, and that the sun moved around it; but science has corrected that error, though the priests and doctors for a time fought manfully against it. But that error and its correction does not involve the truth of the record, but only our interpretation of it. Though men have often been proved mistaken in regard to science, and may be again, yet all real science is truth itself, and our opinions must stand corrected by its undoubted affirmations. So conclusive, however, are the proofs of the inspiration of the Scriptures, that if clearly ascertained principles of science contradict their supposed teaching, we should at once suspect our understanding of them; for the conflict cannot be with what the Scriptures really teach, but only with our interpretation of them. But no scientific principles have been developed which conflict with the literality of the account of the garden of Eden. It is not a question which can be brought to the test of any of the sciences. Astronomy does not reach it, geology does not reach it, anatomy does not reach it, physiology does not reach it; in a word, no science reaches it. It is claimed that geology has demonstrated that the earth is more than six thousand years old. Be it so; but whether the account of the garden of Eden is an historic fact or a myth does not depend upon the age of the world. The Bible history of generations teaches that the present race of human beings, the children of Adam, have existed upon earth only about six thousand years, and geology furnishes no proof that our race has existed longer than the Bible history of Adam and his descendants allow. How long the earth existed before God created Adam and planted the garden in another question, which has nothing to do with the character of this part of the history as literal or mythical.

The conclusion reached, then, is, that to pronounce the account of the garden of Eden a myth or an allegory is to surrender a fundamental document before any legal demand has been made for it; it is to make a free-will offering to infidelity, and one which will impair the foundation of our religion. It will leave us without the slightest history of our race, for the Bible history of humanity does not connect us with the man created and described in the first chapter of Genesis, but with the man Adam of the garden of Eden. It will leave us without any account of the introduction of sin into this world; for the only account we have is contained in the history of the garden of Eden as man's first abode. It will subvert many of the most sublime truths and richest promises, which are so connected with and based upon the literal existence of the garden of Eden, and the historic truth of what is said to have transpired therein, as to stand or fall with the literality of that account. Let no man, then, lay a sacrilegious hand upon that document.

ENOCH'S FAITH.

IT is very noticeable how directly, even at that early period of the world, the faith of Enoch centred in the doctrine of the near coming of the Lord to judgment. Indeed, in this respect, he was a consummate Adventist, as all the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles were. There is but one sentence, of all that he ever preached and testified, that we know to have been uttered by him. That sentence is given us by St. Jude; and it is a sentence about the coming of the Lord with his saints to execute judgment upon the wicked world. That prophecy looked germinantly to the flood, but really, and in its proper sense and fulness, to the coming of the Son of man with power and great glory. Speaking of his case, the distinguished Dr. Candlish, of the Presbyterian Church, says: "We see that, while the faith of these holy men of old rested on the manifestation of the seed of the woman as engaged in painful conflict, on their behalf, with the seed of the serpent, their expectations reached forward also to his coming in triumph. 'They searched what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.' 1 Pet. i., 11. It was, therefore, on the second coming of the Lord in victory, that they set their hearts. They did not, with the later Jews, overlook his first coming, in suffering and conflict; for they understood well the typical meaning of their sacrifices. But still their eye rested ultimately on something beyond; and it is unquestionable that they, and the prophets after them, delighted to fill their minds with bright and glowing pictures of the advent in glory. They realized the resurrection state, and the restitution of all things, as virtually near at hand. And we may be well assured that this is the real and only secret of such a holy and humble walk with God as Enoch's was; while it is the only effectual antidote to atheistic confidence in nature's permanency, and in the Lord's delay of judgment." Lecs. on Gen. vol. 167.

And even in some of those more specific aspects of the Advent faith, which many are so indisposed to credit, Enoch appears to have been perfectly clear and confident. When the Lord comes to execute judgment upon the ungodly world, Enoch says it is to be "with his saints." Now, to come "with his saints," there must be some previous taking of those saints. There must be a coming for the saints, before there can be a coming with them. This is plain. Hence there is implied a resurrection and translation, before judgment is visited upon the ungodly world. Enoch not only believed in the revelation of Christ to take vengeance upon the wicked, but he also believed that he and all God's holy ones would already be out of the world, and with the Lord, ready to take part in the fearful administration, before the fiery revelation which is to devour the adversaries. He therefore counted on being translated—on being taken out of the world without dying,—and hence sought, by constant watchfulness and prayer, to escape the desolations of the wicked, by a previous bodily transfer to the presence of the Lord.

It has been urged that it is not well for us to dwell much upon these mysterious things; that to give them prominence in our thinking and teaching is deleterious to solid faith and damaging to active and wholesome piety. But the result seems to have been very different in Enoch's case. This was the chief and grand article of his faith, preaching and prophesying. We do not know of a single other word that he ever uttered but this. There is no evidence that he ever preached on any other subject. But we do know that he did believe, teach, and prophesy on this. So far as the record goes, this seems to have been the absorbing and all-comprehending topic of his entire ministry. And yet he is singled out as one of the holiest men that lived before the flood, and all the while "he had this testimony, that he pleased God." Heb. xi., 5.

Glorious also was the final issue of his Advent faith. The Epistle to the Hebrews tells us that "Enoch was translated, that he should not see death." He never died at all. God took him bodily to heaven, as the type of what he will do to all, of like precious faith, when the appointed time comes.—Prophetic Times.

"LIVE AND LET LIVE."

THE absurd idea that "ignorance is the mother of devotion" originated in Rome; but, like a great many more of her notions, it appears to have made a wide circuit, and embraces even some who profess better things.

To shut and lock up the door of knowledge and try to stop the progress of the inquiries after Truth, is worthy only of the dark ages, which (if it is not a misnomer) appear to be dawning again.

That the so-called Advent churches should follow in this path is a sad though too manifest fact. Witness the action of the R. I. Conference, and the proclamation of H. Munger in the "Crisis;" in the bare-faced attempt to exclude the believers in the non-resurrection of the ungodly from the camp-meeting at Springfield. Much the same course has been taken in this place, with those who believe in a future age; and it seems some of the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE, have no taste for this subject, and hope to see no more of it. Strange, that what is food to one man, is rank poison to another. But that the gospel of the kingdom should be distasteful to a true Christian, is past my comprehension. A subject so rich, so glorious, that saints of old and angels desired to look into it, and were never weary of its contemplation. The ever-present theme of the sweet Psalmist of Israel, and of all the prophets of the Old Testament. That Christ and his Apostles constantly preached, the gospel of the kingdom. The same good news, more fully and clearly revealed. What believers in the personal reign of Christ, and his speedy advent to set up and establish this kingdom, should ignore and indignantly reject the mention of such a subject, and refuse even to look into it, is strange, passing strange; it is wonderful. This fossilized religion, that is come to a dead stand, and will not stir one inch beyond a certain point, must soon die out, in these last days of progress.

Where are the Bereans of the present day, that search the Scriptures to see if these things are so?

I have seen people squirm and twist their features into all shapes, at the reading, without note or comment, a chapter in Isaiah, that speaks in glowing language of the glory, power, and extent of Messiah's kingdom and reign over Israel and the nations. There may be some excuse for those who believe in an immaterial visionary heaven at death, where naked, bodiless ghosts sit forever on white clouds singing psalms, to reject, as too gross for their airy fancy, such a material kingdom as the word of God reveals, if they prefer such a phantom. But for those who look for a city that hath foundations on the new earth, to shut their eyes and ears against all God has revealed in his word for the hope and joy of his people, is past belief, if it were not so clearly manifest.

It is necessary indeed first to remove the rubbish that has accumulated for ages, amongst Pagans, Romans Mohammedans, and all Protestant sects; which work we are now trying to do, and find it no easy task. Worse than the ruins of Pompeii.

But let us not stop here, in mere negatives, when the boundless ocean of positive truth lies open before us. The gospel of the kingdom not only embraces the risen, changed, and glorified saints, as kings and priests in the future age, but extends its glorious hopes and prospects to the race. All nations, kindreds, tongues, and people shall see the glory of Messiah's reign, and worship at his footstool. In Abraham's promised seed all nations shall be blessed. Hitherto only a small remnant have been gathered into the fold of Christ—no nation has ever been converted, or ever will be, in this dispensation. The church, indeed, undertook the great work to convert the world; but alas, so far from that, the tables are turned, and the world has converted the church!

Yet the day is coming when the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the seas; from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same, the gospel light shall shine, circumnavigating the globe.

Some may, on this subject, have given reins to their imaginations and out-stripped the truth in their super-abundant zeal; but we have a sure word of prophecy, whereunto we do well to take heed, not to add to, or take from what is written in the book.

I trust there may be one little corner in the HERALD OF LIFE, for that little flock who love to contemplate and diligently study the nature and subjects of the kingdom yet to come.

Have patience with us, brethren, for a season; if we extend the same privilege to you, we want all the strings in tune on our golden harp—the constant twang of one string does not, to us, make harmony. Suffer us rightly to divide the word of truth—give not only milk to babes, but also meat in due season to those whose stomachs can digest it: we trust this will be your case ere long.

Grow in grace; come with us and bathe in the river of life. Here you will find shallows where an infant can wade, and depths where an elephant can swim; but do not get beyond your depth until you have learned to swim; yet remember, if you would learn to swim, you must first get into the water.

THE ADVENT JUBILEE.

THE following is an extract from a Sermon by Prof. Townsend, preached in Boston, Mass., June 20th, after the great "Peace Jubilee" held in that city:

Arrangements are being made, by one skilled in all the laws and rules of sound and harmony (being the author of them), for a Peace Jubilee on an immensely grander scale than that to which we have listened.

Our city never looked more inviting to strangers than it has during the past week; but the city to which we are invited, and for which we are looking, is far more enchanting. It has no scorching sun, but is lit with the pure, clear, and resplendent light given it by the Lord God Almighty. It has no thirsty inhabitants crying for fountains of water, for there are ever at hand rivers clear as crystal. It has no streets filled with clouds of dust, for they are paved with solid gold. The walls are as if made of beautiful jasper, and the foundations of the humblest structure of the humblest inhabitant are garnished with all manner of precious stones. The city gates are solid pearls. The people who shall assemble to celebrate the festival of peace throughout the universe are to come from the north, the south, the east, and the west. They are of all ages, of all nations, of all kindred, and of all tongues. None will be too poor to gain admittance, though "many shall seek to enter in, and shall not be able." An honest, humble, trusting, faithful, Christian heart is the only pre-requisite. It is the sure passport when one approaches bearing this insignia. The sword is sheathed, and the heads of the guard are bowed. The choruses arranged for that occasion are of transcendent sublimity. These that you have heard are only the feeble echoes of sublimer strains. They will be conducted by such leaders as Mendelssohn, whose "St. Paul" and "Elijah" are familiar to all musicians. Such leaders as Beethoven, who on his death-bed was surrounded by more melting melodies than had ever been given to the world; and who expired while the chambers of his soul were ringing with echoes of heavenly music, and while the wild elements of nature were breathing their funeral dirge over him amid thunders, lightnings, hail, and storm. Under such leaders as Haydn, who, at his last appearance in public, listened to the performance of his "Creation," and who, when the chorus rendered the famous passage, amid the deafening applause of the vast audience, "And there was light," pointed upward and exclaimed, "It comes from there." Under such leaders as the author of the "Messiah," George Theodore Handel, who died in hopes, as he said, "of meeting his dear God, his Lord and Saviour on the day of his resurrection."

But let us pass from the leaders to the songs and choruses to be performed. As true as we are the sons of God and followers of Christ, so true shall we hear them—hear them word for word. Here is one of the deep, rich and continued choruses, "Holy, holy, holy Lord God Almighty, which was, and is, and is to come." .... "And they sung a new song, saying, Thou art worthy .... for Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God, kings and priests." "Great and marvellous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are Thy ways, Thou King of saints;" "And I heard," says the Revelation, "the voice of a great multitude," (how impressive and suggestive. It was not the discord and confusion of many, but the blending of many voices as in one—like the liquid flow, or flood of the multitude of stringed instruments at the Coliseum)—"And I heard the voice of a great multitude, and as the voice of mighty thunderings, saying 'Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth.'"

When these majestic anthems of praise go up, not from 11,000 performers, as in the Peace Jubilee of our city, but from a select choir of one hundred and forty and four thousand, and from the full chorus numbering ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, blending with the seven thunders, which at the exact interval utter their voices, subdued by the harmonious strains of ten thousand golden harps, and supported by the majestic roarings of the lions that guard the throne of the Infinite—when these thunders of melody shall burst upon entranced millions, as peal answers to peal, mountain to mountain, and deep to deep, until the grand arches of heaven reverberate throughout with the swelling and majestic symphonies—then "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them," shall be heard, "saying, Blessings, and honor, and glory, and power be unto Him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever. Amen."

You, who have been able to hear the magnificent productions of the last week, by as much as you were delighted, by as much as you desire again to hear them, by so much, yes, by so much more, rest not, day or night, until your peace is made with heaven.

You, who have failed on account of sickness, lack of means, or from any other cause, to listen to what may cause the regrets of a lifetime, be not depressed. Relatively, the loss is not worth a tear or a sigh.

But, by all the thrilling emotions that the great day of the Lord God Almighty can inspire, may you be numbered among that countless throng who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb.

N. S. Wilbur, Richmond, R. I., writes; Personally I am a stranger to you, but have known you by reputation since 1843; believing that we worship the same God and hold the same faith, being the faith and hope of the fathers of the primitive church, viz., that Christ will come again personally and restore all things spoken of by all the holy Prophets since the world began, raising the righteous dead incorruptible, and change the righteous living to immortality, eternal life; and set up His everlasting kingdom and reign over the house of Jacob forever. I believe this to embrace all the resurrection of the dead ever promised in the Bible; and as I have learned from Eld. A. Durfee that you edit a paper that favors the above views, though he does not sympathize at all with us, and as I stand almost alone in this quarter, and have to meet all the arguments of opposers on the sleep of the dead and non-revival of the wicked dead, etc., will you please send me the Herald of Life, and some good pamphlets, if you have any, and I will remit the pay. Yours in "the blessed hope."

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Theological Earthquake.

"He hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven . . . that those things which cannot be shaken may remain." Heb. xii., 26, 27.

We dwelt at some length on the above subject in our issues of July 21 and 28; noticing the conflict, as now going on in England. Last week a shock of the earthquake came to our notice from Illinois. All these things are but a few of the premonitions of the breaking up of the traditions of men, to make way for the pure word of God which has so long lain buried beneath the horrible misrepresentations of God's government and designs towards the children of men, which have filled the world with infidelity, or indifference to all things pertaining to a future life.

We are not prepared to judge with positiveness as to the precise nature of the controversy as it is now going on in England, having received but one document on the revived question, and that against "annihilation" and in defence of the eternal existence of all men, or nearly all. That article is by a Mr. Jukes, who is writing against a Mr. Maude. Both parties use "The Rainbow," a serial edited by Wm. Leask, D. D. Judging from the quotations from Mr. Maude's article we see that he, unfortunately, has taken the ground of a writer in this country, who held that death to the wicked is inflicted in "two instalments: the first killing the body and the second the soul." That theory, however, has met with little favor here, and our English friends who adopt it will find they have all their work to do over again; it is impossible to defend such a theory. Mr. Maude's language, as quoted by Mr. Jukes, is as follows:

"The death which Adam actually incurred was death in the proper and ordinary acceptation of the word, that is, the absolute termination of that creaturely existence which God at his creation had conferred on him. The only distinction between death in the case of man, and in the case of the mere animal, being, that while the animal dies once for all, the death of the body terminating its existence, man dies a double death, the first affecting only the body, but the second involving the extinction of the entire being."

Such a position leaves Mr. Jukes at liberty to make out as many deaths as his fancy can conjure up. The first sentence of Mr. Maude expresses the truth. The second is a concession to our opponents, unwarranted by the word of truth and testimony of inspiration. "Man that is in honor and understandeth not is like the beasts that perish." ... "Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them ... the grave being a habitation to every one of them." Margin. Psa. xlix. This psalm places the wicked in the grave and makes that their "habitation" forever; "they shall never see light," verse 19. To this fact innumerable other texts of Scripture testify; nor is there one word in the whole book of God which saith a wicked dead man is in a living existence or ever will live again from the dead. Men may infer such a result; but on so important a question inferences are of no avail to an impartial mind which seeks for the truth and is determined to receive only for truth that which can be proved by plain testimony from God, where things of a future and eternal life are involved.

Mr. Maude, therefore, has done truth a disservice by any admission that man's death, when he dieth in his sins, differeth from that of any other animal. "Once to die" is all that God has "appointed." Two literal deaths, as "the wages of sin," are unknown in the revelation of God. After death, if life is restored it is a "gift of God through Jesus Chrst our Lord;" and such cannot "die any more;" but they "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Rom. vi., 23, Luke xx., 35, 36.

Mr. Jukes takes advantage of Mr Maude's "double death" notion, and proceeds to multiply deaths ad infinitum. He asks:

"Does he really overlook man's awful spiritual death," etc? "'The first death,' he says, 'affects only the body,'" etc. "Where then does he place man's spiritual death? Under which of his divisions can he put it? Is it a part of the first or of the second death?"

These may be questions hard for Mr. Maude to answer from the position he occupies, but they vanish before the light of truth. Mr. Jukes' assumption that a spiritual death was, in whole or in part, the penalty for sin, has not one word of support in the word of God, and involves blasphemy and a denial of redemption by Christ. Will he deny that Christ bare the curse of the law? "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us." Gal. iii., 13. Did Christ die a spiritual death? which, according to Mr. Jukes, is to be "dead in trespasses and sins." He adds, Mr. Maude has "not one word to say of that spiritual death by which Adam, as soon as he sinned, was separated from God, and cut off from God's kingdom." So then Jesus, the second Adam, "being made a curse for us," was in like manner "separated from God, and cut off from God's kingdom," according to Mr. Jukes.

Thus does spiritual-death-ism, the daughter of immortal-soul-ism, wind up in blasphemy against Christ, and turn the Scriptures into a fable, and make them the scorn of men who think by means of their own brain, and who refuse to follow "old wives' fables:" 1 Tim. iv., 7. The plain unperverted language of the Bible is, "the wages of sin is death:" and when the Creator said to Adam, "Thou shalt surely die," we must have something more than assumptions to convert that death into a spiritual death; a phrase never found in the Bible, and which, if it means anything, means "If thou sinnest though shalt surely be a sinner!" Spiritual death is neither a penalty nor a punishment. In the first place, man had no spiritual life by creation: "that was not first which was spiritual, but animal," saith Paul, 1 Corth. xv. Hence, Adam having no spiritual life to lose, a spiritual death with him was impossible.

In the second place, God's administration shows what the death was which the penalty embraced, viz., "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Gen. iii., 19.

Mr. Jukes says, "Had Mr. Maude looked at spiritual death, he must have seen that death is not annihilation." Indeed! Was not such a death the annihilation of spiritual life? or, would Mr. Jukes have this a sort of mongrel death—dead, but not dead? He might about as soon prove Adam was only half a sinner, after he sinned, and the other half holy; for he certainly was not so "separated from God" but that he talked with God and knew his Maker's voice; a strange affair for a dead man to be engaged in; for the wise man saith, "The dead know not anything:" Eccl. ix., 5. But Mr. Jukes' dead man can talk with God very freely, and he must have known something, or his Creator might as well have talked with a stone. Mr. Jukes proceeds to say:

"What spiritual death therefore is—how while man is dead in spirit to God's world, he yet lives on in another world—how he has again to die to sin in spirit, and so, by this second spiritual death, come back out of that power of darkness into which he fell when he died to God and was driven forth from Paradise—how he lives through all these deaths, and lives on still through the death of the body, which may follow these deaths—all this, which shows that death is not annihilation or non-existence," etc.

Surely Paul stands corrected, who said "it is appointed unto men once to die." Heb. ix., 27. Mr. Jukes finds death after death of all kinds. Two deaths are nothing to him—"legion" is their name; but none of them are "annihilation or non-existence!" Let us see. Does death in sin annihilate holiness in man? Does death to sin annihilate sin in man, or send it into non-existence? "O, but Mr. Jukes means these deaths do not annihilate the man." Marvellous discovery! Is not the term death in every instance expressive of the annihilation or non-existence of something? If a man is dead in any of the senses spoken of, then there is the non-existence of that which is dead, or else he is not dead to it, nor is it dead to him: and when the man himself is dead there is a non-existence of life; he may or may not be re-created or brought again into life. If he is not brought again into life, then he never again has a living existence. How much does this differ from the "annihilation or non-existence" of the man as a man?

Death has a primary meaning. If not, the figurative use of the term has no meaning. That the primary sense of the term is the cessation of life, to whatever applied, is self-evident. Its first occurrence in language cannot be a figure of speech; and hence we reject the idea of a spiritual death as the threatened punishment for transgression. Such a construction of the language confounds crime and penalty, making no distinction between them—as if it had been said, "If you sin you shall surely be a sinner:" or, "If you murder you will surely be a murderer." But to be hanged till dead is not meant!

Cheering Words.

Our aged and most excellent "Friend," Lindley M. Moore, Rochester, N. Y., writes us: "The Herald is doing good execution. Cry aloud, my friend, and spare not. There is a good deal of shaking among the dry bones. Many are anxious for their great Diana of the Ephesians. They see her temple begins to totter. Fall it must, as sure as truth is more powerful than error. With esteem, thy friend."

Friend Moore's words, though few, give us both comfort and courage. He is near four score years old; has ever been a member of the Society of "Orthodox Friends." We first became acquainted with him some twenty-five years ago, while living in Philadelphia. He was principal of the Friends' Seminary a few miles west of that city. Our "Six Sermons" on the Immortality question, we believe, was what first made us acquainted with each other; from that time to this he has been one of our subscribers; first, to the Bible Examiner; and since to the Herald of Life; and a purer, more candid, and spiritually minded man we have seldom ever been acquainted with. His words, therefore, tend to encourage and strengthen us. Praise the Lord.

The English Controversy.

Mr. Jukes and Mr. Purdon.

In our issues of July 21 and 28, we made remarks on "The Theological Earthquake," in which we spoke at some length of matters now going on in England on the Life theme; and also inserted a short article from "The Rainbow" on "Lapsed Prophecy," by Mr. Purdon, an eminent English writer on prophecy. After our article of this week, on "The Theological Earthquake," was in type, we received "The Rainbow" for August, and find it filled with excellent and interesting matter. If Dr. Leask can forward to us his May and June numbers we shall be greatly obliged to him, and will reciprocate the favor in any way he may suggest. We give to our readers this week his very excellent article on "Training for Service in 'The Ages to Come:'" also a communication from Mr. Goodwin touching Mr. Jukes' and Mr. Purdon's articles in the July "Rainbow." It will be seen that Mr. Goodwyn takes the same view of Mr. Jukes' assumptions of Adam's being the Son of God that we have. We do not indorse all that he has said, but give it entire for the information of our readers as to the manner in which the controversy is being conducted in England.

Mr. Maude, against whom Mr. Jukes wrote, has answered for himself in the August number of "The Rainbow," and we shall transfer his reply, entire, to our columns next week. The following is Mr. Goodwyn's communication:

Adam.—Temple Services.

Sir: I have somewhat to say concerning the contents of a paper of one of your contributors to the last number of "The Rainbow," and those of a letter of another. First, of the paper of Mr. Jukes, who I sadly fear has been wandering in a metaphysical maze, led by the spirit of a man rather than by the Spirit of God. He declares Scripture to assert that "Adam was the Son of God," and "made in his image;" yea, even now in "his image," which image he, by the context, evidently means the moral image of his Creator. I do not think that Scripture gives sanction to either the one statement or the other. First, as to Adam's being the Son of God. It will be observed that the words "The Son" in Luke iii., are of human origin, and a careful analysis of the chain would show that they should not have been inserted, for whilst most of the names are direct genealogical descendants, there are some not so. The list is given to prove that Jesus is the Son of Man as such; the promised "Seed of the woman," and Saviour. In Matthew a pedigree is given to prove that Jesus was a true Israelite from Abraham, and a royal personage, heir to the throne of David. Adam was no more "the Son" of God than Joseph was "Son of" Heli. The latter was in fact the son of Jacob through the line of Solomon (Matth. i., 16), and son-in-law of Heli; thus it should have been written, as in the original text, "Joseph who was of Heli," and thus, "Adam who was of God," though the latter "of" not from the same cause as the former.

The next point is a more serious one, and lies at the root of Mr. Jukes' fallacy. Adam was not made in the moral image of God any more than are his descendants, "men" who curse one another, and yet are said to be "made after the similitude of God." (James iii., 9.) Adam was made after the form "of him that should come." (Rom. v., 14.) Redemption was in the counsels of God antecedent to creation. The latter was in order to the former. (Col. i., 15–17.) The Incarnation of the Son of God was "fore-ordained," the "body" was "prepared" in which redemption was to be accomplished. (1 Peter i., 19, 20; Heb. x., 5.) Adam was made in the "image" or "figure" of the coming Incarnate God; hence the Lord Jesus is termed "The last Adam," being Head of the new creation as the first was of the old. In form and circumstances only, though, was the first Adam the image, figure, or type of "the last." (See "The Last Adam," chap. iv.)

It is just as if a sculptor embodied an original subject formed in his mind, first in a model or image of clay, intending to produce its perfected resemblance in the finely chiselled and highly polished marble statue.

It was reserved for "the new man," which "after God is created in righteousness and true holiness," to show forth the moral "Image of him that created him." (Ephes. iv., 24; Col. iii., 10, 11). This expression of the life of God in man "renewed in knowledge," Adam had not; for the true "knowledge of good and evil" the divine life and energy are necessary.

A word in reference to Mr. Purdon's letter on the subject of the Millennial Israelitish Sacrifices declared by the prophet Ezekiel. Their necessity, object, and character will be best understood by a glance at the original mission of the ancient people of God. After the confusion of languages at Babel, and the scattering of the several nations in their condition of idolatrous darkness, the nation of Israel, having been instructed in the ways and acts of Jehovah, was so located, geographically, as to form a centre to the circumference of these ignorant heathen (Deut. xxxii., 8): the divine object being to turn them from the worship of idols to that of the One True God. They sacrificed to devils, false Gods who could establish no title to the name, inasmuch as they could neither create nor bless. Hence Israel's mission was the proclamation of their God as the Creator, and the relationship in which the world stood to him as such. The very first words of their Scriptures supplied them with the most weighty truth for the cause they were intrusted with: "In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth;" words that might have shone forth amidst the surrounding darkness—while the missionary nation could have pointed to the amazing fertility of their land and to its floral beauty, the plenteous stores in their barns, and the prosperity of their families and flocks, as evidences of the divine source from whence such blessings flowed.

Moreover, the character of the sacrifices, and the value of the Mosaic institutions—though they could not by the heathen, any more than by Israel, be understood in their spiritual meaning—could have been so far appreciated as being the appointment of their God, who was pleased visibly and tangibly to manifest his acceptance of them. (Let Deuteronomy, chap. xii., 1–12, be looked at).

As a missionary nation, however, on their first occupation of their land, Israel signally failed. As men in flesh and blood, not knowing their own condition under the ban of the law, nor, as just said, the true nature of the very sacrifices they offered, were more ready to listen to the suggestions of Satan, who first blinded their minds and then led them to fraternize with the idolaters—the result we know.

But though Israel thus failed, the purpose of God has not. The resurrection millennial condition of the nation as "holy," and "a kingdom of priests," (Exod. xix., 5, 7), will produce fruit to the glory of God, that the natural state could not.

Israel will once more be found in their land regenerated and restored, and in the same position geographically as before, in the midst of heathen nations who will not have heard of the fame of the Lord, Jehovah Jesus, nor seen his glory. (Isa. lxvi., 18, 19). The wrath of God on a sin-defiled earth will have swept away the greater part of apostate Christendom, and Jesus the Son of God, King of Righteousness and Peace, Creator of the World and great High Priest, will occupy both the throne of Israel and of the universe, visibly.

But this same Jesus will not cease to be testified of as "the Lamb of God" till "the residue of men," the complement of the redeemed family of God shall have turned to the Lord at his return. (See Acts xv., 15–18). In order to this the sacrifices of Ezekiel's prophecy will be established—sacrifices in holy contrast with those of the idolatrous Gentiles; sacrifices that will be offered, significantly pointing to redemption accomplished and to the print of the nails in the hands of the King and Creator, who to this end will "make bare his holy arm in the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of Israel's God." (Isa. lii, 7–10). Let Isaiah liv., 5, too, be carefully read when the mighty power of Israel's testimony will be seen.

Add to this the Edenlike state of their land Isa. li., 3), the magnificence of their renovated city—the world's metropolis (Psa. xlviii.)—the glory of the temple of Ezekiel, and there will not be wanting effective agency for the accomplishment of the purposes of God, now in abeyance only.

Then will be brought to pass the following Scriptures: Psa. xxii., 27–29; Isa. ii., 12–20; Rom. xv., 8–12.

Faithfully yours,

H. Goodwyn.

Training for Service in "The Ages to Come."

"Ye have need of patience." How true! Where is the Christian who does not feel this daily? Everything around us, both in the church and the world, is constantly reminding us of our need of patience. In the church, division; in the world, vanity; there is nothing in either upon which you can lay your hand and say, "See this is perfect, this yields entire satisfaction, leaving nothing further to be desired so far as it is concerned." Vain is the search for any such model of excellence, either in our ecclesiastical, social, or political arrangements. Men are not satisfied with things as they are; there is a restless craving for change; and as soon as it is obtained the discovery is made that there is deficiency still; the good promised has not been realized; the ideal perfection has not taken the form of actual fact.

Life's trials are manifold; the test is upon us all; and in the case of some its pressure is severe. The consciousness of trust in the Lord, nay, even the Spirit of adoption teaching the heart to say, "Abba, Father," does not prevent the painful action of these trials, although it sustains the soul under them. Hence such language as this; "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also we have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, and rejoice in hope of the glory of God. And not only so, but we glory in tribulations also; knowing that tribulation worketh patience; and patience, experience; and experience, hope; and hope maketh not ashamed, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us." And this: "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; perplexed, but not in despair; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body."

But the Christian who is familiar with his New Testament needs no citation from it to remind him that the early disciples of his Lord had fellowship of suffering as well as of joy; and instead of accounting it a strange thing that his faith should be tried, he ought rather to look upon it as one of the elements of that beneficent moral education which prepares him for the glory to be revealed. If there be certainty in one thing it is in this, that the sublime future which inspired men speak of for the called and chosen in Christ Jesus, requires and pre-supposes a preparation—training, education, sanctification, discipline, call it what you will—in the acquisition of which affliction bears a most important part. The grace that freely saves has also arranged that the saved shall be educated—if they are to be of any use in "the ages to come"—but there is this difference, that, whilst the salvation, or the "life," costs them nothing, being God's free gift through Christ, the education costs them much. Self-denial, patience, meekness, a surrender of the human will to that of God, holiness, practical obedience, and the habitual imitation of Christ, in all the imitable features of his character and conduct, are absolutely indispensable. These priceless things are not acquired by a sigh, or a wish, or a prayer; nor will the belief of the truth, however strong and sincere, by itself secure them. Earnest personal effort in the direction of perfect obedience is implied in consecration. "Be ye holy, for I am holy," is the law; and he who would gain the prize awarded to holiness must obey it. Ample is the reward, great is the honor destined to Christian obedience. The morning of glory will surely dawn after the long night of trial.

"Yea, Truth and Justice then
Will down return to men,
Orb'd in a rainbow; and like glories wearing,
Mercy will sit between,
Thron'd in celestial sheen,
With radiant feet the tissued clouds down steering;
And Heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace hall."

The revelations of that morning of joy will more than compensate all the cares and trials and self-discipline of the present; and doubtless we shall be surprised that the clear declarations of Scripture respecting "the glory to be revealed" did not exert a more powerful influence upon our hearts and lives, sustaining us in trouble, and producing more earnest and active labor for the honor of our Lord. "I reckon," writes Paul, "that the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." If the felicity of the future is so transcendent as to put comparison between it and the trials of the present out of the question, let us realize the fact as an incentive to patience and a spur to holy obedience. If we lose sight of the splendid prize, we shall not only become laggards in the race, but we shall also magnify our cares and griefs beyond their actual proportion, and thus run the risk of fostering a spirit of discontent, which is utterly unbecoming and wrong in any follower in Christ. "For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory; while we look not at the things which are seen, but at the things which are not seen; for the things which are seen are temporal, but the things which are not seen are eternal." When we feel the burden very heavy, when we are roughly used by the world, when we suffer unchristian treatment at the hands of men professing godliness, let us think of the coming of the Lord, and we shall bear it all. "Now for a season, if need be, ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations, that the trial of your faith, being much more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ." (1 Peter i. 6, 7.) "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you as though some strange thing happened unto you; but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy" (iv. 12, 13).

Very deficient is that pulpit teaching which makes salvation from sin and its penalty the end which God has in view in dealing with believers. Representations of the necessity of faith in Christ are absolutely indispensable as part of the duty of the Christian teacher, but to stop here, as if personal safety embraced the entire outline of divine revelation, is to make a part equal to the whole, and to lose sight of some of the most animating and suggestive disclosures of the holy Book. Why are we saved by grace? Why called and chosen! Why adopted into the divine family? Why justified and sanctified? Why made the objects of special care, and the subjects of special immunities and privileges? Such questions as these are of paramount importance, because the correct answer to them will bring us into moral and mental sympathy with God's unveilings of the future, and lead us gratefully to appreciate the wisdom and love of his dealings with us at present, however painful those dealings may be to our natural feelings. It is perfectly true that "no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous;" it would not be chastening at all were it otherwise; but it is equally true, that "afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness to them who are exercised thereby." To answer these great questions by saying, "It is all of grace," is simply to refer us back to the holy spring, about which there cannot be two opinions among those who are taught of God. It is "all of grace" that there is such a river-head of life-giving love; but we want to know whither this pure stream flows; what regions will be fertilized in its course; what forms of life and beauty will bear witness to its virtue; and, as it rolls on through the ages to come, what will be the manifest and manifold effects of its ever-acting power. Or, to drop figure, is the salvation of believers, including in that expression its three prominent ideas, the gift of eternal life, sanctification, and resurrection likeness to Christ, God's ultimate purpose with regard to them? Or are these three wonderful endowments, great and marvellous as they are, only divine means to a very glorious end, stately steps in a process which contemplates such high service in the far future as only perfectly Christ-like beings can render? When one thinks of God's infinite wisdom and boundless beneficence; of the majestic slowness with which he develops his eternal plans; of the long ages of preparation before the fulness of time for the birth of the Saviour arrived; of the ages on ages during which the tribes of Israel have been denied possession of the land divinely appointed as their inheritance; of the manifold vicissitudes and multiplied sorrows of the church during the same protracted period; and of the tender care and long-suffering patience with which the Father develops the graces and trains the minds of his children; this question, though at first sight it may seem strange, will be found to contain nothing extravagant, nothing improbable. On the contrary it is every way in harmony with what we know of God's mode of procedure in the past that his glorified ones in resurrection-life should be selected to show forth his grace and glory in the ages to come, as a city set on a hill which cannot be hid. Historical illustrations of long and painful training for eminent service are not wanting. It is enough to mention the names of Moses, Joseph, David, and Daniel, to prove this statement, and to suggest to the reader a fruitful subject of thought. The past is rich in facts which seem steadily to point to the future for a still more glorious exemplification of the principle of severe discipline before high and honorable work. Then shall the high mission of the princes of the church, the Saviour's kings and priests, be seen in a light of which at present even the most devout thinkers have a very inadequate conception; and it will be found literally true that they were trained in the wilderness for service of the most glorious kind.—Dr. Leask, Editor of The Rainbow.

Our Anniversary.

Thursday, September 2d, is the time for the annual meeting of the Life and Advent Union. The place will be in the "Life and Advent Mission Tent" in Springfield, Mass., at the hour of two o'clock in the afternoon. An informal meeting will be held at nine o'clock in the morning, in the same place, for the exchange of thoughts on various matters relating to the Union and its work.

To provide for the continuance of the Herald of Life will be the principal business of the Union. Next in importance will be the matter of issuing and circulating Tracts; that this work, which has accomplished so much, may be prosecuted with still more efficiency.

Both of the foregoing subjects call for our united and increased exertions. Let all the friends who can possibly be present not fail to do so. Those whose circumstances will not permit this, should communicate immediately with us, stating how much can be relied on from them for each of the above objects. You know the value of them to you and to the cause to which they are devoted. They are needed no less now than when first originated under the "Chestnut Tree" at Wilbraham, in 1863. A great work has been accomplished in the six years since that time. True, we have had our trials, but we have the consolation that amidst them all the Lord has sustained and prospered the work, so that the prospect of increased usefulness calls for increased efforts to push forward in promulgating the Gospel of "Life in Jesus Christ alone."

Shall we not give thanks and take courage at our coming anniversary? Let us give all the praise of all the good accomplished to "God and the Lamb."

Our Meeting at Springfield.

As Br. Storrs has several times called attention to the approaching meeting at Springfield, and again somewhat at length in last week's issue of the Herald we have hitherto deemed it unnecessary to say aught upon the subject, believing an increased interest in the work to be the experience of all friends of the "Union;" but as the time draws nigh we feel some concern respecting the attendance of all who can arrange to do so. That all who can should be there, seems evident, not only because important questions affecting the interests of the "Union" will doubtless claim our consideration, but for other and more general reasons as well. We, as a religious people, are honored instruments in the carrying forward of a great and glorious work.

By "we, as a people" we do not mean simply those of us who hold the precious and important truth of no future life for any who die in impenitence, but all who have received the truth respecting man's nature and destiny; and in order to be effective servants, workmen that need not be ashamed, we require not alone that strength which we receive directly from above through the benign operation of the "Spirit of truth," but also that strengthening and enlightening of mind which always and naturally results from the mingling in intimate social and religious fellowship of loved and loving fellow-laborers in the vineyard of the Lord.

Human nature is such that among a people shackled by no creed, but all seeking to know the truth, differences of opinion are inevitable. We all have our prejudices to contend against; preconceived notions that antagonize with truth to overcome; truths to learn or things to unlearn because wrongly learned, and hence none may properly or safely denounce as errorists those who are farther advanced in the truth, provided they do all in meekness and love, seeking not their own but the things that are Christ's; nor, on the other hand, condemn as either slothful or wilfully ignorant such as have drank less deeply of the sparkling waters that flow from the gospel fountain. Said the great apostle to the Gentiles, "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, (love) I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." If "the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost, which is given unto us," (and the Spirit will always do this work if we yield to its operation), it will flow from mind to mind and from heart to heart, binding all together in one unbroken brotherhood in Christ.

Love, we all know, is the principle through which we love God and His dear Son; "we love Him because He first loved us." If, then, we love God, we cannot but love whom He loves: and He loves all who delight in the law of His love, whether they be more or less advanced in the knowledge of His truth. There is, then, manifestly no room for feelings of jealousy, of envy, of unkindness in any form in the Christian's heart; and when such feelings are indulged, it is largely to the exclusion of pure and holy ones. If we condemn those who may be more advanced than we, it is a tacit acknowledgment that we design to grow no more "in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ:" and again, if we harshly judge such as have learned less than ourselves, we cannot be held blameless, for all truth comes by the grace of God; hence no man can boast.

The thousands of truth-lovers who gather annually at the camp-meeting in Springfield are there afforded opportunities to "reason together" which should be well improved; for it will be found that the "Spirit of truth" has enlightened some in certain directions and others in other directions, and so mutual edification cannot fail to follow. We would have none of our readers infer from what we have said that our annual gatherings are scenes of discord; far from it. With any religious people not burdened into silence by a creed they dare not question, disputations will naturally arise in the social circle, but none ought to know better than we, who have so much truth, how to conduct them becomingly. Again we suggest that all who can should be there, and thus contribute to the harmony, the interest and the profit of the occasion.

Bloomfield, N. J., Aug., 1869.

The Advent Camp-Meeting.

The Camp-Meeting at Springfield, Mass., is to commence Saturday, Aug. 28th, and continue till Sept. 6th. The "Life and Advent Mission Tent is expected to be located on the same spot as last year, at the North-east part of the ground.

"The Committee of Arrangements" have published the following statement in regard to railroads and fare agreed upon for persons going to the camp-meeting, which should be carefully noted if you wish to avail yourselves of reduced fare.

Fare on the Boston and Albany Railroad is reduced one third, which will be $4.00 from Boston to Springfield and return. Tickets to be obtained at the ticket offices, between Boston and Worcester, at Grantville, Holliston, Natic, Westboro, Milford, and Southville; beyond Worcester, at the usual stations. On the New Haven and Hartford R. R., fare is reduced one third: tickets to be obtained at New Haven, Meriden, Berlin, Hartford, and Windsor Locks. On the Conn. R. R. fare is reduced one third from So. Vernon and intermediate stations to Springfield. On all the above roads camp-meeting tickets, good from Aug. 25th to Sept. 7th, must be called for at the ticket offices; and they must also be signed by the Secretary at the camp-meeting. Remember this.

On the Mass. and Vt. R. R., persons will purchase regular tickets at the offices for Greenfield, and then get their tickets on the Conn. R. R. for Springfield. All that come on this from Brattleboro, Vernon, Fitchburg, Athol, etc., having purchased the usual ticket, will have a free return pass, on application to the Secretary.

On the Worcester and Nashua R. R., friends from Nashua, N. H., Groton Junction, and Clinton, will purchase regular tickets at the stations for Worcester, at which place they will purchase tickets for Springfield; and free return passes from Worcester will be furnished them by the Secretary on the ground.

Arrangements have been made with the Eastern R. R. Co., by which those taking the cars from Portsmouth and intermediate places for Boston, paying full fares at the ticket offices, can have free return passes by application to the Secretary, on the camp-ground.

Friends coming from New York can come and return for $4.50 by taking the boat at New Haven, and thence by cars to Springfield. The boat which leaves New York at 3.15 P. M., connects with the train at the steamboat wharf at New Haven. The other boat, which leaves New York at 11 o'clock P. M., reaches New Haven in time for the early morning train; but passengers will have to go across the city by horse cars to depot of the Hartford and New Haven Railroad. Tickets for the Railroad to the camp-meeting will be sold on the steamboats. Passengers buying through tickets, will be furnished with a return ticket, which will be good only when indorsed by the Secretary of the camp-ground.

Cars leave the Boston and Albany depot, Boston, at 5, 7, and 8 1-2 A. M.; and at 3, 4 1-2, and 9 P. M.

From J. C. Wheeler.

N. Turner Bridge, Me., Aug. 1, 1869.

Br. Storrs: I was glad to hear of the disposition of the Maine brethren to have a camp-meeting in this State, I would say to our brethren and sisters, scattered through our State, come: let us rally for the truth. The truth is what makes us free; and if thus made free, we are free indeed. Then of every act and deed we shall have no occasion to be ashamed. Some act just as though they were ashamed of the position they occupy; also, ashamed of those who labor with them in the same cause. If they have not the truth they ought to be ashamed: of truth, never. I am thankful I am not ashamed of a lover of Jesus or his truth; nor of my labors for the truth. My banner is "Love," The Lord help us that this banner may wave over us under all circumstances. "Bear all things; endure all things:" and then "inherit all things." So let every lover of truth rally for our camp-meeting.

Doubtless some of our brethren in other States will come and sound an alarm among the people here. My prayers, my sympathy, and help shall be in unison with the labors and efforts in that direction. Sinners need salvation, and if saved at all it must be by the truth. I am ready to work in harmony for the spread of light and truth, by sending the silent preachers to the starving nations. May the Lord stir up His children to this end, and help us to work together with Him to scatter light and truth.

A Physician and Surgeon, in a prominent city in Pennsylvania, sends us $5 for books and tracts, and writes: I have taken and read the Herald of Life since last summer, with great pleasure and benefit. I see much of the holy Book of God in a different light. I am a firm and true believer in the doctrine of "No life out of Christ." I have read the tract on "Devil, Satan, and Demons" carefully, and felt to say, "God bless Br. Storrs: and may he live long to vindicate the truth as it is in Jesus, and thereby give light to the world lying in darkness." I trust the Herald of Life may be published to the end of time. I give mine all away as fast as I have read them, and many are speaking of subscribing for it soon. I am working hard for it. This is a dark, bigoted place; but I have a number here who see men as trees walking. May the Spirit of true light shine into their hearts that they may see the doctrine of eternal life in Christ in all its beauty and glory. I have given one man the Herald to read till he is soundly converted to the Life views: he is a prominent and official member of the Methodist E. Church, the same of which I also am a member. A class-leader has been appointed to visit me, to talk with me concerning my course in advocating the "dangerous doctrine of no life out of Christ, and the non-revival into life of the wicked dead," etc. He has not yet called, and I have heard he is afraid to broach the subject to me, as he says, I have the Scriptures at my tongue's end and he would be placed in a tight place." No doubt he would be.

I wish we could have one of our able ministers to give us a few sermons on the Life views. I think it would be attended with much good, and also be the means of getting many subscribers for the Herald of Life.

Note by the Editor.—You can have no better preacher than to scatter all the tracts and pamphlets on the subject you can use. Let us know when you want more, and we will supply all we can, with or without money.

The Mormons—Trouble Ahead.

A few days ago we mentioned the fact that William Alexander and David Hyrum, the younger sons of Joseph Smith, the Mormon prophet, were on their way to Salt Lake City to set up the standard of the reorganized or anti-polygamy church. A singular interest attaches to the name of David Hyrum. A few months before Joseph's death he stated that "the man was not born who was to lead this people, but of Emma Smith should be born a son who would succeed in the Presidency after a season of disturbance." Joseph Smith was killed June 27, 1844, and the son, named from his father's direction David Hyrum, was born at the Mansion House in Nauvoo, on the 17th of the succeeding November. This prophecy is secretly dear to thousands of Mormons who are weary of the tyranny of Brigham Young, and yet hold to their faith in Joseph Smith. A few days ago the young men reached Salt Lake City, and soon called upon Brigham Young and announced their intention to organize their church at once, asking permission to defend their faith in Tabernacle, proposing to argue with the Brighamites from the original Mormon books. We have but scant reports of the interview, but it is said to have been very warm. Brigham was very angry at their presumption, and denied them the use of the Tabernacle, sending word at the same time to the bishops to shut them out of the ward meeting houses. The brothers, at one point of the conversation, denied that their father ever practised polygamy, citing their mother's testimony, to which Brigham retorted that their mother "was a liar and had been proven a thief," with much more of the sort. Be it remembered that the lady thus spoken of is the Electa Cyria, or "Elect Lady of God," in Mormon theology, who was the glory of their early history. Like Pope Pagan, of the Pilgrim's Progress, Brigham doubtless gnaws his nails in vain rage that he cannot, as in former times, let loose the vengeance of his Nauvoo Legion upon these sectarians, and crush the rebellion in blood. If his power were now equal to his feelings we should have repeated the story of the Morrisites, when a high civil functionary of Utah led the Legion in broad day to slaughter men and women who had surrendered themselves prisoners. But nothing more than petty persecutions will be attempted at this late day, and we earnestly hope the young men will succeed in their enterprise. Of their religious principles, as opposed to Brighamism, we know little, but recognize in them tolerant men, good citizens and loyal subjects of the United States. —Utah Reporter.

Obituary.

Fell asleep in Jesus, Sunday July 25th, in this city, our excellent brother George Kemp, after years of sore suffering, which he bore with much patience; but which at times made him to say with Job, "O that Thou wouldst hide me in the grave, that Thou wouldst keep me secret till Thy wrath is past, that Thou wouldst appoint me a set time and remember me." Job xiv., 13. Br. Kemp was the youngest but one of a family of seven children—six sons and one daughter. He was in his forty-sixth year at the time of his death, and the first of the seven to go into the grave. He early embraced the Life views, as did his only sister and nearly all of his brothers. All of them have been our firm friends from our first knowledge of them, now about twenty years. All the survivors live in this city or immediate vicinity and were present at his funeral, to whom we spoke words of comfort and encouragement, as the Lord gave us liberty. We did not talk of "going to heaven," but of our brother's "rest from his labors"—sorrows, sufferings of all kinds, and from his "works of faith and labor of love;" and that he was "blessed," because he had "died in the Lord," and hence had died under the promise and pledge of a resurrection "at the last day," when Christ, our Life-giver, "shall descend from heaven with a shout, and with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God;" then "the dead in Christ shall rise first, and we who are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air; so shall we ever be with the Lord." We endeavored to obey the Apostle's injunction to "Comfort one another with these words," and not with traditionary notions about disembodied spirits going to a ghostly world. "I will raise him up at the last day" is our Lord's promise, and we believe it.

Fell asleep in Jesus, at Trumansburg, N. Y., July 31st, Maria, wife of Eld. A. Guthrie, aged 51 years, 7 months and 2 days, after an illness of seven years, which she bore patiently, maintaining faith in the promise and power of God in Christ that he would raise her up "at the last day."

Thus one after another of the loved ones of earth go to rest; but they shall "stand in their lot at the end of the days," when Christ our Life-Giver shall return from heaven in his glory: then shall those who sleep in Jesus awake to die no more, and "are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection." Then shall mortality be swallowed up of life: this "vile body shall be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body." O how changed! May the Lord help us so to live that we shall be the subjects of the resurrection from the dead, and thus be delivered from the power of death, and receive eternal life in Jesus our Lord.

James H. Jacobs.

Note by the Editor.—Our dear Br. Guthrie has our sympathy. We know him well as one of the salt of the earth, and we doubt not he finds God's grace sufficient for him in this hour of trial. The quiet sleep of his beloved wife will not be long. Jesus will soon appear in His glory, and death—the tyrant death—will fall beneath His sword. With that "key of death and hades," He has obtained by going down under death, He will unlock the prison-house where the saints of God sleep, and call them forth to eternal liberty. "He openeth and no man shutteth; and shutteth and no man openeth." He opens the gates of death to none but His friends. His enemies will "remain in the congregation of the dead." Jesus will not let loose his enemies; they are "holden with the cords of their sins." Thank the Lord, such will appear no more forever: they have no part in the resurrection life. All such life is eternal.

Died, suddenly, in this city, Emma L., daughter of the late Isaac M. and Esther Tyson, in the 26th year of her age.

The Editor of this paper spoke at the funeral on the brevity of this life, the importance of improving the time to secure a future one, and the means by which it can be secured; and that it is only reached through a resurrection from the dead "at the last day."

Worlds on Fire:

Huge Blazing Orbs of Fire Flying Through the Realms of Space.

On the 12th of May, 1866, a great conflagration, infinitely larger than that of London or Moscow, was announced. To use the expression of a distinguished astronomer, a world was found to be on fire. A star, which till then had shone meekly and unobtrusively in the Corona Borealis, suddenly blazed up into a luminary of the second magnitude. In the course of three days from its discovery in this new character by Mr. Birmingham, at Tuam, it had declined to the third or even fourth order of brilliancy. In twelve days, dating from its first apparition in the Irish heavens, it had sunk to the eight rank, and it went on waning until the 26th of June, when it ceased to be discernible except through the medium of the telescope. This was a remarkable, though certainly not an unprecedented proceeding on the part of a star; but one singular circumstance in its behavior was that, after the lapse of nearly two months, it began to blaze up again, though not with equal ardor, and after maintaining its glow for a few weeks and passing through sundry phases of color, it gradually paled its fires and returned to its former insignificance.

How many years had elapsed since this awful conflagration actually took place it would be presumptuous to guess; but it must be remembered that news from the heavens, though carried by the fleetest of messengers, light, reach us long after the event has transpired, and that the same celestial courier is still dropping the tidings at each station it reaches in space, untill it sinks exhausted by the length of its flight. Now when this object was examined, as it was, promptly and eagerly by Prof. Miller and Mr. Huggins, they found to their great wonder that it yielded two spectra—the one imposed upon the other, though obviously independent. There was the prismatic ribbon, crossed by dark lines, which belongs to the sun and stars generally, but there was another in which four bright lines figured; and these according to the canons of interpretation previously mentioned, indicated that some luminous gas (or gases) was also pouring out its light from the surface of the orb.

Two of the lines spelled out hydrogen in the spectral language. What the other two signified did not then appear; but, inasmuch as those four streaks were brighter than the rest of the spectrum, the source from which they came must obviously have been more intensely heated than the underlying parts, or photosphere, from which the normal stellar light proceeded. And as the star had suddenly flamed up, was it not a natural supposition that it had become enwrapped in burning hydrogen, which, in consequence of some great convulsion, had been liberated in prodigious quantities, and then combining with other elements, had set this hapless world on fire? In such a fierce conflagration the combustible gas would soon be consumed, and the glow would, therefore, begin to decline, subject as in this case, to a second eruption, which occasioned the renewed outburst of light on the 20th August.

By such a catastrophe it is not wholly impossible that our own globe may some time be ravaged, for if a word from the Almighty were to unloose for a few moments the bonds of affinity which unite the elements of water—of the ocean on the land and the moisture in the air—a single spark would bring them together with a fury which would kindle the funeral pyre of the human race, and be fatal to the planet and all the works that are therein. It cannot but be a startling fact for us that in yonder doomed and distant world we have, probably, seen in our own day a realization of the fearful picture sketched by Peter, "when the heavens (or atmosphere) being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat." And if we regard it as the centre of a system, it is impossible to think without horror of the fate of the numerous globes around it when overwhelmed by this sudden deluge of light and caloric.—British Quarterly Review.

Camp-Meeting in Maine.

There will be a camp-meeting in North Herman, Me., in James Emmerson's grove, east side of the Euenew road, to commence, Sept. 13, and hold over the Sabbath. We hope there will be one more general gathering of the brethren in Maine. Come with your tents, and bedding. Board and provisions can be obtained, for man or beast, on or near the ground at reasonable rates. Those coming from the west, by boat or railroad, should come to Bangor. The distance from Bangor to the camp-ground is five or six miles, and there will probably be conveyances. The preaching Brn., who may come by boat or railroad, should write Liberty Wetherbee, Bangor, who will see them forwarded to the camp-ground. This meeting is to be a free one, without regard to sect or party; there will be no dictating to brethren what they shall preach, or shall not preach; but it will be left with them and the Lord.

Now Brn. and Sisters, come in the Spirit and with the understanding, come to labor for God; come to greet one another again; and if we cannot all see "eye to eye" now, we will labor on till we all come into the unity of the Faith.

Note by the Editor.—It gives us pleasure to see the spirit with which our brethren in Maine propose to conduct their camp-meeting. This narrow contracted spirit, which cannot or will not allow one to preach who does not harmonize with them in all things, we abhor with an abhorrence which words cannot express. It is the very spirit of antichrist. But its day of doom is at hand.

We wish it were in our power to be with our noble Maine friends at their gathering; but our duties prevent it and confine us here at our post.

A Swedenborgian named Parker is attracting some notice in Toronto by the relation of his curious spiritual experiences. He declares that he was taken up into Heaven, which is divided into zones like the earth. The frigid zone is peopled by Unitarians, who wear lions' skins on their heads, tigers' skins on their bodies, and bears' skins on their feet, and ride in chariots of ice drawn by horses without any tails.

Mr. Parker's description would seem to have been perfect if he had also seen such fanatics as himself riding without any clothing except fools' caps on their heads, and in chariots of dust drawn by very "long eared" animals which need not be named, with seven heads and ten tails.

A Petersburg correspondent of the "Daily News" is the first to make us acquainted with a great ecclesiastical revolution which has just been effected in Russia by a stroke of the Emperor's pen. Hitherto the ministerial or priestly office in the Russo-Greek Church has been hereditary; it will be so no longer. It became so about the time of Peter the Great; and as marriage is almost as indispensable to a Russian priest as celibacy to a Roman one, it has ever since been increasing it numbers and poverty, until it became the chief business of the bishops to devise means for feeding the inferior clergy; and the church was simply an institution for providing for the wants of those hereditarily attached to its service. The priesthood was never recruited from the ranks of the rich and the educated, and its degradation was necessarily constant.

The British government has arranged to purchase all the telegraph lines in the country for $30,000,000, and will work them hereafter for the public on the plan of the post-office. The number of telegraph stations will immediately be doubled—every money-order office will be a station, and a message dropped in any letter-box or pillar-box will be taken by the postman to the nearest telegraph station and dispatched. There is to be a uniform charge of one shilling for twenty words, whatever the distance. The government will soon see their way to further reductions. We shall come to the day of penny telegrams as well as penny letters.

"ARISE, SHINE."

PALESTINE is waking now,
Light upon her matin brow:
And her people heaven-inspired,
Starting on their glorious way,
See the day so long desired,
Dawn—the bright, the promised day.
Still for her salvation praying,
Time was but their hopes delaying.

Listen to her murm'ring rills,
Listen to her hoary hills,
Listen to that voice which spake,
To Abram, Father, Prince and Friend,
Bade him Terah's tents forsake,
And hitherward his footsteps bend.
Look backward o'er four thousand years,
Remember joy, glory and tears.

Hail! the promise God has given,
From his throne in yon bright heaven,
Of inheritance for thee
In this blest and goodly land;
Its restoration thou shalt see,
His word fulfilled to Abraham;
Given four thousand years ago,
Before thy glory and thy woe.

Speed from every hill and mountain,
Speed from every grove and fountain;
Come from Russia far and drear
Come from Afric's burning sun,
Come from plains of India, sere,
Where rivers over diamonds run;
Come from every tribe and station,
The people of God's chosen nation.

Peace o'er thee shall fold her wings,
Peace! her light and joy shall fling
O'er thy ancient hills and plains,
O'er thy temples and thy shrines,
O'er a people now unchained;
No longer to a Saviour blind,
And He, whom thou rejected—See
Will now thy glorious Ruler be.

Look forward—what a joyous sight!
Ages to come shall know no blight.
But in the glory of thy course
Thy sun shall have no accident,
But ever luminous with joys
Shall be a living orient;
And free from sorrow, tell thy story,
And shine forever bathed in glory.

SING, THE CHINAMAN.

A LADY who has lived in the mountains of California relates the following incidents of a miner in whom she became interested:

"Sing was no more to us than any Chinaman in our employ, until he was injured by a fall. While running off the waste dirt, he fell with the car some sixty feet, over the dump, and was taken up for dead.

"As he slowly recovered, Mr. C. used to visit him to bathe his bruised back, and frequently carried him little delicacies which I had prepared.

"He never was able to do heavy work again, and the foreman was instructed to give him outside jobs adapted to his strength.

"As soon as he was well enough to leave his cabin, he would come and walk before our house, and seemed so pleased when I smiled upon him that I soon made his acquaintance. He offered to cook, wash, and iron for me, to do indeed, any kind of work I would allow him to undertake: and not satisfied to show his gratitude in this manner, he brought me a beautiful Chinese dressing-case for which the poor fellow had sent to San Francisco, having saved his earnings for I do not know how long, to purchase it. I felt as though I could not accept what had cost him so many days' labor, but knew it would well nigh break his heart if I should refuse it, however good might be my reason for doing so.

"Soon after the advent of our little Jimmie, we sent for Sing, who was some distance away. His wonder and delight were unbounded when he saw the babe. He begged to take it, and handled it with the utmost gentleness and care.

"He made the child frequent presents, and among them a chain of gold for his neck.

"At last, after his short life of ten months, we folded our dear Jimmie's hands in the sleep of death. Sing shared our bitter grief. He went into the cellar and refused to eat. He wept and showed a heartfelt sympathy in many ways. 'Oh,' said he, 'Jimmie was a sweet little boy. I love him so much. You cry too much, Missy; so much cry no good, make your head ache.'

"It is the idolatrous custom among the Chinese to feed their dead, once in three months. In San Francisco they expend thousands of dollars for this purpose. They have meats nicely roasted, the most expensive cake, and other costly viands, to place around the graves of their friends.

"Some time after our bereavement, Sing came to me and said, earnestly, 'Little Jimmie very hungry.' When he saw my tears he apologized, and needed no other reproof, for he never referred to the subject again.

"Early in the fall Mr. C. was seriously injured in the mines, and Sing was much affected by the accident. Again he went into the cellar, and remained a day and a half, refusing food until I would partake of it.

"When he saw me making preparations for spending the winter in Marysville, he said, "Missy will go to New York, then bossy (meaning Mr. C.) will go too; then you not come back, nobody care for me, then. Me go with you; me want little money, you give me clothes, and me work for you.'

"He was very desirous to learn the English language, and mastered the alphabet in a half day, I think. I was gladly anticipating the time when I could communicate gospel truths to his dark mind, but duty called me away. I still hope to send for him, and to be able to instruct him in the knowledge of the true God and the Saviour of sinners."

My dear young friends, the faithfulness and gratitude of Sing, the Chinaman, will doubtless touch your hearts and suggest some practical lessons. It teaches not only the power of kindness and beauty of gratitude, but puts to shame the lukewarmness of our zeal for that Almighty Friend, who is not only showing us kindness every hour of our present lives, but has opened up a way for all who would secure an eternal life.

Can you doubt that if Sing could be now convinced of these truths, we are so well acquainted with, that he would be so indifferent as we? Would he not in the depth of his gratitude give all, and work without wearying, for One who had done so much for him?

Be earnest, dear children, not only to secure an eternal inheritance for yourselves, but to show your gratitude to our divine Redeemer in aiding others to acquire a knowledge of Him who gave "his beloved Son that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish but have everlasting life." Also remember the dark places of the earth, and pray that the Son of righteousness may speedily arise upon them, and thus the kingdoms of this world become the kingdoms of our Lord's dear Son.

Yours, devoutly wishing for this consummation. E. BENNETT.

THAT TEXT.

"ALL that are in" (hades? No, but mnemeiois, or secure places) "the graves shall hear his voice and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of" life! "Stop," says the objector, "Jesus did not say that the wicked would be raised to life." I know it; but you declare that John v., 28, 29, teaches that all men will live again. Christ's words are right words. He failed to say life when speaking of dead sinners. You say life. Every time Jesus has it "damnation," you will have it life. John iii., 36, declares, they "shall not see life;" and Jesus declares, John vi., 53, "Ye have no life in you." Verse 57, He says, "I live by the Father, so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me."

There is the law of the natural life: it is an inexorable law. None enter this world except they are begotten and born. There is also "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus." None enter the world to come, or live again, except they are begotten and born. In order to be begotten it is necessary that the seed or bread of heaven should be planted in our minds; that it should be watered and nourished until it takes entire possession, and reigns without a rival. Then the man becomes precious in the sight of God. He is not thrown away like an abortion, or driven away like the wicked; but "hath hope in his death." Like Job he is hid by the Lord in the "secure places, where precious things are stored up and preserved." God has taken a great deal of pains to perfect character, and would not be willing to lose his labor. "He will have a desire to the work of his hands," and bring the man into being again: give him a new birth. Will you please find one text in the Bible which says that the unholy dead shall live again? You will doubtless agree with me, that if it be true, it is a most solemn and awful truth, and should be supported by at least one positive declaration from God's holy book; then we would gladly accept of your inferential texts. "Well, there is the word resurrection: that means life." We answer, No. If it did, Christ would not have added to it the words "of life." Once more, you say, "'all that are in the graves shall hear his voice.' Dead men cannot hear, therefore, they must be made alive." To which we answer, That if they are in their graves they are dead, they are dust; and dust can hear as well as dry bones. Ezek. xxxvii., 4. And when the dust shall hear the voice of the Son of God it will form into a man, who will be thrown by the power of God into the open air; ("He that was dead came forth bound hand and foot"); he will breathe, live, come forth to the resurrection of life. First, the dust hears. Second, a man appears. Third, life is given Fourth, he is all right, "being a child of the resurrection." Luke xx., 36.

NEW YORK, Aug., 1869.

FROM O. F. YALE.

BR. STORRS: I am not accustomed to write for the papers, but I love the letters in the HERALD OF LIFE, and I desire to say so; and if my letter is not worth a place in the paper, you can even put it in the fire.

The instructive communications of the Elders and preaching brethren are just what I need; and I think, with others, that next to God's word, the HERALD is one of the best aids to a growth in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

The communication of "E. R. O." in July 14, was such an almost perfect picture of my own experience and feelings, that I shouted, "Glory to God," when I read it. Why, such a letter as that, to one who can understand it, is worth more than tongue can tell: I say, "to one that can understand it;" for, I can recollect a time when I could no more have understood it than I could a language that I had never learned: for, "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

I like, yes, I love the spirit manifested in the letters of those who are "searching after" truth. I was for a time unable to receive that which is now as clear as the light of God's glorious sun to my natural vision; but I could not see the necessity of such feeling among brethren as I have known exhibited by those who differ in opinion on this point.

To Brethren M. M. Eastman, Jay Francis, and others who have not attained unto the "full, unclouded vision," I would say, "We shall know, if we follow on to know the Lord:" Hosea vi., 3. I thank God that I have followed on to know, and that I have been enabled to receive the truth; and, O, what a glorious truth. Brethren, is the reliving of the wicked dead a proper subject of hope? I do not see how it can be, unless there is "probation" after. Paul says, "believing all things that are written in the law and the prophets" (where in the law or the prophets is it written, that dead sinners shall have a revival into life?) "and have hope toward God, which they themselves also allow, that there shall be," etc. Acts xxiv., 14, 15. Can any one hope that his fellow creatures, that have died "out of Christ," will be raised to life to be tormented for a period and then die again? It seems to me, that such a hope would be an evidence of not having the Spirit of Christ. Then, I think, Paul must have referred to the "Pharisees hope," or belief, as covering and allowing his, although they went beyond.

I judge Paul explains himself, Rom. viii., 11; and, if it is by the "Spirit of him that raised up Jesus," dwelling in them, that the mortal bodies of believers are to be quickened, is there not the strongest kind of an inference, that only those will be quickened? Paul "counted all things but loss . . . if by any means he may attain to a resurrection from the dead." Phil. iii., 11. If all have this resurrection, where is the point? "It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body," 1 Corth. xv., 42–44. If raised, it is incorruptible, and cannot die any more. Luke xx., 36. I do not see how believers in the resurrection of the wicked can avoid one or the other of these conclusions, viz.: Eternal torment, or probation, and a final restoration.

Some have gone back to the first; more are going on to the second.

Is there a threatening of a re-living of the wicked?

If there is, it is undoubtedly contained in John v., 28, 29. Now the question comes up, Did Jesus here contradict Jesus in Luke xx., 35, 36? He shows the subjects, and the cause of the resurrection; John vi., 39, 40, 44 and 54; also, chap. xi., 25.

I am told, the word translated "graves," John v., is not hades, and does not necessarily signify the "state of the dead." If this is so, then our translation has given us an incorrect impression, and the "apparent" contradiction proves not to be real, and the strongest support of the doctrine of "a resurrection to the wicked" vanishes like the dew.

But if it relates to a literal resurrection of the dead, may we not let John, the "commentator," explain John, the "recorder?" "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death." 1 John iii., 14.

"He that hath the Son, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life." chap. v., 12. John the Baptist testifies, "He that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." John iii., 36.

These texts in John v., prove the resurrec- of the wicked, in just the same way that Matth. xxv., 45 proves the eternal torment of the wicked: "These shall go away into everlasting punishment, but the righteous into life eternal." But the mode of punishment implied, is the opposite of life; and Paul, the commentator, says, "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi., 23.

John v. says, "They that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation" (or, condemnation), which condemnation is, as we have seen, "not to see life," "not have life," "abide in death."

These texts for a long time stood between me and the belief in "no future life except to those who have the "Spirit of him that raised up Christ from the dead."

But these considerations, and the best light I could get with regard to the "divine plan" of redemption, have led me to believe there is "no contradiction," but a "glorious harmony" in all.

Turn to Rev. i, 18. Why the symbol of "keys" to unlock and take out believers from death and hades, if all were to come out? Would not the "headsman's axe" and "executioner's implements" be more in accordance with the end to be accomplished, namely, the executing the penalty of the second death, on those not his?

Finally, dear brethren and sisters, all, let us have fervent charity (love) among ourselves. If we may not all see "eye to eye" now, it is no reason why we should not have the spirit of "our elder Brother," by which all our weakness and infirmity of vision will be lost in a glorious and eternal perfection in his kingdom. Amen.

TERRYVILLE, CONN., July, 1869.

FORGIVENESS.

AMONG the duties of Christian parents, there is none plainer than that of telling their children, even the very little ones, of God's forgiveness of their sins for Christ's sake. We should tell them of the loving Saviour, the children's Saviour, who died for them, to purchase forgiveness of the very sins for which their fathers and mothers, with sorrowful hearts are obliged to punish them.

We should try, in training our children, to imagine ourselves in their position, remember how we felt in similar circumstances, make allowance for the difference in feeling at different ages, and thus always temper our justice with mercy.

As soon as a child knows how to do wrong and be sorry for it, he can understand the sweetness of being forgiven, and that is the time to talk to him of Christ's pardoning love. The surest way to bring him to a perfect comprehension of this, is by exercising forgiveness ourselves in the right way. Christ never holds back for fear of forgiving too easily. He does not wait for the penitent to come all the way to him, but goes to meet him with open arms, as soon as he sees the first longing for forgiveness. He knows the human heart, how easily it is discouraged and turned away from the right, and he pities his erring children with a fulness of pity which we, at best, can but poorly imitate.—American Messenger.

THE SUN AND EARTH.

CURIOUS INFLUENCE: A MAGNETIC STORM.

ON September 1, 1869, shortly before noon, two astronomers—Messrs. Hodgson and Carrington—one at Oxford, the other in London, were at the same instant scrutinizing a large group of sun spots. On a sudden, two intensely bright patches of light appeared in front of the cluster. So brilliant were they that the observers thought the darkening screens attached to their telescopes must have become fractured. But this was found not to be the case. The bright spots indicated some process going on upon the sun's surface —a process of such activity that within five minutes the spots travelled over a space of nearly thirty-four thousand miles.

Now, at the Kew Observatory there are self-registering magnetic insturments which indicate the processes of change by which the subtle influences of terrestrial magnetism wax and wane. At one time the line traced by the pointer will be marked by scarcely perceptible iundulations, indicating the almost quiescent state of the great terrestrial magnet. At another, well marked waves along the line exhibit the pulsations of the magnetic system, influenced in a manner as yet unintelligible to the physicist. And then there is a third form of disturbance—the sharp, sudden jerk of the pointer exhibiting the occurrence of those mysterious phenomena termed "magnetic storms." When the records of the Kew Observatory came to be looked over, it was found that at the very instant in which the brilliant spots of light had appeared to Messrs. Hodgson and Carrington, the self-registering instruments had been subjected to the third and most significant form of disturbance—a magnetic storm began, in fact, as the light broke out on the sun's surface. But this was not the only evidence of the sympathy with which the earth responded to the solar action. It was subsequently found that soon after the spots of light had appeared, the whole frame of earth had thrilled under a mysterious magnetic influence.

At the West Indies, in South America, in Australia, wherever magnetic observations are systematically made, the observers had the same story to tell. In the telegraph stations at Washington and Philadelphia, the signalmen received strong electric shocks. In Norway, telegraphic machinery was set on fire. The pen of Bain's telegraph was followed by a flame. And wherever telegraphic wires were in action, well-marked indications of disturbance presented themselves. Even this, however, was not all. The great magnetic storm was not a mere instantaneous electric throe. Hours passed before the disturbed earth resumed its ordinary state. And thus it happened that in nearly all parts of the earth night fell while the storm was yet in progress.

During the night magnificent auroras spread their wavering streamers over the sky, both in the Northern and Southern Hemispheres. As the disturbed needle vibrated, the colored streamers waved responsive, and it was only when the magnetic storm was subsiding that the auroral lights faded from the heavens. Now it is evident that these phenomena show the most intimate relation between these peculiar disturbances in the sun and the magnetic currents of our own earth. Directly one of these changes takes place upward of 90,000,000 of miles away, the electric condition of our planet is changed in some mysterious way, of which our instruments, and even the condition of our sky bear record. The pens of all our telegraphic wires may some day trace in flame a handwriting more ominous of human destiny than was the handwriting which during Belshazzar's feast traced a warning on the wall of the fall of the Babylonian dynasty. Moreover, note this, that these changes in the condition of the sun take place at intervals of about eleven years. The variable star which swings round it, as well as supplying us with light, and heat, and (apparently) magnetism, clouds over every eleven years these spots, so that it seems most likely that every eleven years certain magnetic conditions recur which have not occurred in the interval. If so, perhaps the magnetic excitement of 1859 will recur, and it may be in much greater force next year —in 1870; and if it does, how are we to say what may or may not occur with it?

Even now one such epoch of magnetic storm seems to be thought pretty near at hand. The sun has been lately exhibiting the most surprising forms of disturbance, and presenting to scientific eyes less "fixity" of essence than ever. Spots so vast that we must estimate their dimensions by millions of square miles have broken out from time to time, and have presented rapid changes of figure, indicating the action of forces of inconceivable intensity. Clusters of smaller spots extending over yet vaster areas, have exhibited every form of disturbance known to the solar physicist, and every degree of light, from the apparent blackness (in reality only relative) of the nuclei, to the intense brilliancy of the faculous ridges. And we now know that these appearances are not merely matters for the curious, with which, as they happen at a distance of above ninety millions of miles, practical men need not concern themselves.—London Spectator.

SELECTIONS FROM WHATELY.

"THE question, What religion is true? and the question as to the way in which the professors of a religion we deem to be false should be treated, are often confounded."

"It should never be forgotten that He who declared He could have called in the aid of more than twelve legions of angels, and to whom all power was given in heaven and in earth, sent forth His disciples not to subjugate or to coerce, but to 'teach all nations.'"

"Men too often employ that violence in the cause of what they believe to be Divine truth, which Jesus Himself and His Apostles expressly forbade in the cause of what they knew to be divine truth."

"The distinction between a civil or political right on the one hand, and a moral right on the other, is of incalculable importance. By rights of conscience is to be understood, not necessarily that every one is right in the religion that he adopts, but that his neighbors have no right to interfere with his right. A man has a right—not necessarily a moral right, but a civil right—to worship God according to his conscience, without suffering any hardship at the hand of his neighbor for so doing."

"As no tree is withered by the frost of the polar regions, or by the scorching winds of the Arabian deserts, because none can exist in those regions; so there is no actual persecution in those countries where persecution has done its work, in crushing and preventing all resistance to religious error. Therefore, the absence of the infliction does not imply the absence of the spirit of persecution."

"Persecution is not wrong because it is cruel; but it is cruel because it is wrong."

"As a narrow or a larger room is equally a prison if a man is forced to remain confined in it; so the narrowing or the enlarging the bounds of orthodoxy does not constitute the absence or the presence of persecution."

"A man cannot be said to be at liberty, or to exercise his own judgment, if another, however rightly, decide for him; if he is not left to himself to take which side of an alternative he thinks fit. To say that religious liberty does not imply irreligious liberty, is to say of a person that he is at liberty to remain within the walls of a prison, but not at liberty to leave it."

"All men wish to have truth on their side; but few to be on the side of truth."

"Men miss truth more often from their indifference about it, than from intellectual incapacity."

"Falsehood, like the dry rot, flourishes the more in proportion as air and light are excluded."

"The judgment is like a pair of scales, and evidences like the weights; but the will holds the balance in its hand; and even a slight jerk will be sufficient, in many cases, to make the lighter scale appear the heavier."

"Some persons follow the dictates of their conscience, only in the same sense in which a coachman may be said to follow the horses he is driving."

"When people have resolved to shut their eyes, or to look only on one side, it is of little consequence how good their eyes may be."

"Though not always called upon to condemn ourselves, it is always safe to suspect ourselves."

"We should study to be wise, not above Scripture, but in Scripture; to learn, not the things which God has concealed, but what he has revealed."

"He who would desire to have an accurate description of party-spirit, need only go through Paul's description of Charity, reversing every point in the detail.

THE ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

PROPOSITION TO UNITE THE GREEK AND CATHOLIC CHURCHES.

IT is currently reported in Catholic circles that a proposition is to be made before the coming Ecumenical council, to unite the Greek and Catholic Churches, on the ground that they are one in doctrine, and that their disciplinary differences can be reconciled by means of mutual concessions. It is well known among theologians that the principal obstacles to the union of these churches were in relation to the filioque in the creed or the procession of the Holy Spirit from the first and second Persons of the Blessed Trinity, and to the supremacy of the Pope; but in all else, the two churches are one in doctrine and usages. A Cardinal will publish the distinctive peculiarities of the Greek Church before the Council. Should this union be effected Catholicity will suddenly receive an accession of sixty millions of converts.

IF family religion were duly attended to and properly discharged, I think the preaching of the Word would not be the common instrument of conversion.—Richard Baxter.

BAD men are made the same use of as scaffolds; they are employed as means to erect a building and then are taken down and burned.—Cecil.

THE most ridiculous of all animals is a proud priest; he cannot use his own tools without cutting his own fingers.—Lacon.

SIX SERMONS on the Inquiry. Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a sermon on Christ the LIFE-GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidels. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER: OR, MAN IN DEATH; AND THE HOPE FOR A FUTURE LIFE.—A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD; OR, THE RIGHTEOUS ONLY WILL LIVE AGAIN. BY GEO. STORRS. Price 20 cents. Postage 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.—This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the EDITOR of the HERALD OF LIFE. Price $1. Postage 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death—3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.—Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. POST D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEO. STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents. Postage 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. POST, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. POST took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The Argument from Nature;" and second—" the Argument from the Scripture." The first of these appeared in The New Englander of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

BIBLE VS. TRADITION: in which the true teachings of the BIBLE is manifested: showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Price, bound, $1. Postage 16 cents. In paper covers, 70 cents. Postage 6 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help to understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

NATURAL IMMORTALITY.

DEAR SIR: Entirely agreeing with your opinion, as expressed on the cover of the July number of the Rainbow, that it is inexpedient indefinitely to prolong the discussion on this subject, and the closely related one of the final destiny of the lost, I feel some reluctance to return to it. At the same time, however, it is not, I apprehend, for the interests of truth that the skilfully constructed objections of Mr. Jukes against my doctrine should remain unnoticed; I therefore beg your kind insertion of the following brief remarks.

That Mr. Jukes and myself should differ as widely as we do, on this and many other subjects, can scarcely be wondered at, when we take into account the fact that we interpret Scripture on very different principles. Mr. Jukes is a subtle Mystic; I am, and trust ever to remain, a simple Literalist. Judging not only from his letter in the Rainbow, but also from other writings, it seems to me that his rule is never to accept Scripture in its natural and literal sense, if it be possible to put upon it one more recondite. With me, on the contrary, the rule is never to depart from the natural and literal sense unless absolutely compelled to do so. Is it then strange that we should differ? But in dealing with Mr. Jukes' objections, I labor under the additional disadvantage of having to defend the weakest points in my theory which his keen eyes can detect, while I have little opportunity of retaliating. I am, as it were, in the open, while he lies in ambush. His criticism is only destructive, and we all know how much easier it is to break our neighbor's windows than to prevent our own being broken. Certainly, as far as his book, "The Second Death and the Restitution of all Things" is concerned, there has been a very fair amount of damage done; which, at least to my knowledge, has not been repaired.

To see, however, what I can do in the case of my own windows. Mr. Jukes wishes, in the first place, for "a clear definition" of the terms, "by nature" and "an immortal being." I will endeavor to oblige him. By the term, "by nature," then, I mean as essentially constituted at creation; and by the term "an immortal being," I mean a being who must exist for ever, or who is incapable of death. Mr. Jukes, indeed, asserts that these two latter definitions "are clearly not the same." All that I can say is that the distinction between them certainly appears to me a distinction without a difference. But when he goes on to say, "a creature may exist forever who is by no means incapable of dying," he substitutes quite another definition. Between "a being who must exist forever," and "a being who may exist forever," there is both a distinction and a difference. That God could sustain a mortal creature in unending existence, I neither have denied nor would for a moment deny; but where has God said he will do so? That in the case of even the most wicked of mankind, he will do so for the purpose of endlessly tormenting him, is a most awful supposition. Yet if the Bible be true, and God does so sustain any human soul out of Christ, it assuredly will be for that purpose. So far I quite agree with Mr. Strong. I have said, and now deliberately repeat the statement, that if it can once be proved to me that man is essentially immortal, or, I will add, that God has revealed his determination to sustain him, in his fallen state, in unending existence, I shall feel compelled at once to accept the doctrine of eternal torment as the plain teaching of the New Testament.

So far, however, from God having intimated anything of the kind, he has, on the contrary, distinctly declared that the existence of the lost shall be terminated forever in the lake of fire, which is the second death, in which he will destroy both body and soul. But, objects Mr. Jukes, "death is not annihilation." Who ever said it was? Who cares a straw whether it is or not? When an animal dies is it annihilated? No; but as an animal it ceases to exist. When man's body dies is it annihilated? No; but as a body it very soon ceases to exist. When man's whole being shall become the subject of the second death, will it be annihilated? Perhaps not; but as a living, conscious, intelligent person, he will cease to exist. What more does it concern us to know? To bring in "annihilation" is a poor unworthy quibble. Yes, "death" in its dread consummation "is non-existence." I do not shrink from the definition; Mr. Jukes' spiritualizing has not shaken my conviction in the least. For what is his definition of death? It is "only dissolution or separation; a separation from the world which, until that death, the spirit has lived in." But how will this apply to the death of animals, from which doubtless, as I showed in my reply to Mr. Strong, man's original idea of death was derived; was that only a separation from the world in which they had previously lived? Or how does it apply to the death of man's body? Is that "only a separation?" Is it not also a dissolution and destruction? Does it not cease to exist? But, objects my opponent, "Was Adam's death, in the day he sinned, annihilation?" I answer, Adam did not die on the day he sinned. All that is really implied in the threatening, "In the day that thou eatest thereof, dying thou shalt die," is, that from the day in which he sinned, Adam was judicially and virtually dead. His life—all the life he had—was forfeit. He was henceforth under sentence of death—the subject, the heir, the son of death. But again, "When Adam's spirit died to God, was it annihilated?" I answer again, his spirit did not, in the true and proper sense, die. "Is our death in trespasses and sins annihilation?" I answer once more, when the apostle Paul speaks of the unrenewed man as "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. ii., 1), he speaks metaphorically; but such a metaphorical use of language by no means implies that it has no real and literal meaning. Even so we ourselves speak of a religious recluse as "dead to the world;" or a shameless wretch as "dead to all sense of shame," without at all confounding this with the literal sense in which it speaks of "a dead man," or "a dead animal." As I said in my reply to Mr. Strong, "the literal fact is ever the substance of which the metaphor is the projected shadow."

But I pass on to notice what Mr. Jukes evidently regards as the trap in which he has fairly caught me. If, as I stated in answer to Mr. Strong, "Man dies by a double death, the first affecting only the body, but the second involving the extinction of the entire being," Mr. Jukes inquires if I "mean that the first death is that which takes place when the body dies?" He will admit that at least I do not attempt to evade the legitimate consequence of my statement when I answer—Yes! For now comes the difficulty. "Do I then really overlook man's awful spiritual death?' "If I rightly understand Mr. Maude's definition of Adam's death, the spiritual death in which we are through sin is no part of it; for 'the first death,' he says, 'affects only the body; the second death involves the extinction of the entire being.' Where, then, does he place man's spiritual death? Under which of his divisions can he put it? Is it part of the first or of the second death? It cannot be of the first, for 'the first,' he says, 'affects only the body.' Nor can it be a part of the second, for 'the second death involves the extinction of the entire being.'" This objection is very ingenious; yet I must point out one little inaccuracy in Mr. Jukes' quotation of my words, which inaccuracy, slight as it may appear, affords as I apprehend the key to unlock the difficulty suggested. Mr. Jukes says, "Here are his words: 'The death which Adam actually incurred was death in the proper and ordinary acceptation of the word,'" etc. No, I beg pardon; here are my words: "The death which Adam was threatened with in case of disobedience, and which he actually incurred, was death in the proper and ordinary acceptation of the word." The words I have italicized, though twice repeated, Mr. Jukes has omitted! Now, while I fully admit and believe much of what is ordinarily included under the term "spiritual death," i. e., separation from God, the loss of such original righteousness as Adam possessed, and the darkening and paralyzing of that highest element of man's nature, the spirit, which certainly existed in him, though only in a rudimental and germinal state; I nevertheless deny that this formed any part of the death with which Adam was threatened in case of disobedience. And I do so on this twofold ground. (1.) That we find the sentence of death pronounced on man as a fallen, and not as an unfallen being; that is to say, after he had eaten of the forbidden tree, and consequently when he was already in a state of "spiritual death." The terms of the sentence, "dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return" (Gen. iii., 19), being just the divine explanation of the original threatening, "dying, thou shalt die" (Gen. ii., 17). (2). Because as "spiritual death" is confessedly a perpetuated condition of sinfulness, a death in trespasses and sins, if this was not the inevitable consequences of the fall, but a punishment inflicted by God, which might not otherwise have followed, it will appear that God actually punished sin with sin, and is therefore, in a certain awful sense, the author of the sin of all Adam's descendants who are born in this state of "spiritual death." I may add, that Adam being, even before the fall, a "soulish," in contradistinction to a "spiritual" being, "of the earth earthy," as the apostle plainly teaches us in 1 Cor., xv., it is not to be supposed that he could have comprehended such an idea as that of "spiritual death," had it formed any part of the original threatening. Strangely but delusively bright are the colors in which theologians have painted the spiritual condition and dignity of the unfallen Adam; the fact, is, however, that he was great in the undeveloped possibilities of his nature rather than in aught besides, and that we must after all regard him as but the frail clay image of a divine archetype to come.

And now, I think, it is my turn to suggest a little difficulty. Mr. Jukes holds that man is the subject of many deaths; even a Christian "is capable of dying several deaths." Yet, both in his book and in this letter, he lays much stress and attaches no little importance to the "second death," of which mention is made in the book of Revelation. Mr. Jukes, moreover, admits that this is the last death of which any mention is made in Scripture—all the other deaths, whatever their number, must have preceded it. I ask, then, in relation to which of these preceding deaths is it denominated "the second?" for plainly it cannot be in relation to all of them. Mr. Jukes has answered this question: "The second death, if I err not, is the second death the spirit dies, its first death being to God; its second death being to God's opposite, sin." But how can this be, since the death of the body, at all events, intervenes between them? Does he really overlook man's literal bodily death, the death which is beyond all question included in the words, "dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return?" I unhesitatingly assert, on the contrary, that "the second death" is so denominated in relation to the death of the body, and I base this assertion on the significant fact that in the twentieth chapter of Revelation exemption from the power of this death is declared to be the distinguishing privilege of those who have part in the first resurrection—which assuredly is a bodily resurrection—at the coming of the Lord. How strange and incongruous would it be to say that the partakers in a certain bodily resurrection of the "blessed and holy" shall thereby be exempted from a second spiritual death, and a death moreover which, according to Mr. Jukes, is not God's final judgment, but his unspeakable blessing. A death through which alone we can enter into the kingdom of heaven. Surely, to say that on those who have part in the first resurrection this "second death" hath no power, would be equivalent to saying that they alone shall be lost. A strange promise this to the "blessed and holy!" But, on the other hand, how congruous and in perfect harmony is it to say that those who have part in a first resurrection, the distinguishing characteristics of which are incorruption and immortality (1 Cor. xv., 51–54), shall thereby be placed forever beyond the reach of a second death, which consists in the utter destruction of both body and soul in Gehenna.

But I must, in brief conclusion, notice the evidences of man's natural immortality, which Mr. Jukes has endeavored to adduce from holy Scripture. They are two in number.

(1). "Adam was the son of God" (Luke iv., 38); and "it is this divine parentage which makes man what he is, a spirit, which though fallen has an eternal destiny; a being who is eternal, because he is a son of God." Mr. Jukes here attempts to erect a vast superstructure upon a very insecure foundation. The argument which is based on this passage is thus conclusively disposed of by Dr. Candlish: "This mere rounding off of the genealogy of our Lord, as traced by Luke upwards, and not, as in Matthew's gospel, downwards—this simple intimation, that in Adam the ascending line of human parentage is lost, and that his origin must be ascribed immediately to God—is often brought forward as if it were not only an express, but even an emphatic assertion of Adam's proper personal sonship. . . . In reality, there is no idea suggested in this whole pedigree or family-tree, but that of descent; son descending from father, until Adam is reached, whose descent is from no human father, but must be said to be of God. There is nothing like real fatherhood and sonship, as a permanent and personal relation asserted here." Indeed the words rendered "which was the Son of God," inasmuch as the phrase is throughout elliptical (except in verse 23), might rather have been translated simply, "which was of God." Assuredly there is no proof of man's natural immortality to be found here.

(2). But "Adam was made in God's image" (Gen. i., 26, 27). This is an old argument, but I had hoped well-nigh abandoned; for a moment's consideration suffices to expose its fallacy. The argument based on this passage must evidently be constructed thus: God is an immortal being; man is made in the image of God; ergo, man is an immortal being. But the fallacy of this will at once appear if we substitute some other divine attribute in the place of immortality. For instance: God is an omnipresent being; man is made in the image of God; ergo, man is omnipresent! And if it be objected that these conclusions do not equally follow, because while the first involves no absurdity, is it in accordance with reason, and may be regarded as probably true, the second is palpably absurd, contrary to reason, and demonstrably false; I deny the force of this objection, and still maintain that the conclusions are equally just, because such an inference as that involved in the original argument can be fairly drawn only on the supposition of a complete resemblance. To illustrate this—If I say of two faces that they exhibit a perfect resemblance to each other, then I am quite warranted in fixing upon any particular feature in one face, and asserting that the other face must possess one precisely the same. But if, on the other hand, I am told that the two faces possess some one feature in common, and that feature is not specified, then I am not warranted in drawing any such conclusion. Now where, I demand, has Scripture declared that immortality is that special attribute of the divine nature in the image of which man was created? Certainly it is not in the text.

I find, from personal experience, that it is extremely difficult to convince those who have not investigated the matter for themselves, that there is really no intimation of man's natural immortality to be found in the Bible. It may, however, and I trust will, impel some to this conviction to find a man of Mr. Jukes' knowledge and ability forced to fall back upon such weak and worthless arguments as these. No; a divine capacity for immortality existed in Adam, and exists still in every human being, but it is as a seed which may dwindle for lack of nourishment, and die at last an undeveloped germ; but may, on the contrary, be developed and bring forth eternal fruit in Christ Jesus.

I am, dear sir,
Yours in Christ our Life,
W. MAUDE.

MY EXPERIENCE.

IT is over twenty-six years since I first heard of the coming of the Lord; and when I look back over my past life I am ready to exclaim, "He leadeth the blind by a way which they knew not." Thirty years ago I was a profane youth of fifteen, having been four years in bondage to a Presbyterian deacon, compelled by him to walk three miles to church, barefoot, and return with the "text" or be whipped. And when I speak of the many long prayers that I endured during that time, one can understand my aversion to Christians. After leaving this man, I was thrown into the company of two of the most profane men that I ever saw. Then it was that the Lord took me in hand. Standing in the door of the house one day, under the uplifted arm of one of these swearers, looking toward a black cloud which was rising from the west, he uttered a most horrible oath; the next moment both of us were stretched upon the floor; he, dead with the oath upon his lips; I, helpless and speechless. The wife of the other swearer was also killed.

Oh, what a call from heaven! suddenly struck to the earth, but my life spared! Thank God, I have taken His holy name in vain but twice since that time, and by the grace of God I will do it no more. No tongue can tell the anguish which I endured at every recurring thunder-storm. It was a monitor to me. Ah, if I had been doing wickedly, indulging in vile language, the first thunderbolt from heaven would cause me to turn a short corner and renew my covenant with God. Thus was the fallow ground broken up, the stony heart mellowed and subdued by the thunders of heaven. Rather by the sweet spirit of Jesus, who chose this mode of placing His easy yoke upon the neck of a wicked and ungovernable creature.

Right here, after two years of preparation, was the excellent seed of the kingdom sown. Right here was the glad tidings of the second advent of our Lord, of the restitution of the earth, and of the redemption of the race proclaimed to and gladly accepted by me. I was in the excitement of '43 and '44; and with all my dear brethren was sadly disappointed. We supposed that the Lord would then and there deliver His people. But, brethren, were we ready? Had we been purified and tried at that time? I frankly confess that I had not. I had a little knowledge and a great deal of zeal, and like all babes made a great deal of noise. My religion might have been compared to a rivulet rushing over the rocks; certainly not to the quiet and majestic river. For many years I was taunted by the world for the part I had taken in that great movement, and although much error was taught and many foolish moves made, I am glad that I passed through them all, "knowing that affliction worketh patience, and patience, experience, and experience, hope." The stone must be quarried, squared, chiselled and polished before it is fit for the great temple, of which Solomon's was a type.

After many years, I was suddenly brought up thus: "Do you believe that you have an immortal soul?" Yes. "Why do you believe it?" Because the Bible teaches it. "Can you find one passage in all the Book of God that says the soul is immortal?" Yes, plenty. "Please find it." I found—"Well, what did you find?" The thief on the cross. "Yes." The rich man and Lazarus. "Yes." The smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever. "Yes, but did you find an immortal soul?" No. I fought the hateful doctrine two years, and then was compelled to believe it. But thinking it too good news for the sinner, I kept still about it for another year. Finally a kink broke in my ear, and the subject presented itself thus: By your silence, sir, you are giving countenance to the first great lie of the serpent. The call was a loud one. I heeded it, and have not failed whenever the serpent has raised its head in my presence, to hit it.

About nine or ten years ago, a number of us came together and opened a hall in Bleecker street, where George Storrs preached about two years. We found out before he commenced that he believed in the non-resurrection of the wicked. Like dogs in the manger, or worldly-wise men, we requested that he would not preach it, saying that he would break us up if he did. Brother Storrs held back all he could for a year and a half, but when the fire broke out it exploded our institution, although it was "organized according to law." Here again I was tried to the quick with the weight of Scripture against the resurrection of the unholy dead. There were, nevertheless, two texts which appeared to me to teach their future life. Thus I remained another year, with no choice of my own, but desiring earnestly to know the mind of God in this matter.

While pursuing my usual occupation, without any previous contemplation, this thought took possession of my mind—To what are the righteous raised? To life. Are the wicked to be raised to LIFE? No. Does Jesus say anything about life in connection with dead sinners? No. Is there a passage in all the Book of God that declares that the unholy dead shall live again? No. Is there a passage that declares that they shall not live again? Yes, many. Brethren, what was I, that I should withstand God? I had studied this subject carefully and prayerfully; two roads presented themselves before me; and although one was broad enough to accommodate the whole world and the other so narrow that but few could find it, I failed to determine which was the right way, and sat me down and prayed for light. At the end of one year the Lord marked the roads in my sight; the one He called life, and the other death. Need I say that with joy and thanksgiving I arose and entered the narrow way. Prior to this, my persecutors and contemners were men of the world. Now they are my brethren, my own familiar friends. They cry after me, saying, "Mad dog," "death in the pot," "fire-eater," "shelve him." They close their doors at my approach as if they feared a pestilence. I am forcibly reminded of the words of God, Isa. lxvi., 5, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye that tremble at his word: your brethren that hated you, that cast you out for my name's sake, said, let the Lord be glorified; but He shall APPEAR to your joy, and they shall be ashamed."

Time-servers, men who never believe or preach any doctrine until the rulers have sanctioned it. Also, men who will not preach an unpopular truth, openly, courting the applause of men. These, as ever so now, will be petted, well fed and well paid. But the man who dare stand up boldly and proclaim the counsel of God, expecting only that honor which comes from Him, will be smitten upon the cheek, and told to "go to his own land, and there eat bread and prophesy." Brethren, if I have wronged any of you, forgive me, for Christ's sake, as I freely forgive you. You may separate yourselves from me, but I will never leave you. With all your faults I love you still. "Brethren, let us not grudge one against the other. Behold the Judge standeth at the door;" and I feel in my heart of hearts that He is about to come in. Signs appear on every hand. One of the most ominous is the fact that our brethren have lost their reckoning and gone to sleep. "In such an hour as ye think not, your Lord doth come." Oh, brother, sister, arouse thyself: "Behold the Bridegroom cometh."

W. H. HANFORD.

"THE UNPREACHED GOSPEL."

WE have heretofore spoken on this subject, as presented by Mr. Dunn in England, and which some in this country think worth their while to recommend. We see that gentleman does not get on smoothly at home, and thinks himself sometimes misrepresented, which is possible; yet it is difficult to see how that can be done, as his theory needs nothing to make it worse than his own statements. We find the following reply to one of his complaints in "The Rainbow" for August:

GENERAL RESTORATION.

To Henry Dunn, Esq.

DEAR SIR: I had intended to content myself with my brief reply in the "Rainbow" for July, to your letter addressed to me in the "Rainbow" for June. Your letter entitled "What I have written," and appended to the "Rainbow" for July, compels me however to take some further notice. It is a grave charge which you bring against me of having misrepresented your views. I maintain that I have notdone so in the minutest particular.

I will not enter into all your charges of misrepresentation, but will confine myself to one—the first you mention, and one of the chief—namely, that I have given an unfaithful representation of what is to take place according to you in Hades and in Hell.

You first give my view of your opinions as follows: "According to Mr. Dunn, there is to be a restoration in hell of vast numbers to the image of God; hell will be, in his view, the great field on which the harvest of the human race will be reaped; the soul in Hades is being prepared to benefit by the more efficacious process to be undergone in hell; hell is the true theatre of hope," etc., etc.

After you have thus correctly stated what I have represented as your teaching in your work, "The Kingdom of God," you contradict me in the following plain and explicit terms: you say of my representation, "Strange to say, this language is never used by me, nor can a single line from anything that I have written be produced in its support; and you then quote a passage from a work of yours, which I have never seen, "The destiny of the Human race," in which you speak of Hell as the final lot of the irreclaimably wicked (Rainbow for June. pp. 282–83). What you may have taught in those works which I have not seen, I do not know—nor does it concern me. It is enough for me, to have stated correctly what you teach in those works which came under my review, namely, "The Kingdom of God," and "The Unpreached Gospel." It is from these you should have corrected me, if in error. From these you could not, as I will now show.

I have represented you as teaching in them these three things; first that there will be hereafter a restoration of vast numbers to the image of God, who have not here been reconciled to him; secondly, that this restoration will not take place in Hades, but that there the soul will be prepared to benefit by a more efficacious process to be afterwards undergone; thirdly, that it is in Hell (Gehenna) that this efficacious process will be undergone, and that it will be a process which will not put men to any severe trial. With respect to the first of these statements, namely, your teaching that there will be hereafter a restoration of vast numbers to the image of God, I presume I need not quote your words in proof. It is the object which you aim at establishing in every page of yours which I have read. The only question then between us is, where, according to you, this restoration is to take place!

I state that you represent it as not taking place in Hades, but that there a kind of preparation is being made for it. Am I wrong here? Listen to your own words. In one place, speaking of Hades, you say, "it is at all events possible, that with many, the sorrows of the invisible world may be introductory to that further probation in the world (or age) to come, which Scripture certainly hints at" (Kingdom of God, p. 172): in another place you say, "desires for the deliverance of others from the world of sorrowing and unrest may spring up in the invisible, a state of mind which at least indicates a conviction that the path trodden has been foolish and evil, and which is certainly an approach to the penitent renunciation of it" (p. 174); you elsewhere state of those in Hades that there "they may rejoice to hear that deliverance from evil is yet possible even for them, and thus long to be brought under a training adapted to their circumstances" (p. 175); and, once more, you say of them, "it may indeed not be certain that in the world of transition of which I speak, any sure hope can be enjoyed; it may be impossible that there any one should enter into the peace which on earth follows the consciousness of forgiven sin, or be able to speak, as such can, of being saved already, or of having passed from death unto life," etc., etc. (b. 176). I do not think that any one who reads these words of yours will think I have misrepresented your view of Hades.

I should almost think it needless after this to say any more. If there is, according to you, to be a great future restoration, and if this restoration does not take place, but is only being in some measure prepared for in Hades, there is no other place where you can suppose it to take place but Hell. I will, however, show from your own words, that you do place it there. At page 186 you say, "the same class of characters—the fearful, the unbelieving, the idolatrous, the false, and the licentious—who, in the eighth verse of the twenty-first chapter (Revelation), are said to "have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death," are in the fifteenth verse of the twenty-second chapter spoken of as "without" the heavenly city, which seems to render their ultimate restoration at least possible." At page 22 of your letter, "What I have Written," appended to the "Rainbow" for July last, you speak of these same characters as "nations outside of the New Jerusalem, who are said to be in process of healing by the leaves of a mystic tree growing by the pure "river of water of life," that proceeds "out of the throne of God and of the Lamb;" and you further state, that it will be the office of those redeemed on the earth now to restore the myriads of the lost. That this will be done with little trouble on the part of the lost, you state plainly at p. 42 of your "Kingdom of God," where you say "that man, having come into the world burdened with a sinful nature, without any choice of his own, shall one day find his deliverance, to some extent at least, accomplished without any effort of his own." How then, dear sir, have I misrepresented your views of Hades and of Hell? It may be you do not hold those views now. It may be that you have taught differently in other works of yours. With your change of views, or inconsistency of views, I have nothing to do. I professed to give your views as contained in your "Kingdom of God," and I gave them truly to the minutest particular. Instead of your having to complain of me, I have to complain of you; and I now ask you publicly to acknowledge that the prebendary of Cork has faithfully represented the views of Mr. Henry Dunn, as those views are contained in Mr. Dunn's "Kingdom of God."

I remain, very sincerely yours,

HENRY CONSTABLE.

THE HOLY SPIRIT.

"Lord, are there few that be saved?" "Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone."

WHEN we contemplate the straight and narrow path whose quiet leadings are through the sequestered vale of peace, and when we see the persistency with which men,—yea, men called good and pious even, cling to and rest upon things short of "the one thing needful," we feel a faintness and sickness of heart come over us, and are ready to throw down our pen, cease our effort, and nestling down under the broad fold of divine love, rest quietly until the darkness be past and the chief Shepherd appear to gather his elect to himself. But while thinking to rest a little from this sickening contemplation, we hear the Beloved saying, "Occupy until I come;" as also his example of diligence and persistent love to and for man, even until his expiring breath, and we are aroused again, remembering this fact, here is our labor, our rest "over there."

Was there a deadly malady spreading consternation all around, and we a physician possessed of an elixir—a sure cure, and no fail, with directions accompanying each package; and had we many other medicines, excellent in many respects, but really could not destroy the virus, only acting as palliatives—would moderate the violence of and produce many favorable symptoms, etc.; which would the people be after? The sure cure, you say, at any price. But really, when we look on the conduct of the masses, it seems they love and choose humbuggery rather than truth; thinking it preferable to perish fashionably than to be robed by the way of the cross! Oh, mad delusion! God save yet some from its giant grasp.

Yet reckless as the world is, when death does indeed stare us in the face, such is our constitutional make that really "all that a man hath will he give for his life," and if for a perishable life—a life which must inevitably end by death, any way, how much more should we prize and grasp after that life which is eternal! For this "one thing is needful"—one thing only will extract the virus of sin, or redeem a soul (person) from death or the grave.

God gave Adam a specific in the tree of life, a natural remedy for a natural want. God gives us a spiritual tree of life in Christ, our second Adam, for our moral disease, and to bring spiritual and future eternal life. But, ah, the medicine is so dear, so bad (?) to take, few are found really under its operation. We know it may be called dear because it cost a great sum to provide it for us, and it requires a great price to be paid for it, but no more than one is willing to give for natural life: but of what trifling value comparatively. "All that he hath:" this is the price; not given once when pressed under a load of guilt and sin, and afterward filched back again by piecemeal, as blessings and goods increase. No, no, God deals not with us as inert matter, but as active intelligences. A living sacrifice is now the requirement of our ever-living high priest; a constant recognition of the demand upon us. "We walk by faith;" not by faith as by a guide-board or mile-stone, a thing fixed in certain localities and positions; but by, with, or through faith as a staff, a light, an impelling power about and within us; like the mainspring of the watch it makes us go. Perhaps some sensitive ones may say, You make the Spirit your hobby. Well, do you not know that the sin of our times is idolatry? a making too much of creature things? As with the vender of patent medicines, almost all are specifics, so in theology, every and each thing is grasped with too much of this same delusive idea. We say the times are ominous in this direction. If in the apostles' times, when scarce the divine radiance which beamed forth in the heavenly teachings of a present living Jesus had left the world, the church had to be reproved, and that sharply, for leaving the Spirit and seeking to be made perfect by the flesh (doctrines of men), how much more now, when the accumulated sin and unbelief of nearly nineteen centuries have hid the truth [as realized through the Spirit, and felt by its operation on the heart], and almost driven it from the earth! Yes, this divine light has been slighted by a preference given to doctrines, theories more or less good, perhaps, but holding a wrong position; first pure; love unfeigned; then add to your faith, knowledge, etc.

A present indwelling Christ (by his Spirit) is what needs to be preached, not preached with the lips only, but preached in the affections of the heart, and shown by the life: preached with the demonstration and power of God to save men. Even then but few can be reached! Oh, reader, how are you treating this Spirit of the living God?

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 18, 1869.

NO IMMORTALITY NOR FUTURE LIFE, EXCEPT IN JESUS CHRIST ALONE, AND BY A RESURRECTION AT THE LAST DAY IF DEAD, OR A CHANGE IF ALIVE.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote there or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE ENGLISH MIND STIRRED.

WE have given a large space this week in our columns, inside and out, to an exhibit of the working of the English mind on the great question of the age, viz., Is the horrible doctrine of inherent immortality and eternal torture longer to be tolerated as the teachings of the Bible?

On the first page (outside) is to be found Mr. Maude's reply to Mr. Jukes, which we promised last week to give entire. Read it carefully. We do not indorse every expression in it; but you cannot read it without profit.

We had failed to read an article in "The Rainbow" for July, by Edward White, on "Missionary Theology," till since our last issue. We have given up a large space inside to that article. Mr. White published a work on "LIFE IN CHRIST," of several hundred pages octavo, over twenty years since, which we imported at the time, and made large extracts from it for the Bible Examiner; but for the past fifteen years we had heard nothing of him as to the position he occupied. We are glad to see he has not gone backward, as we feared from what we regarded his silence. It was true then, whatever his position may be now, that he held views on the state of Christians in death that did not agree with ours.

His article we have now inserted ought to have the thoughtful consideration of all lovers of truth. It contains many solemn truths, and shows the failure of Missionary labors has been caused by the preaching of inherent immortality and eternal torments; and it also shows that there is a shaking in regard to such theology in England. May the God of Love direct the "Theological Earthquake" so that His designs shall be accomplished. Let us thank Him and take courage.

2 PETER I., 19–21.

A WRITER in "The Rainbow" makes the following remarks on the above text, which strike us as probably expressing its true meaning. He says:

If we correct the pointing, we shall have the passage in a better and more intelligent form. This it is quite lawful to do, as the punctuation of our Bible is merely a human contrivance; and may be wrong, as it is in this and some other cases. The following is the sense which many good scholars put upon the passages. "We have also a more sure word of prophecy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn and the day star arise: in your hearts knowing this first," etc. This is a good alteration, without interfering with the original. I prefer, however, the following, which has been familiar to me for a long time: "We have a more firm word of prophecy, whereunto ye do well that ye take heed (as unto a lamp that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the morning star arise) in your hearts: knowing this first," etc.

—The language of Peter puts an importance on the prophecies of the Old Testament which few, even among those calling themselves "Adventists," seem at all to realize. They are "a more sure word" than most suppose; and we are "to take heed" to them "until the day dawn, and the day star arise;" and to do this, "knowing in our hearts, first, that no prophecy of the Scriptures is of any private impulse, or invention:" (such is the literal sense): "for the prophecy came not at any time" (margin) "by the will of man"; but holy men of God spake, moved by the Holy Spirit." Thus all is plain.

FROM JACOB GRIM.

PHILADELPHIA, Aug. 14, 1869.

BR. STORRS: What is to be the fate of the HERALD OF LIFE?

The time is near at hand when we should know what is to be done for the coming year. For one, I am willing and would forego all the public meetings, rather than have the paper cease to exist. Your advice to our Pennsylvania Doctor suits me exactly. Circulate the paper and tracts, which are the most effectual preachers. But to do so requires funds and labor, and labor needs pay. Therefore before the meeting at Springfield convenes, it would be well to know something of the prospect for sustaining the cause. At our last meeting there was some fear felt that the paper might die; and before the time we were hearing from all quarters a desire that the paper might be sustained. Is it now a settled fact, that the paper will be supported, and is there not too much confidence manifested, or it may be apathy, in the matter? And from this very fact may we not fail from neglect or over-confidence in the matter? I have been looking for responses in regard to the matter and so far there have been very few.

It may be possible the friends intend being present at the meeting and doing in person what they intend doing.

I suppose we could get used to anything, in time, but it would go very hard to miss the friendly visits of the HERALD. I know your labors are great and you need help; but I know you are willing to do all that you are able, and more if necessary, to sustain the HERALD, if the friends will only supply the needful funds.

What is the prospect for the Life of the HERALD? The friends should know the fair state of the case. Many will not be able to attend the meeting; and if we are not able to succeed they may say, we would have done something if we had thought there was any likelihood of its suspension. I would state the case thus: For every subscriber to ask themselves the following questions—Would I like to be deprived of my paper? Can I find one that will supply its place in every particular? For fear of being deprived of it, had I not better re new my subscription at once, or send on the pledge that I intend to give, so that the brethren may have the assurance it will be sustained?

Brethren and Sisters, we can not all preach or hear preaching, but we can all read and circulate the HERALD; therefore let it be sustained.

Some persons say, I do not like all the articles in the paper. Why, I seldom sit down to the dinner table at which I can say I like all the dishes; but I can find enough to satisfy my hunger; and the dishes which I dislike just suit some one else. So we are all satisfied.

Yours in the hope of being fully satisfied when we awake in his likeness.

REMARKS BY THE EDITOR.—Br. Grim and and all the other friends of the paper may be assured that with the same liberality that manifested itself at our last anniversary there will be do danger to its life, so far as pecuniary support is concerned; but if its friends think the time has come to relax in pecuniary matters they are mistaken, and we cannot tell what may be the result. They may all be assured none of their funds have been squandered, and we know that the most rigid economy has been practised, or the paper would have been among the things that are not long before now.

We have sent out some hundreds more papers this year than ever before; while the actual receipts from those receiving the paper have not advanced in the same ratio. Yet new subscribers have been steadily coming in up to the present time, and the apparent interest in the paper, by those hitherto ignorant of or opposed to it gives hopes of a large increase the coming volume. That is one of the reasons why its friends should not abate their efforts for pecuniary support, nor suffer their minds to be divided in relation to the UNION'S effort to promulgate what they regard as the great and essential truth of "Life only in Christ."

If we allow disunion to arise because everything is not just as we would like to have it, or if we set up an effort with a view to the pecuniary interest of an individual, distraction and disaster only can follow. Such has ever been the result in all enterprises. To accomplish the greatest good, we need to have our means concentrated some how and some where, and to watch against allowing any spirit of self-interest or self-aggrandizement to influence us in our work.

We trust, however, the harmony that has in former years characterized the efforts of the "LIFE AND ADVENT UNION" will continue and increase, and that no cause will arise to abate it.

MISSIONARY THEOLOGY:

CONSIDERED IN ITS TWO DOCTRINES OF ENDLESS MISERY; AND A POST-MILLENIAL ADVENT OF CHRIST.

BY EDWARD WHITE,

MINISTER OF ST. PAUL'S CHAPEL, HAWLEY ROAD KENTISH TOWN.

THE Rev. Br. Mullens, Secretary to the London Missionary Society, in a recent work entitled London and Calcutta, designed to trace the outlines of Protestant Missions in India and to stimulate the flagging zeal of their supporters, asks—"Why have Missionary Meetings failed so greatly to attract young men?" "Why are the very churches which once supported them best now giving to them only half of what they gave thirty years ago?" "Where are the crowded meetings, which welcomed Williams, and Moffat, and Knibb, and listened to their stories?" "Were a DEEP, SETTLED INTEREST, felt by Christian men at large in mission work abroad, these things could not be."—Dr. Mullens answers these searching questions by an argument designed to prove that the causes of the comparative apathy are ignorance of the encouraging results already attained, and, above all, too exclusive devotion to the prosecution of the Home Missions of Christianity—an exclusiveness which robs foreign missions of their due share of attention and support. The larger part of Dr. Mullens' work is expended in setting forth the general social effects of Christianity in the East, and in presenting a brilliant picture of the results to be expected in the future from the gradual undermining of heathenism. The chief practical object of his book is, apparently, to persuade the churches to make larger pecuniary contributions to the funds of the missionary societies, under the idea that a few hundreds of additional missionaries will hasten the conversion of Asia to the belief of the gospel.

For Dr. Mullens, as a laborious missionary and able director of mission work, it is impossible not to entertain warm regard and very sincere reverence. It is not, however, inconsistent with that regard to offer a few suggestions in the way of further answer to the questions proposed by him, as to the causes of that decline of interest in missions which he confesses and laments.

It is not necessary to deny the force of the allegation that the churches at home devote a disproportionate measure of attention to English objects. Men are naturally interested in the visible more than in the invisible, in England, which is seen, more than in India, which is unseen. The spiritual force which is required to sustain a deep and settled interest in the missions of the gospel is far greater than is usually supposed. They make a larger demand upon the spiritual nature of man than any other form of human endeavor. To feel compassion for the souls of nations whom we have never beheld, from whom we are divided by the diameter of the globe, who are physically and morally our antipodes, with whose natural character we have the faintest sympathy—to expend thought, effort, and considerable property in furthering the interest of those unknown nations in a world which is still more completely invisible and unknown, requires a depth of conviction, a strength of principle, an elevation of spirit, wholly foreign to ordinary human nature, and neither to be produced nor sustained except by the direct action of the Spirit of God.

The same Power which alone can "thrust forth" a true laborer into the harvest, can alone create or uphold a corresponding spirit of zeal, faith, and self-sacrifice in the churches which send him forth. The missionary agency abroad is the hand at the end of a long arm, extended by the Church at home. If that arm is paralyzed at the shoulder, whence shall come the force by which blows shall be struck at the ends of the earth? A decline of the spiritual life, therefore, in England, a decay of faith in things unseen, a loss of spiritual power through the advance of habits of luxurious living, would necessarily take the form first of a loss of interest in the unseen field of foreign missions—a decline of interest soon to be followed by a similar decay in the work of God at home.

It is not my intention, however, to prosecute this line of inquiry. We shall proceed on the more agreeable hypothesis that the concern for the salvation of the heathen nations is just as earnest and real as ever it was; and suggest a few considerations tending to explain the nature of those influences which have so greatly repressed of late years the exhibitions of interest in missionary societies in nearly all Christian communities.

I. And in the first place, I venture to assign as one cause of the indisputable decline of interest in the existing foreign missions of the gospel, a growing skepticism as to the theory on which they are established.

In the apostolic age the doctrinal spirit and the missionary spirit were evolved by the Spirit of God in the church with equal power, and they ought never to be separated. Each requires combination with the other.

It has unhappily happened several times since that each has been developed alone. In some ages a spirit of missions has been developed apart from the spirit of doctrinal study, as in the second and third, the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. In other cases, the doctrinal spirit has been evolved without a corresponding activity of the spirit which leads to the diffusion of the gospel. At the close of the last century, when the existing Protestant missionary societies arose amidst the hurricanes of the French Revolution, the spirit of theological study, of careful, bold, devout, biblical criticism, on which the faith ought to be founded, was as nearly as possible defunct in England. Perhaps we may say that just at the very time when it became of more importance than ever that the church should take care what was to be taught as Christianity among the nations of the world, the work of evangelizing was commenced, as it had been in several similar preceding ages of activity in Christendom, in a spirit of unquestioning submission to the forms of thought and expression stereotyped by previous generations. Never was any great enterprise begun with more simplicity of purpose, with more heroic faith, with more devoted piety, than the enterprise of the founders of the Baptist, and Independent, and Episcopal Missions, at the close of the last century; and also, it must be added, never was any great enterprise begun with more unquestioning adhesion to the traditions of the fathers. There was scarcely a man among the whole company of persons engaged in that glorious undertaking who ever dreamed of doubting any of the doctrines stamped with the imprimatur of the sixteenth century Reformation. The powers of action awoke, as often before, in isolation, and the power of thought and truth-seeking still for the most part slumbered.

What has been the result of this phenomenon? Is it not this, that inasmuch as the theological spirit has since recovered its energy in the churches, and attention has been devoted once more to biblical criticism and doctrine, there is now a certain separation between the missions of Protestantism and the deeper home convictions of religious Englishmen. The Missionary Societies represent the thinking of seventy years ago, when the church accepted without question the traditions of Protestant theology handed down by the Reformers. But they are surrounded by a generation which has lifted the anchors of its theology, and which has drifted or sailed into other waters. In some of the most important particulars of Christian faith, indeed, there is no change. The faith in a divine Christ, in an atonement for sin, in the person and work of the Holy Spirit, in a gratuitous justification, is the same now as it was of old. But these doctrines were considered by the founders of missions as but a superstructure built on a deeper foundation. That foundation was an antecedent belief in the natural immortality of mankind, and their consequent destiny either to endless misery or endless joy. In the opinion of Dr. Carey, and those who first went with him to India, as well as of the churches in Britain, every human being was an immortal, was possessed of a soul as eternal in the future as the nature of God. Every inhabitant of India was thus regarded as an immortal. Every unregenerate soul, descended from Adam, was born under the curse of endless woe, and was, by its own sins, confirmed in that direful destiny. Salvation could be effected only by the distinguishing grace of God in regeneration. All the unregenerate of all ages were unsaved, and the unsaved of India, as of all lands, were destined to be delivered over, as Dr. Carey says in one of his letters, to "endless misery." To endless misery had gone all the numberless unregenerate inhabitants of Asia during the ages of darkness preceding the advent of Dr. Carey in India. To "endless misery" were going all the millions who rejected his message, or refused to abandon their ancestral creeds. This is still the foundation of missionary theology. This is still what may be called the state creed of all the missionary societies. No one is considered at liberty to deny it in a missionary speech or sermon. It is the platform creed of Exeter-hall. The missionary students at the colleges are supposed to believe it. The directors are supposed to believe it. The missionaries abroad are supposed to believe it. No one who openly assailed it would be asked to assist at a missionary assembly, or to plead the cause of missions before the people.

And yet—it is disbelieved in the churches throughout the length and breadth of the country. It is doubted and denied with varying degrees of confidence. But it is doubted and denied almost universally, and most of all by persons of accurate knowledge and spiritual intelligence. The doubt and denial are not confined to skeptics, to mockers, to adversaries; but are professed with more or less of openness by men whose knowledge gives the utmost weight to their judgment, and whose hard-working piety challenges comparison with that of any of the advocates of the older creed. One meets with a few earnest, and able, and unquestionably sincere, controversial supporters of that elder belief. The names of Dr. Pusey, of Dr. Salmon of Dublin, and of the Hon. and Rev. Baptist Noel, will occur to all readers. But no one who intimately knows English religious society will venture to deny that there has been an immense revolution in opinion as to the probable destiny of the ignorant idolatrous nations of the earth, and that it is the rarest thing to find even a secretary of a missionary society, or the tutor of a missionary college, who will, when firmly pressed, declared his unfeigned assent and consent to the opinions on this question of the founders of our missionary societies. Men, nowadays, have their doubts, their special theories of relief, their hopes, or their positive doctrines. Either they hold, as I am informed that some heads of colleges hold, that Scripture gives room for several opposite theories; or they lean to Universalism, with Mr. Jukes, and teach men to trust in future purgatories; or they wholly repudiate and openly denounce and assail the old missionary doctrine, and believe with us that they who have "sinned without law," and led impenitent lives under heathen darkness, shall "perish without law" and "die" with "few stripes;" but it is simply a fact that opinion has changed and is changing here, and that the churches at home, acted upon by the revived spirit of doctrinal study, are silent where our fathers would have spoken, or doubt where they would have unhesitatingly followed the doctrine of the dark ages, or boldly deny where they would have awfully anathematized opposition. No one seems moved by the argument that such good men as our fathers were must have been right in all their doctrines. We know, as a matter of fact, that they were wholly mistaken in many things which they firmly believed. The truth is that Nature, and Scripture, and human life, are better understood than they were seventy years ago, and the conviction is widely spread that the ancient notion of the consignment to everlasting torment of the countless multitudes of the heathen who have been born in error, bred up in superstition, and who were abandoned to die either in total ignorance of the true gospel, or in rejection of a gospel message only partly revealed to them, cannot possibly be true under the government of Infinite Justice, Boundless Wisdom, and Eternal Love.

The general result is, that the religious public feel that the unchanged missionary theology does not, in some important respects, represent their present thoughts, and thence follows a decline of interest in the propagation of ideas no longer believed. Few men of the first class in either honesty or ability, offer themselves for missionary work. It is understood that the studies of college life are not likely to lead always to the faith of our forefathers: hence, since open denial, or opposition, or avowed skepticism is forbidden, strong men shrink from a vocation in which integrity of thought and speech will become penal; and the missionary work is delivered over to persons of a more compliant and docile constitution—men also will continue to utter in the ears of the heathen the monstrous unrealized propositions of a former day, or worse, who will keep silence about Hell altogether.

I attribute, therefore, the decline of interest in missionary societies to an unconfessed partial destruction of the faith on which they were founded, and for the propagation of which they are maintained. Men feel coldly towards a system which sends out missionaries, whose training at home consists very much in persuading them not to think conclusively of the questions of human retribution and destiny; and which discourages the expression of belief, whether at home or abroad, in a sense accordant with the maturest thought of the English churches. The persuasion is universal that the missions of the gospel ought to represent the results of England's most earnest studies. It is felt that they do not represent them. It is felt that this state of things ought to be altered—that there ought to be more space allowed both at college, and in the mission field, certainly for doubt, for undecided opinion, and even for open variation from the ancient creed—that there ought to be liberty for missionaries to express abroad, especially in their dealings with the educated men of India and China, ideas which are gaining ascendency over the best minds at home. It is felt that the governing power of missions ought not to be exclusively in the hands of men who think on all subjects as our fathers did seventy years ago—or worse still, in the hands of men who only pretend to think as they did. It is felt that Jesuitism among Protestants is just as demoralizing as among Romanists; that what is needed in missionary work above all things, is, not concealment of opinion, not hidden doubt, not a weak compliance with the articles insisted on by ignorant multitudes, but earnest, overwhelming faith, a faith which believes, and therefore speaks, a faith which can blow beside the walls of Jericho a "dolorous and jarring blast," before which the defences of heathenism will crumble to the ground. And until the realities of the future world occupy a far larger space in the thoughts of missionary Secretaries and missionary Directors, the feeling of English churches toward them is not likely to improve. Meanwhile it may be noted as a symptom of the disorder complained of, that even Dr. Mullens' own book on missions, admirable man as he is, does not contain a single vigorous reference to Heaven or Hell; and that for aught that explicitly appears on his pages, replete with statistical information, the work of missions might almost be taken to refer to some movement for men's temporal salvation. A state of thought, which takes Heaven and Hell for granted, when treating on missions to the heathen, requires some reform.

2. Another reason for the decline of interest in missionary societies, will I think be found in the failure of spiritual results. This failure has sunk deeply into the heart of England. Public opinion has begun to form itself under other influences than missionary reports and missionary speeches. These tell but a portion of the truth. That which is favorable is generally published. That which is unfavorable is withheld. We are beginning to learn not only who are converted, but who are unconverted; not only what the missionaries think of the learned and able men of India and China, but what the learned men of China and India think of some things taught by the missionaries. We are learning to compare resources and results. We are learning to exercise imagination upon the missionary enterprise, and to understand how it must appear to the "natives" whose religions it assails.

For example, we now comprehend that the presence of our handful of European missionaries in the ports of China, bringing with them a "gospel," of which the fundamental doctrine is that all former inhabitants of China, who have been atheists or idolators, that is, the larger proportion of that stupendous population, during many ages, and who have died in an unregenerate condition, have gone to endless misery—strikes the educated men of China precisely as a similar message would strike the learned men of our Universities, if brought to England after ages of heathenism, by a handful of Chinese missionaries, landing in the ports of London and Liverpool. We can now understand that if it would be highly improbable that our literati would listen to so horrible a proclamation, or recognize in it the voice of a just and benevolent Deity, so it is equally improbable that it will appear Divine when taught by our missionaries at Pekin or Ningpo. And thus we come to comprehend at least some of the reasons, which, after seventy years of labor, the learned and educated classes of both India and China are as far as ever from embracing Christianity. Chinese clergymen, with a similar doctrine at London and Liverpool, could scarcely hope for greater success among ourselves.

Further, the public, after fully believing and appreciating the cheering declarations of our missionary writers as to the social revolution which is gradually advancing throughout the earth, the civilizing process which is supposed to augur a favourable future for Christianity—nevertheless have learned to study the reports of known and actual conversion with profound disquietude, and have settled into the opinion that there must be "some awful mistake somewhere," as Mrs. Stowe expresses it, in the ideas presented for acceptance to the multitudinous Orient. In India there are 180,000,000 of people. In China there are 400,000,000 more. Now all the confessed living converts to Christianity in India, after seventy years of labor, by thirty-one missionary societies, are at this moment not much over 30,000, the far larger proportion of these being persons of the lowest rank in intelligence. Around these professed converts there is a Christianized population of a quarter of a million. We thank God for even such results. But it is impossible to forget what these figures mean. They mean that if you cause to pass before you all the inhabitants of India in ranks of thirty abreast, and marching a yard apart, you would have a column extending from the Land's End in Cornwall to the edge of the Caspian Sea, while the converts to Christianity would be represented by one thousand of these ranks of thirty. If the whole population passed in single file before the eye, and three seconds were allowed to gaze with awful interest as to his eternal destiny upon each dusky countenance, it would require thirty years, of days of twelve hours each, to survey the whole. But the living nominal converts to Christianity from over the whole of India would pass, at the same rate of movement, in twenty-five hours. In China the known results of missionary action are even more apallingly small. You may, indeed, hope that there are thousands of Nicodemuses in both India and China, a hope at once reasonable and encouraging, and thousands more of men saved by the Spirit in their own twilights, but surely there is some apparent deficiency in the power of modern Christianity. Where is the arm that smote Rahab? Where is the power of truth and grace that smote the philosophies and idolatries of the Mediterranean in the apostolic age, and shook the whole of Europe and Asia in a single generation? Let it not be said, it was the force of miracles that then availed. Miracles exerted an inconsiderable influence in comparison with a truth which commended itself to all consciences, a grace that commended itself to all affections, and a terror which struck like a thunderbolt from the uplifted hand of the Almighty.

It is not that we are propagating a Christianity which is half paralyzed in its two chief forces of hope and fear through the perversions of a corrupted theology? We fail in thoroughly presenting God's love to the nations, a love strong enough to melt even Chinese arrogance, and to develop the belief of a personal God even among Chinese atheists, because we have encumbered Christianity with a doctrine of hell, so unjust, so indiscriminate, so hardening in its frightful propositions, that men's consciences refuse to receive it. Missionary theology cannot "commend itself to every man's conscience," because every man's conscience, whether in Europe or Asia, in proportion as it is enlightened, rejects it with horror. This is doubtless one principal reason for the general rejection of the gospel by the Brahmins, Buddhists and Confucianists of the East, God's love is hidden from them, and they "turn away sorrowful" from so direful a Christianity. Sir John Bowring says, in his work on Siam, that he never yet met with a learned Buddhist who could speak with patience of the doctrine of the missionaries on the hell of England and America. Now whatever the better sort of thinking men of any nation generally reject, will not be widely received by the uneducated.

But the prevailing system of teaching among missionaries fails also in another department—fails through withholding the influence of a truth favorable to the production alike of hope and of fear. Not only does the hell preached by the missionaries fail by its unscriptural representations to awaken terror in the educated classes, since whatever you exaggerate you weaken, but it is nearly everywhere the custom with missionary societies to send out men opposed to the belief of Christ's advent to judge the nations at the destruction of the Apostacy. The plain doctrine of St. Paul, in the second letter to the Thessalonians, that the personal advent of Christ will occur for the purpose of destroying "the man of sin;" the plain doctrine of the prophets that the "Son of man comes in the clouds of heaven" for the destruction of the "fourth" empire, and of the "horn that has eyes, and a mouth speaking marvellous things;" the plain doctrine that Christ will come to punish "with flaming fire" a church that has perverted Christianity until men can no longer believe in it, and to judge nations that persist in idolatry after due summons to repentance—this doctrine of Christ's "premillennial" advent, under the influence and expectation of which the gospel was indisputably spread in the first century, is systematically exploded and denied by the missionary societies and the generality of missionaries. And here is a loss of power which may be readily appreciated. Let the gospel be preached in India and China as the message of life to the dead, as the promise of immortality in body and soul to a race sitting in darkness and death shade; let it be preached as the message of a God who is intelligibly loving, and intelligibly and justly severe; let it be preached that the "times of ignorance a gracious God winked at," overlooked, "but now commands all men everywhere to repent;" let the words of the angel of the everlasting gospel, in the Apocalypse, become the text of missionary preaching, "Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come;" and one cannot but believe that a new power will attend in the East the proclamation of Christianity. There is something so striking, so fitted to compel attention, in the warning of Christ's speedy advent to "judge the nations," to destroy obstinate worshippers of idols, to avenge the rejection of the truth, to raise the dead saints, and to establish "God's kingdom" on earth, that even languid India must lift its head to listen, and haughty philosophic China must listen awe-struck to the trumpet-blast. Christianity is a power which is designed to operate on man from before as well as from behind, through the expectation of events which shortly "shall come to pass," in the future, as well as through the study of facts accomplished in a remote past. It is emphatically a prophecy, as well as a history. But, under the prevalent system of missionary teaching, it is a gospel without that advent of Christ, the prospect of which filled and reddened like a dawn of glory at the beginning all the eastern sky. The whole body of prophecy is supposed now to prove only that "the Lord delayeth his coming," that wisdom consists in proclaiming the doctrine of the "evil servant," and in relegating all concern for the Lord's return in the clouds of heaven to a generation that shall live at the end of the Millennium. Vain, then, are all such warnings as, "Behold, he cometh in clouds, and every eye shall see him!" for it is well understood that such an expectation of the Lord is peculiar to the "weaker brethren," and to spirits in which fancy takes the place of faith. Thus it happens that Christ's advent is banished from the thoughts of nearly the whole body of missionaries. "Far off his coming shines" to them, indeed, as a remote, dim nebula in the firmament of the future. Who can wonder that a Christianity so destitute of forces to win, to convince, or to appal, maintains a doubtful fight with the stiff-necked pagans of Asia! What is wanted is a doctrine that commends itself to the reason and to the conscience of men—a love so real as to win all hearts capable of love, a terror so real, so near, and so appreciably equitable, as to shake, if it cannot vanquish, the stoutest resistance of the heathen. What is needed, is a hope of speedy victory to the church sufficient to restore the energies of the first century and a courage founded on conviction which would engage in close conflict with the wretched positivism of Confucius. That "throneless king," as the Chinese call him, would soon, I reckon, lose such of his remaining power, before a CHRIST preached as if he were the very Jesus of the gospels—"coming again," to be the "life" of the world.

With all reverence and affection therefore, but with an earnestness which neutralizes the remembrance of personal insignificance, I implore my fellow-Christians at home to reconsider in the light of Scripture the doctrinal basis and method of the missionary enterprise. I adjure, before Christ our Lord, the Secretaries and Directors of the Missionary Societies, not to continue the ban now disingenuously placed upon those who openly deny what so few in secret perfectly believe. I solemnly call upon all the Ministers of Christ who are persuaded of the untruth of the common doctrine on immortality and retribution, publicly to say so, and to confess their real convictions to the people. I earnestly invite all missionary students in the colleges to study these questions in earnest, and not to add to the number of those who carry out to the heathen a creed which they dare not proclaim to the cultured and intelligent people of India and China.

And finally, if my voice could, by a divine providence reach so far, I would call, with profound respect, but equal boldness, upon every honored Missionary of the Cross around the world, to cast aside the fear of brethren abroad, or churches or directors at home, and to apply his mind, if he have failed so to do up to this present hour, to the consideration of that doctrine of LIFE IN CHRIST which is the plain and natural reading of St. John's Gospel and St. Paul's Epistles; and next, to that doctrine of Christ's ADVENT TO JUDGMENT, which has won the conviction, in modern times, of a Bengel, a Stier, and an Alford, and a thousand more, and was unquestionably the belief of the apostles and their followers in the first age of the Christian revelation.

SINGULAR REASONING.

"As we read the word, the Divine plan is, that all that are in their graves shall come forth. It seems to us that the same course of reasoning which proves a portion of them will not come forth, will prove that none of them will rise."

WE extract this from the "Voice of the West," in a notice of our tract, "THE DIVINE PLAN," which we sent to the editor. The notice is moderate in tone, as we justly expected from so eminent a Christian.

But in reading this, it struck us as a singular piece of logic. It occurred to us, also, that his readers would have difficulty—as we have—in comprehending how an argument used to prove the re-living only of God's people could disprove the resurrection of any. We regret that the editor did not attempt to furnish a little Bible proof on this point; but we would not urge him to undertake what we consider an impossibility.

The principle which our respected brother sets forth appears to be that, if a portion of the human family fail to have a resurrection, then none will rise from the dead. Is this true either in reason or Scripture? We think not, and will give our reasons.

1. In the "Voice," of June 1st, the editor made this truthful declaration:

"We conclude that without Christ none of Adam's posterity would ever have seen life after dying."

Therefore, the resurrection of any of the human family is only through Christ. Upon this point we are agreed. The hope of a future life is based upon the revival of Christ from the dead.

2. If any are raised from the dead, it must be by a connection with Christ. This is clearly the sense of the masterly argument by Paul on the resurrection. He says: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." 1 Cor. xv., 22. By a parental relation to Adam we possess a dying nature, and the "even so" in this passage shows that all who shall be made alive will be by virtue of a parental or regenerating relation to Christ, who is the Second Adam. Do the wicked stand in this parental relation to Christ? If not, how can their resurrection from the dead be proved?
